

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

HOUSE OF LORDS,

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—3rd Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853, Amendment; Consolidated Fund (£3,300,000); Consolidated Fund (£20,000,000); Common Law Procedure Act Amendment (Ireland).

DEATH OF THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: My Lords, I feel it to be my duty to communicate to your Lordships the contents of a telegraphic despatch which I received about half an hour ago from Her Majesty's Minister at the Hague. They are as follows—"The Emperor Nicholas died this morning at one A.M., of pulmonic apoplexy, after an attack of influenza." I have also received a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Berlin, stating that "the Emperor of Russia died between twelve and one o'clock this morning." This afternoon, about an hour before the receipt of the despatches which I have just read to your Lordships, I received an account from Berlin, from my noble Friend Lord John Russell, stating that the Emperor of Russia was on the point of death, and had already taken leave of his family.

I apprehend, therefore, my Lords, that although this event occurred so short a time ago as between twelve and one o'clock this morning, there can be no doubt of the authenticity of the fact. Under these circumstances, as this unexpected event must exercise so important and immediate an influence upon the war, upon the negotiations for peace that are now going on, and possibly, also, upon the policy of Russia, I think my noble and learned Friend opposite will agree with me that it might be attended with much inconvenience if he were this evening to bring forward the Motion of which he has given notice with respect to the position of Prussia; and I trust, therefore, that on public grounds, he will not object to postpone his Motion, at least for a time.

LORD LYNDHURST: After the statement made by my noble Friend, I shall not of course proceed with my Motion this evening; but I beg to state that I shall not withdraw it—I shall merely postpone it: and unless I find, as the result of the negotiations that are said now to be going on at Berlin, that Prussia accedes to the treaty of the 2nd of December, or enters into some equivalent treaty with France and England, I shall bring forward my Motion upon some future day.

THE EARL OF LUCAN.

THE EARL OF LUCAN: My Lords, under the circumstances, painful to myself, and I should say very extraordinary, if not altogether unprecedented, in which I appear before your Lordships, I trust I shall receive your kind indulgence while I read the papers which I now hold in my hand, explanatory of the reasons why I present myself to your Lordships, and why I am not where I should be—at the seat of war. When I have read the papers, it is not my intention to add one word of comment or remark; but your Lordships will allow me to state at the outset that on my arrival in this country I immediately communicated with the Commander in Chief, and asked that noble Lord to have my conduct in the Crimea investigated by a court martial. So long, my Lords, as I can hope—as I at the present moment confidently hope—that my conduct will be submitted to the fair and impartial investigation of officers of the army, who, in all such matters, are the most competent judges that could be chosen, I shall be silent, and will not utter a word in this House. I hope my silence will not be misinterpreted; but, at the same time, I hope your Lordships will permit me to call your attention to the correspondence which I hold in my hand.

My Lords, the three following letters were handed to me on Wednesday, the 14th of February, by a member of Lord Raglan's staff. The first letter is from Lord Raglan, and is addressed to myself—

" My Lord—Having transmitted to the Minister for War the Letter which your Lordship addressed to me on the 30th of November last, for that Purpose, I have now the honour to forward to you the Copy of a Despatch which I received this Evening from the Duke of Newcastle, with its Enclosure from General Viscount Hardinge.

" Your Lordship will perceive that the Queen has been Pleased to approve of the Recommendation of the General Commanding-in-Chief, that you should be Recalled, and that, in communicating to you this Decision, the Minister for War has instructed me to Inform your Lordship that it is Her Majesty's Pleasure that you should Resign the Command of the Cavalry and return to England.

" I have the honour to be, my Lord,
" Your Lordship's most obedient, humble servant,

" RAGLAN.

" Lieutenant-General the Earl of Lucan."

Such, my Lords, were the contents of Lord Raglan's letter. The date of the enclosure from the Duke of Newcastle—and this, my Lords, is a point of importance, to which I beg to call your particular attention—was the 27th January. His Grace wrote in the following terms—

" War Department, Jan. 27, 1855

" MY LORD—I have to acknowledge your Lordship's Despatch dated the 16th of December, closing the Copy of a Letter addressed to you Lieutenant-General the Earl of Lucan, and transmitting to me Observations upon its Contents

" Upon the Receipt of that Despatch I felt the Public Service and the general Discipline of the Army must be greatly prejudiced by any Understanding between your Lordships as the General commanding Her Majesty's Forces in Field, and the Lieutenant Commanding the Division of Cavalry; but, desiring to be fortified in Matters of this Nature by the Opinions of General commanding in Chief, I submitted without Delay, your Lordship's Despatch and the Letter of the Earl of Lucan for the Consideration of General the Viscount Hardinge.

" I have the Honour of enclosing, for your Lordship's Guidance, an Extract from the Report which I have this Day received from Lord Hardinge, and which has been submitted to and proved by the Queen.

" I have therefore to instruct your Lordship to communicate this Decision to the Earl of Lucan, and to inform his Lordship that he should resign the Command of the Cavalry Division and return to England.

" In performing this painful Duty, I purpose abstaining from any Comments upon the Correspondence submitted to me; but I must observe, apart from any Consideration of the Merits of the Question raised by Lord Lucan, the Position which he has now placed himself towards his Lordship renders his Withdrawal from the Cavalry under your Command in all respects advisable.

" I have, &c.

" NEWCASTLE

" Field-Marshal the Lord Raglan, G.C.B.,
The second enclosure was a letter from General Viscount Hardinge to the Duke of Newcastle. It was to the following effect—

" Horse Guards, Jan. 26, 1855.

" Lord Lucan, in his Letter of the 30th of December, objects to the Terms used by Lord Raglan in his public Despatch, that his Orders for the Light Brigade to charge were given under a misconception of the written Order, &c. He desired to withdraw that Letter, and adhered to the construction he has put upon the Order, which compelled him to direct a Charge.

" The Papers having been referred by His Grace to me, I concur with Lord Raglan in the Terms he used in his Despatch were appropriate; and as a good Understanding between the Field-Marshal commanding the Forces in Field and the Lieutenant-General Commanding the Cavalry Division are Conditions essential necessary for advantageously carrying on the Public Service, I recommend that Lieutenant-General Lord Lucan should be recalled; and your Grace and Her Majesty's Government, in this View, I will submit my Recommendation to Her Majesty, and take Her Majesty's Pleasure on the subject.

" I have, &c.

" His Grace the Duke of Newcastle."

Now, my Lords, it was my intention to have read the letter which I addressed to Lord Raglan in November, and which appears to be the corpus delicti, or the offence with which I am charged; but I need not trouble your Lordships with reading it, because I am told it has already appeared in the Times newspaper. I think it right to state, my Lords, that the letter was not sent by me to the Times newspaper. It is true I gave copies of that letter to many friends before quitting the army, for I did not think it safe to leave the army in the Crimea with an impression on their minds that I had been recalled in consequence of writing a letter to Lord Raglan, without leaving copies of the letter behind me, that it might be clearly understood how the matter rested. I believe that in giving copies of that letter after my recall, I only did that which was due to myself and to the service in which I was engaged. But, as I have said, the letter has appeared in the Times newspaper, and therefore I shall not trouble your Lordships by reading it. [Cries of "Read, read!"] Certainly, if it is your Lordships' desire that I should read it, I will do so. The letter is dated Balaklava, November 30—five weeks after the battle. The letter was expressed in the following terms—

"Balaklava, 30th Nov., 1854.

"Mr Lono—In your Lordship's Report of the Cavalry Action at Balaklava of the 25th ultimo, given in the Papers which have just arrived from England, you observe 'that from some Misconception of the Instruction to advance, the Lieutenant General considered that he was bound to attack at all Hazards, and he accordingly ordered Lord Cardigan to move forward with the Light Brigade.' Surely, my Lord, this is a grave Charge, and an Imputation reflecting seriously on my professional Character. I cannot remain silent; it is, I feel, incumbent on me to state those Facts which I cannot doubt must clear me from what, I respectfully submit, is altogether unmerited.

"The Cavalry was formed to support an intended Movement of the Infantry, when Captain Nolan, the Aide-de-Camp of the Quartermaster General, came up to me at Speed, and placed in my Hand this written Instruction:—

(Copy.)

"Immediate. (Signed) R. AIRY."

"After carefully reading the Order, I hesitated, and urged the Uselessness of such an Attack and the Dangers attending it. The Aide-de-Camp, in a most authoritative Tone, stated that they were

Lord Raglan's Orders that the Cavalry should attack immediately. I asked where? and to do what? as neither Enemy nor Guns were within Sight. He replied, in a most disrespectful but significant Manner, pointing to the further End of the Valley, 'There, my Lord, is your Enemy; there are your Guns.'

"So distinct, in my Opinion, were your written Instructions, and so positive and urgent were the Orders delivered by the Aide-de-Camp, that I felt it was imperative on me to obey; and I informed Lord Cardigan that he was to advance; and to the Objections he made, in which I entirely agreed, I replied that the Orders were from your Lordship.

"Having decided, against my Conviction, to make the Movement, I did all in my Power to render it as little perilous as possible. I formed the Light Brigade in Two Lines, and led to its Support Two Regiments of Heavy Cavalry, the Scots Greys and Royal Dragoons, only halting them when they had reached the Point from which they could protect the Retreat of the Light Cavalry, in the event of their being pursued by the Enemy, and when, having already lost many Officers and Men by the Fire from the Batteries and Fort, any further Advance would have exposed them to Destruction.

"My Lord, I considered at the Time,—I am still of the same Opinion,—that I followed the only Course open to me. As a Lieutenant General, doubtless, I have discretionary Power; but to take upon myself to disobey an Order written by my Commander in Chief within a few Minutes of its Delivery, and given from an elevated Position, commanding an entire View of all the Batteries and the Position of the Enemy, would have been nothing less than direct Disobedience of Orders, without any other Reason, than I preferred my own Opinion to that of my General, and in this Instance must have exposed me and the Cavalry to Aspersions against which it might have been difficult to have defended ourselves.

"It should be remembered that the Aide-de-Camp, well-informed of the Instructions of his General, and the Object he had in view, after first insisting on an immediate Charge, then placed himself in front of one of the leading Squadrons, when he fell the First Victim.

"I did not dare to disobey your Lordship; and it is the Opinion of every Officer of Rank in this Army to whom I have shown the written Order, that it was not possible for me to do so.

"I hope, my Lord, that I have stated the Facts temperately and in a becoming and respectful Manner, as it has been my Wish to do.

"I am confident that it will be your Desire to do me Justice. I will only ask that your Lordship should kindly give the same Publicity to this Letter that has been given to your Report, for I am sensitively anxious to satisfy my Sovereign, my Military Superiors, and the Public, that I have not on this unhappy Occasion shown myself undeserving of their Confidence or unfitting the Command which I hold.

"I have the honour to be, &c.,

"LUCAS,
Lieutenant-General, Commanding Cavalry Division.

"His Excellency the Commander of the Forces." My Lords, immediately on my arrival in this country yesterday—having written the letter on my journey, I sent my son, my side-de-camp—to the Adjutant-General at the Horse Guards, with the following communication—

" 20, Hanover Square, London, March 1.
" Sir—I have obeyed her Majesty's Command to Resign the Command of the Cavalry of the Army of the East and to Return to England. I have now the Honour to Report my arrival for the Information of the General commanding in Chief. I consider it due to my professional Honour and Character to seize the earliest moment of requesting that my Conduct in Ordering the Charge of the Light Cavalry Brigade at Balaklava on the 25th of October, and Writing the Letter I addressed to Field Marshal Lord Raglan on the 30th of November, may be Submitted to and Investigated by a Court Martial. I make this Appeal to General Lord Hardinge with the greatest Confidence, believing it to be the undoubted Privilege, if not the positive Right, of every Soldier to be allowed a Military Inquiry into his Conduct when, as in my case, he shall consider it to have been unjustly Impugned.

" LUCAN, Lieutenant-General.
" To the Adjutant-General."

My Lords, I made that appeal to the Commander in Chief with the utmost confidence, believing it to be the undoubted privilege, if not the positive right, of every soldier to be allowed a military inquiry into his conduct, when, as in my case, he shall consider it to have been unjustly stigmatised. When I asked your Lordships to permit me to read my documents, I promised not to add one word of remark or comment, nor shall I do so; but I think your Lordships will admit that under the circumstances in which I am placed I could not have done less than read the correspondence which I have now submitted for your consideration.

EARL GRANVILLE: I am quite sure that your Lordships, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, will not expect that I should offer any objection to the seeming irregularity of the statement which the noble Earl has just made. But as the noble Earl has confined himself to reading a portion only of the correspondence which has taken place with regard to the command of the cavalry division, as he has stated to the House the reasons which have induced him to take that course, and as he has purposely abstained from introducing any comments of his own upon the subject, reserving the right to do so under certain contingencies, I think the House will feel that no further conversation should take place at the present time.

DEFICIENCY BILLS.

In reply to a question from Lord MONTAGUE,

The Earl of Lucan

EARL GRANVILLE stated that the correspondence which passed between the late Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Governor of the Bank of England, respecting the issue of deficiency bills was of a private character, and in the opinion of Mr. Gladstone it would not be for the advantage of the public interests to produce it. At the same time the right hon. Gentleman personally had not the slightest objection that it should be produced. Mr. Gladstone had thought it right to leave the correspondence in the office, in order that his successors might have the information which it contained, and be at liberty to deal with the subject as they thought fit.

House adjourned to Monday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, March 2, 1855.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Ecclesiastical Property (Ireland); Secretaries and Under Secretaries of State (House of Commons); Tea Duties Decline Suspension.

FIRE ARMS FOR THE CAVALRY, &c.

MR. MAGUIRE asked the Under Secretary at War whether any steps, and, if any, what steps, had been taken by the War Department to improve the armament of the cavalry, artillery, or other troops, by providing them with a breech-loading arm?

MR. F. PEEL said, that several kinds of breech-loading weapons were under the consideration of the Ordnance, but that some time must necessarily elapse before the officers intrusted with the examination of them could recommend that any improvement should be adopted.

WANTS OF THE ARMY IN THE CRIMEA.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE asked the Under Secretary for War whether there was any objection to lay upon the table copies of any letters or despatches that had passed between Lord Raglan and the Minister for War relative to the wants of the army in the Crimea?

MR. PEEL objected to the production of portions of correspondence between Lord Raglan and the Minister at War relative to the wants of the army in the East. It ought to be left to the Government to determine at what period the correspondence should be produced; and besides, the appointment of the Committee would obviate the necessity of its production.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE: Do I understand that the hon. Gentleman objects to produce the correspondence?

CHAPLAINS IN THE ARMY—QUESTION.

COLONEL GREVILLE said, he begged to ask the Under Secretary for War whether the salaries of the chaplains attending the army in the East were fixed during the past year by a War Office regulation at 10*s.* for the Church of England, 7*s.* 6*d.* for the Presbyterian, and 5*s.* for the Roman Catholic, for the performance of their respective duties; and if so, whether it is the intention of the Government to make any alteration with a view of placing the clergy of each denomination on a footing of equality while engaged in this arduous service?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, that certain regulations were made prior to the chaplains being sent out to the East. The Presbyterian and Church of England clergymen were paid at the rate of 16*s.* per day, with rations and allowances. Some of the clergy of the Church received 100*l.*, in addition to 100*l.* paid by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. The Roman Catholic clergymen were paid at the rate of 150*l.*, in addition to the rations and allowances given to the other clergymen. The difference in amount arose in consequence of the different scale of living to which the various clergymen had been accustomed.

SERGEANTS' PENSIONS—QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary for War whether those sergeants of regiments of militia who are now pensioners from the army, and who have volunteered for foreign service, will be allowed to count that service towards increase of pension?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, the staff sergeants who were serving with the militia would receive, in addition to their pay, 1*s.* 6*d.* per day. Those who had volunteered for service in the East had been given a bounty of 3*l.*, of which 2*l.* had been paid down, and 1*l.* expended in necessaries. Those who continued in the militia for twenty years would receive a pension in the militia in addition to that for their service in the army; but their services in the Mediterranean would not be allowed to count in addition to their service in the army.

COLONEL NORTH said, they had no chance of living to that time, for they were old men at the present time.

SURGEONS FOR THE CRIMEA—THE HOSPITALS—QUESTION.

COLONEL SMYTH said, he would beg to inquire of the hon. Under Secretary of State for War, whether any arrangement has been made to send either to Scutari or to the camp in the Crimea those surgeons of militia regiments who have volunteered their services in accordance with a circular addressed to them from the War Office; or, whether any arrangements have been made to send out the civil practitioners who have offered their services?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, that a circular had been sent from the War Office to the surgeons of militia regiments, requesting to know whether they were willing to proceed to the East. That circular had not been out more than eight or ten days, and he was informed that no offers had been as yet made in answer to those circulars. With regard to the sending out of civil practitioners to the East, the head of the medical department had been authorised to procure the services of ten practitioners to serve in the army and the hospitals, and an establishment with twenty surgeons was in course of erection at Smyrna.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he wished to ask whether the Government had made any inquiry into the salubrity of Smyrna, which he believed to be the most unhealthy part of the Levant?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, in reply, that Smyrna had been represented as an unsuitable place for the establishment of a hospital; but, before its establishment, commissioners had been sent out, who reported it as favourable, and the salubrity would depend upon the interior management and arrangement of the hospital itself.

DEATH OF THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA—QUESTION.

MR. FRENCH: Sir, I trust the noble Lord at the head of the Government will excuse me for putting a question without notice. There is a rumour that Her Majesty's Government have received intelligence of the death of His Majesty the Emperor of Russia. I wish to ask if such intelligence has reached the Government.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, two telegraphic despatches have been received—one from Berlin and the other from the Hague—stating that the Emperor of Russia died in the course of this forenoon.

THE COLONIAL DEPARTMENT—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished to ask whether any successor had been appointed to the hon. Member for Bury (Mr. F. Peel), who recently held the office of Under Secretary for the Colonies—whether it was the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill with respect to the Australian constitution—and whether the Government had received any intelligence of serious disturbances having occurred in the colony of Victoria, as stated in the third edition of the morning newspapers?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that no Under Secretary for the Colonies had yet been appointed. The right hon. Gentleman was probably aware that no successor could be appointed at present, as only two Under Secretaries could sit in the House of Commons. Notice had been given of the introduction of a Bill to allow a third to sit in that House, and if the Bill should receive the sanction of Parliament, the appointment would at once take place. In reply to the second question of the right hon. Gentleman, he had to state that the Government had at present no intention of proposing any measure with reference to the Bill for creating a constitution for the Australian Colonies. The attention of his noble Friend the Member for the City of London would, however, be directed to the subject. The delay in this matter had been unavoidable, and the Government had not yet received the definite decision as to the views of the different Legislatures of Australia. With reference to the third question, all he could say was, that no official information had been received with respect to any disturbances in Victoria.

LEGISLATION FOR IRELAND.

MR. WILSON having moved that the House at its rising should adjourn until Monday next,

MR. NAPIER said, he would take that opportunity to call the attention of the House to the position in which Irish business stood, and the very great injustice which had been done, both to Ireland and her representatives, by the mode in which that business had been neglected. He had no wish to raise any imaginary feeling of injustice done towards Ireland, but he certainly considered that every effort at legislation for that country by independent Members had been most unfairly dealt with by the Government. He had before him a vast number of Bills which had been introduced at different times for the amelioration of the social and commercial condition of Ireland. The first was the Jurors Bill, brought in last Session by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Enniskillen (Mr. Whiteside). The Government at the end of the Session stopped that measure, and said they would prepare a Bill of their own on the subject. They did so, and he found that no less than three-fourths of the provisions of the Government Bill were actually taken from the measure introduced by his hon. and learned Friend. Well, that Bill had been laid on the table, and from week to week up to the present time he had waited to see it proceeded with, but he had waited in vain. Another subject of deep interest to the people of Ireland was the fisheries. Bills on that subject had been brought in during the years 1823, 1824, and 1825, and yet nothing had been done, nor did he know what were the intentions of the Government upon that highly important subject. Then came the Landlord and Tenant Bills; how had the Government acted with respect to them? Two Bills were introduced on the subject last Session, but neither of them was adopted. Those two Bills had this Session been embodied in one measure by his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Serjeant Shee): The first part of that Bill had been adopted, but the second part had been rejected. Considering the manner in which these several measures had been treated by the House and by the Government, he said—and said advisedly—that it was hopeless for the people of that country to look to Parliament for justice; he therefore appealed to all the Irish Members to rally together and insist by their combined efforts that measures which had been so carefully prepared and so long desired by the people of Ireland should become law.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he was not at all surprised at the appeal which had been made by the right hon. and learned Gentleman to the hon. Members below the gangway, in order to enlist them under his banner. It was, however, for them to consider how they would answer that appeal. But he thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman had not dealt fairly by the House in stating that Ireland was treated less well in their deliberations than any other part of the United Kingdom, and that Irish measures were neglected by the House. He thought he could honestly appeal to hon. Members as to whether the portion of time which was taken up during the last Session by Irish Members upon Irish subjects was, at least, as great as could be reasonably assigned to that part of the United Kingdom. He did not grudge it, but, if the right hon. and learned Gentleman would refresh his memory and look back to history, he would find that his complaint was neither just nor well founded. He was sure the House of Commons duly appreciated the importance of Ireland as a part of the United Kingdom; and more especially, in consequence of the circumstance of the present time, he was assured, if the attention of the House were called to any legislative improvement that could be made in the condition of that country, that there was not a Member in it disposed to treat the matter lightly, or to refuse giving due attention to whatever might be brought under the notice of Parliament to promote the interest of Ireland. With regard to the Bills to which the right hon. and learned Gentleman had referred, he had, in the first place, made it a grievous complaint that all Irish Bills had been postponed. Now, on that point, he would appeal to the candour of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and ask him whether that postponement might not fairly be attributed to the circumstances under which the Gentlemen who had been sitting on the Ministerial benches for the last month had been placed, when all the legislative functions of the House had been in a state of abeyance? It was impossible that measures of any importance could be submitted to Parliament for discussion unless the Members of the Government who were more immediately responsible for such matters were present to discuss them. He was therefore sure that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would not consider it at all unreasonable that such measures should be postponed until they had a Secretary for Ireland and the law officers for Ireland in the House ready to discuss them.

With regard to the Jury Bill, the great complaint on the part of those who originally brought in that Bill was, that the Government had pirated three-fourths of the measure and embodied it in their own Bill. Now, he thought if he had proposed a measure that had not been successful, and any other Gentleman had subsequently introduced a Bill on the same subject and had taken three-fourths of his own, he should rather be disposed to thank him for what he had done than to blame him. It would be an acknowledgment of the good judgment he had evinced in framing his Bill. Then, with regard to the Fisheries Bills, they were not brought in by the present Government, but by the right hon. Gentlemen opposite. He did not think the mere fact that such Bills had been postponed was a just ground of complaint by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, or evinced a disposition on the part of the House to treat the interests of Ireland lightly or with indifference; on the contrary, it was rather a proof that they were disposed to give a liberal consideration to every measure connected with that country, without, in the first instance, prejudging its merits. Now, with regard to the Landlord and Tenant Bill, the great complaint, as he understood, was, that the provisions of that Bill were most dexterously interwoven with those of two other Bills, one of which was and the other was not likely to pass the House, and therefore that the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Sergeant Shee), either in connivance with the Government, or actuated by some evil disposition with regard to Ireland, endeavoured to obstruct his own measure by tying it to two Bills, one of which was sure to cause the failure of the other. This, however, was a matter with which the Government had nothing to do. It would be far better for the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, and the hon. and learned Serjeant the Member for Kilkenny, to settle it between themselves, and afterwards the right hon. and learned Gentleman could come before the House and state his complaint. The Government were not responsible for any interruption of public business which had arisen from causes beyond its control, and he thought he was quite justified in asking for the forbearance of Irish Members to allow this measure to stand over until the Irish Government was properly represented in that House.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he had listened with close attention to the noble Lord, but had failed to discover the slightest argument in favour of the course adopted. His right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin never charged the House of Commons with not having attended to Irish business, for he believed there never was a body more favourably inclined to consider questions affecting the interests of Ireland. What he complained of was, that every Irish Member was kept in a state of doubt, uncertainty, and inextricable confusion with respect to what was to take place, or what the Government intended to do for Ireland. Irish Members were sometimes accused of drawing upon their imaginations, but he thought the noble Lord had drawn upon his imagination when he stated that last Session the House had been day after day occupied with the consideration of Irish measures or the discussion of Irish questions. What measures—what questions, he would ask? He knew of none which had so engrossed the attention of the House. At present, through the operation of the Incumbered Estates Court, an enormous quantity of land was daily changing hands in Ireland, but the Landlord and Tenant Bill had a retrospective clause, the effect of which would be that persons buying such estates would be liable to burdens which they did not at present contemplate; and, therefore, he thought his right hon. and learned Friend was quite justified in calling upon the Government for explanations, which, however, he was sorry he had not been able to obtain. As to his right hon. and learned Friend applying for assistance below the gangway, he thought hon. Members who occupied that position were likely to find the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) much more squeezable than Lord Derby, for when the fate of Lord Derby's Ministry depended on supporting the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny's Bill, he said he would not do so, and the fate of his Ministry was decided by that answer. It was of the last consequence to know what the Government intended to do, but, perhaps, his right hon. and learned Friend was too pressing in asking the noble Lord to explain his intentions when he, perhaps, had not yet formed them.

MR. SERJEANT SHEE said, he would, in a few words, explain the course which he had thought it right to pursue, and he must be allowed to say that he thought the noble Lord had acted very wisely in giving no answer to the hostile question of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier). He certainly was surprised that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland under Lord Derby's Government should get up in the presence of his right hon. and learned Friend and blame him (Mr. Serjeant Shee) and the Government for having sanctioned the Tenants' Compensation Bill containing retrospective clauses. The Government of Lord Derby was composed of some of the most eminent lawyers who had ever held office in this or any other country—Mr. Blackburne, Lord St. Leonards, and the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin; when it was probable they could keep their places by so doing—and after they had even permitted their Attorney General to charge those who supported the Landlord and Tenant Bill, containing retrospective clauses, with confiscation—they themselves brought in Bills containing retrospective clauses. [An hon. Member: No, no!] Did the hon. Member deny it? He would read a passage from the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin, in proof of his assertion. That right hon. and learned Gentleman would not deny it. [Mr. NAPIER was understood to say that he did not.] That admission was enough, and would save him the trouble of reading the extract which he held in his hand. Nothing could be more distinct than the recognition of retrospective compensation by the right hon. and learned Gentleman. What happened afterwards in respect of these Bills? They were referred to a Select Committee, and discussed for two or three months, and the result was that the Government of Lord Aberdeen proposed a modification of the Bill of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, providing that compensation should be limited to those improvements which were visible on the surface of the soil, and also that every tenant who made improvements should be entitled on eviction to compensation by money payment. The Bills went to the House of Lords in that shape. A correspondence then took place between the right hon. and learned Gentleman and Lord Donoughmore, and the result was, that the House of Lords passed all the Bills sent up except one, and then the right hon. and learned Gentleman endeavoured to persuade the House of Commons to pass the other Bills without it. When the noble Lord the Member for the City of London (Lord John Russell) was appealed to on the subject, he said, I intended to pass Bills which should be good for the landlord and good for the tenant; but if they send down that which is good for the landlord, and refuse to pass that which is good for the tenant, I will have nothing to do with them. What had been done during the present Session? Last Session he had proposed a Bill, founded upon one which had been frequently introduced by Mr. Sharman Crawford. That Bill was lost, and in order that he might not in future be called unreasonable, he gave notice on the last day of the Session that he should propose the adoption of the very Bills which the country had approved of. He took the Compensation Bill and the Leasing Powers Bill, and put them together. He would not allow the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin to get only one Bill passed, and that the Landlord Bill, without taking any notice of the Tenant Bill. To avoid this, he had put the two Bills together, but he had taken care that the Tenant Bill should go first, and the Landlord Bill next, on the same principle by which children were told that, if they would take their rhubarb, they should have a lump of sugar afterwards. The noble Lord at the head of the Government wanted a strong Government, but he would not have it until he had the liberal Irish party with him, and he would not have their support until he settled the Irish landed question. He hoped that the noble Lord would be able to make a unanimous and a strong Government which could settle this question at once and for ever.

MR. FRENCH said, he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down had faithfully followed the advice of the noble Lord, who had advised the Irish Members to fight out their quarrels among themselves. The hon. and learned Gentleman had made, for some unknown reason, a violent attack upon the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin, and had further attacked, or rather threatened, the noble Lord himself. He (Mr. French) did not see why the noble Lord should express surprise at the question which had been put to him, for Irish Members had always complained of the periods selected for the transaction of Irish business. Not only were Irish Bills brought forward at inconvenient times, but they were generally unintelligible. That arose from the fact that there was no person conversant with Irish law specially employed to prepare these Bills. The Lord Advocate of Scotland was assisted by a Parliamentary draughtsman well acquainted with Scotch law, and the consequence of that arrangement was that Scotch Bills were usually well received by all parties. He certainly was of opinion that Irish Members might postpone their questions until the Government representatives of that country were present, but he would submit to the noble Lord at the head of the Government whether it would not be advantageous to give the Secretary for Ireland the assistance of some person well acquainted with Irish law in the preparation of Bills connected with that country.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that some hon. Gentlemen appeared to be seeking to make political capital out of this question. He thought it was not unreasonable that Irish Members should defer their questions till the Secretary for Ireland was in his place, but it was singular to find that the Government had placed on the orders of the day an Irish Bill—the Lunatic Asylums (Ireland) Advances Bill—for second reading. That Bill should certainly stand over till the Secretary for Ireland was in the House; and, moreover, Members ought to be told when the business relating to Ireland would be taken.

Motion for the adjournment of the House until Monday, agreed to.

ARMY BEFORE SEBASTOPOL COMMITTEE.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that he rose to perform what was to him a disagreeable and a painful duty—namely, to propose to the House to make the Select Committee appointed to inquire into the condition of the army before Sebastopol a Secret Committee. In submitting this Motion to the House, he wished to make a few observations, not because he had any doubt as to the wisdom of the course which he was now recommending, but because it was one which might be open to misapprehension and misconception out of doors. As there might be some misapprehension and misconception as to what was intended, he would explain what was really meant by making the Committee a Secret Committee. According to a celebrated formulary, these were the courses which they could adopt:—They might either make it an open Committee—admitting the public as well as Members of the House—or they might exclude the public but not Members; or they might appeal to the House to make the Committee a secret one. The Members of the Committee had come to the conclusion that secrecy was requisite, but as to the mode of obtaining that object there had been some difference of opinion. The majority of the Committee considered that secrecy would be best obtained by doing it effectually, that is by shutting out, not only the public, but Members of the House. Two members of the Committee thought that the better course would be to shut out the public and to appeal to Members of the House, saying that they thought secrecy requisite, and that they hoped no hon. Members would break in upon that secrecy. The majority, on the other hand, thought that that would not be the wisest course, and he (Mr. Roebuck) had been requested to appeal to the House to make the Committee a secret one. It must be understood, in so doing, that the Committee had no intention of putting an end to all publicity. When the investigation was concluded, and when the Committee had considered the evidence, it would make a selection of such portions of the evidence as could be printed without detriment to the public service. In making this appeal to the House, the members of the Committee, and he (Mr. Roebuck) amongst the number, felt that they were appealing to the House to show confidence in their discretion. The House had submitted to them a very difficult and delicate subject of inquiry, and they wished to make the investigation not only a complete investigation, but, at the same time, to make it useful and safe for the country at large. They felt that they could not make that investigation a safe and searching one if they had not the power of keeping secret that of which they might be informed from day to day. They felt if they allowed the public to come in, every particle of the evidence given before them might be published in the newspapers as soon as it was propounded. Accusations against individuals would go forth, and answers might be given some time hence, but the individuals would necessarily remain subject to those accusations until the answers could be given. He (Mr. Roebuck) had himself considered that this was an inconvenience to which individuals must submit if the public interest required the sacrifice, but there was a still graver question behind, and really, in giving to the House their reasons for the request which the Committee now made, he felt this difficulty—that the very reasons which suggested to them the propriety of the course which they were now recommending almost precluded him from stating to the House what those reasons were. He would only shadow them forth. We were at present allied to a great Power, which was giving us assistance from day to day in prosecuting the war in which we were engaged. Now, to maintain that alliance complete, and to maintain a perfectly good understanding between the two nations, was, he was convinced, the wish of every man in that House; but to do this, and, at the same time, to give every man who came before the Committee perfect liberty to defend himself as he best might, they found to be impossible. This difficulty had pressed upon them, and in meeting it they had only to throw themselves on the consideration of the House. They asked the House to have confidence in them—to have confidence in their discretion and honesty of purpose to make this a searching inquiry, and to blink no question really submitted to them, but, at the same time, to protect the public interest. In so doing, they had thought it their duty to come to the House, and he appealed, as the humble spokesman of that Committee, who now threw themselves on the consideration of the House. He said to them, "You have delegated to us a difficult and important task; you have had such confidence in our discretion as to submit to us this very difficult inquiry; have further confidence in us; depend upon us that we intend to make the inquiry complete, and depend upon us to take the wisest course for that means." He felt himself unable really to express all that he felt upon this occasion—the difficulty of the task was so great, and the rocks around him beset his path on every side. He was not one whit inclined to question the wisdom of the House in appointing the Committee. The good that they had done was already manifested; the good that they might hereafter do would, he was sure, fully compensate for all the difficulties which they might encounter; and, if the House would concede to them the secrecy which they asked, he was sure that they should be enabled to fulfil the desire of the House, to make the inquiry searching and complete, and to propound a reform—for reform was wanting—which should result to the advantage of the whole community. They should be enabled to do that, if the House, having confidence in their prudence, would grant them the secrecy which they asked.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Committee be a Committee of Secrecy."

Lord SEYMOUR said, he wished to state, in a very few words, why he dis-sented from the present application to the House. The hon. and learned Gentleman, the Chairman of the Committee, had not, he thought, quite rightly represented the feelings of the Committee upstairs—at least, he had not quite rightly represented his (Lord Seymour's) feelings. Hon. Members might imagine, when they saw the Committee coming back immediately to the House and asking for the power of secrecy, that upon going into the Committee they had suddenly discovered some State secret of so dangerous a character, so perilous in its nature, and so alarming, that they were overwhelmed with horror at what they had discovered, and had run back therefore to the House to beg that they might be allowed to bury it in eternal silence. But, to tell the House the truth, they had nothing to conceal, for as yet they had discovered nothing. They had not seen a single witness or heard a single statement on the subject; and the House, therefore, was in exactly the same condition in which it was when the Committee was moved for. If it were now necessary to have the Committee secret, it was then equally necessary; but they were told at that time that it was the public who wanted this full inquiry, and that the whole subject was to be brought before the public. But now it seemed the inquiry was to be secret. There might, as the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield had stated, be three sorts of Committees—one open to the public as well as to Members—and he should have been glad to have adopted that course in the present case, for he thought that it was upon most occasions the preferable course. In this instance, however, it might be impossible to do that, because in the first place the room would be so overcrowded with the curious and the interested that the Committee would be impeded in their inquiry. Obviously, also, there would be reports spread about by persons over whom they had no control, which would be both unfair to individuals and inconvenient to the public service. Another course was to make it a completely Secret Committee. If that were done, questions would be asked and answers given under that plea, which would not be asked and answered if the Committee were a public one. But then it was said, that having got that information, the Committee would strike it out. Was the House aware how that was to be done? The only way in which it could be done was, by the unanimity of the Committee. Then, if a Member moved that certain words—reading them all—stand part of the evidence, a division would ensue, and they would appear upon record as part of the proceedings of the Committee, with the additional fact of a division upon them to draw attention to them. For this reason a Secret Committee must withhold its proceedings from the House. In this case such a course would not be satisfactory. Undoubtedly, the inquiry was a difficult one; but having entered into it they must proceed with it, and he thought that the best way to do so would be to take the third course—which was the ordinary one—to trust to the discretion of the Committee. He had served on many Committees when the public had been excluded and Members admitted, and he was bound to say not only that the Members had not published what had been stated in Committee, but that he had often received very great service from their presence. Were the advantages of an open inquiry to be given up for the sake of secrecy, when, in point of fact, there would be no secrecy, for in this case the evidence and the proceedings of the Committee must be laid on the table of the House? The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Roebuck) had shadowed out darkly the motives for preserving secrecy, and the shadows were so strong that he would not throw any further light upon them to deepen their shades. As regarded the public, the question resolved itself into two phases—was the public interest in the proceedings of the Committee to be sacrificed? or, if charges were made against any individual, should they be published throughout the country before any answer could be made to them? That difficulty he did not believe would be diminished, but, on the contrary, rather increased by the attempt at secrecy, and, in his opinion, that attempt would give rise to discussions out of doors, and while creating a vast amount of suspicion, would answer no good purpose whatever. The hon. and learned Gentleman had stated that all the Committee were of opinion that secrecy was requisite. Now, he did not understand that such was the case. No doubt there might be certain questions which it would be necessary to consider the propriety of putting, and answers might be made which ought not to be made, and, if such answers were made, it would of course become the duty of the Committee to consider how to dispose of them. That such should be the case resulted from the nature of the inquiry, and was evident before the Committee was voted. It was said that if Members of that House were admitted into the room they would betray the proceedings of the Committee; that he did not believe, for if it were likely that Members of that House would betray what was going on, was it not equally probable that Members of the Committee would do the same? It was only natural to ask, Quis custodiet ipsos custodes? Let the House fairly consider the case. Was there any reason to suppose that, if the Committee considered it inexpedient that their proceedings should be published in the daily press, by shutting out the Members of that House they would quite exclude the influence of the press? He did not think that it would be so, and the exclusion of Members of the House would not prevent circumstances from oozing out; and if circumstances did ooze out, although it might have occurred through the instrumentality of a witness, who, considering his evidence of importance, might give it to the newspapers, still each Member of the Committee would feel a sort of stigma upon him, and would feel humiliated that the proceedings of a Committee which had been enjoined to secrecy should obtain publicity. In his opinion, the best course to adopt would not be to attempt the introduction of secrecy. He had looked back to authorities for Secret Committees, and had found that very few had proved satisfactory. Committees upon banking or upon commercial matters were of a different nature, because there was not the same public anxiety for immediate information as existed in this case. He would only add that if the House should decide upon this being a Secret Committee the responsibility would rest with them, for, for his part, he did not think that any benefit or advantage would arise from adopting that course. It would lead to questions being put which would not otherwise be put, and in that respect would be injurious. If, however, the House of Commons should think otherwise, he could only state that he was prepared to do his best to carry on a searching inquiry, and his energy should be devoted to the task as completely, i the Committee were a Secret, as if it were only a Select Committee.

Mr. WILSON PATTEN said, he wished to express to the House the feeling he entertained upon this subject. Several Members of that House had, like himself, when the hon. and learned Gentleman brought forward his Motion, opposed that Motion, not more upon grounds founded upon their opinions with regard to it than because they foresaw the difficulties which would inevitably arise if the House of Commons acceded to the appointment of the Committee. To many hon. Members it was obvious that such a Committee could not proceed one step without encountering great difficulties, and the result had proved that, on the very first day after the House had granted that Committee, it had become involved in difficulty. The noble Lord (Lord Seymour) had pointed out some of those difficulties, but he had not stated the case as he (Mr. W. Patten) considered that it ought to be submitted to the House, and he had made a mistake as to what would be the nature of the inquiry. He (Mr. W. Patten) had had the honour of serving on a Secret Committee some years back, and he thought that it was very necessary that every Member should know how the proceedings of a Secret Committee were conducted. He quite agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) that if the House granted a Secret Committee it ought to place the highest confidence in the judgment and discretion of the members of that Committee; no other course could be pursued: but in the present instance there was at once this dilemma, from which it was impossible to escape, that motives of public policy might require one course of conduct to be adopted, while absolute justice to individuals might require a completely contrary course. He would take as an example one particular case—that of the Duke of Newcastle—and he would take that case because the vote of that House had peculiar reference to that noble Duke. Whatever might be the feeling in that House with regard to the vote at which it had arrived on the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, the feeling out of doors undoubtedly was that that vote was a direct censure upon the Duke of Newcastle. [“No, no!”] Why, several hon. Members, in the course of that debate, had absolutely avowed that they looked upon the Motion as a vote of can-sure on the Government. Well, then, he would assume that it was a vote of censure on the Government; but it was the Duke of Newcastle who had the conduct of that branch of the public service which was chiefly under discussion, and must therefore be considered to occupy a prominent position as regarded that vote of censure. The noble Duke had accepted that vote as a vote of censure, and had in consequence resigned the office which he held, and in so doing he acted in accordance with what was the general opinion of the public. Well, the House had appointed a Committee to inquire into the conduct of the Government in supplying the army in the Crimea, and the conduct of the Duke of Newcastle, even in an inquiry into the subject of transports, must necessarily be more or less implicated. Questions might be put to him implying charges from which he might think it to be his duty to defend himself by any statement which it might be in his power to make, but then the Committee, if it were secret, would have to decide whether they would report to the House or suppress the statements which the noble Duke might consider it necessary to make in his defence. He did not wish to say one word against any member of that Committee. It appeared to him to be composed of gentlemen of high talent and experience, but he held in his hand a list of the members of that Committee who sat on the first day, and he found that of the nine who had supported this application for secrecy five had voted in favour of the Motion for censuring the Government; and when it came to be a question as to whether the answers of any persons implicated should be published, that question might be decided by those members, and would, as such might be the case, the Report of the Committee be received with perfect confidence by the House and by the country? That was a difficulty which ought to have been foreseen, and he might say that he had never heard a debate in which the arguments were so entirely on one side as in the debate upon the Motion for the appointment of this Committee. There was a course which the House might have taken, and which generally was taken when difficulties like those now apprehended were involved in an inquiry. In such a case the House generally defined as minutely as it could what the objects of inquiry were, so as to keep the Committee strictly within bounds. Now, if the object of this investigation was really to ascertain how the transport service and the supply of necessities to the army had been conducted, there would have been no great difficulty in defining it, with a view to avoid the great dangers which had been shadowed forth. That course, however, had not been pursued, and the House must now decide for itself upon the question submitted to it. His vote would depend upon the arguments which might be addressed to the House upon the subject, his object in rising having been simply to point out that the greatest injustice might be done to individual character, which might possibly be shipwrecked while the Committee was pursuing this inquiry.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I have the honour, Sir, of being a Member of this Committee, and, as I am a party to the application now made to the House, I wish to state shortly what are my views upon the subject. The hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lancashire has stated that this Committee is viewed as an attack upon the Duke of Newcastle.

MR. WILSON PATTEN: No, no! Those words certainly did escape my lips, but I corrected myself, and said that the vote of inquiry was viewed by many Members as a direct censure upon the Government, of which the Duke of Newcastle was the most prominent Member as far as the conduct of the war was concerned.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I am very glad the hon. Gentleman has retracted his original statement. For my part, I disclaim now, as I have before disclaimed, any intention of attacking any individual. But the speech of the hon. Gentleman has not been one addressed to the question now before us, as to whether this shall be a Secret Committee, but, on the contrary, was a speech confined entirely to a discussion of the propriety of the vote come to by the House for the appointment of this Committee. The noble Lord the Member for Totness (Lord Seymour) tells us that the application of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield is not founded on any State secret that has come before the Committee, and with regard to which secrecy is desirable. Now, that statement seems to me quite superfluous. We have discovered nothing new, indeed, for the very simple reason that we have not yet commenced our inquiries; but the first step we had to take was to consider, as it is ordinarily called, the proceedings of the Committee; and when we began to consider what those proceedings were to be,

we were all of us (including, I think, even the noble Lord and the right hon. Gentleman opposite) deeply conscious of the responsibility under which we laboured in the discharge of the duty confided to us. It was upon a full consideration of this responsibility that we came to a decision, which I think I may say was also unanimous, that the public ought to be excluded from our proceedings. So far we were quite unanimous. The question now before us seems to me to be whether the House of Commons does or does not adhere to the opinion expressed by so large a majority, that this inquiry ought to be a complete and a searching inquiry. The opinion of the majority of the Committee is that we could not do our duty to the public, that we could not make this inquiry a searching one, that we could not conduct the investigation in a manner which would enable us hereafter to make such a Report as the House and the country had a right to expect, if the public were admitted, or if, in fact, the Committee were not made a Secret Committee. The House has confided to us a most difficult and responsible duty. It is a duty which we are willing to undertake, but we are only willing to undertake it upon terms which will enable us to discharge it satisfactorily. There are two requisites to secure that object which we are bound to consider. The first is, that this inquiry, delicate and difficult from reasons which the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield has alluded to, should be conducted with due care, circumspection, and prudence; the second is, that it should be a complete and searching investigation. Now, I submit to the House, as the opinion of the large majority of the Committee, that we cannot comply with these two conditions unless this is a secret inquiry, and unless we prevent the insertion, from day to day in the public papers, of selected portions of our proceedings, together with those comments upon the evidence which would be the inevitable result of such publicity. Upon this point, I repeat, the Committee are unanimous. There, then, arises the question which has been stated by the noble Lord (Lord Seymour), whether we are to exclude from our deliberations both the public and Members of this House. Now, where were the noble Lord's arguments upon this point? He says, if I understood him rightly, that if this is to be a secret Committee in that sense, we shall be led into a line of examination in which we should not otherwise indulge.

Sir J. Pakington

Whatever confidence, therefore, the House may feel disposed to place in the Members of the Committee, it is clear the noble Lord does not share that confidence. For my part, I can imagine no reason—and the noble Lord has certainly stated none—why, if this is to be a Secret Committee the line of examination should not be the same as that they would pursue under other circumstances. Then, again, the noble Lord has told us that, supposing the inquiry to be a secret one, we shall still be unable to prevent the public from becoming aware of our proceedings, because nothing can be expunged from those proceedings except upon motions to that effect, and after divisions thereupon, which motions and divisions would be duly recorded, so that in one way or another the objectionable matter, whatever it might be, would be eventually brought before the public. Now in this I believe him to be entirely mistaken, for the Committee, it seems to me, would have absolute discretion as to what part of the evidence they would lay before the House, and absolute power to deal as they thought fit with such portions of that evidence as, with a due regard to individuals or other delicate considerations, they might consider it desirable should not be made public. So far, however, as my vote in the Committee has been given, and so far as it will be given in this House, I have not the least intention of suppressing the evidence that may be taken before the Committee. On the contrary, I think it desirable that the evidence should be published, and my chief reason for urging the House to place confidence in this Committee, and to enable us to conduct our inquiry in such a manner as the justice of the case requires, is that we must inevitably touch upon matters of very grave importance. The feeling of the country and the feeling of the army has demanded this inquiry; the House of Commons has granted it; and it will depend upon the gentlemen by whom the investigation is conducted to take care that the public interest shall receive no injury, and that injustice be not inflicted upon individuals whose conduct must be canvassed before us. Now, I have no reason to distrust the discretion of hon. Members, but I submit that it may not be always desirable that Members of this House should have an indiscriminate right in any numbers, and at all times, to attend the investigations of this Committee. I know that occasions have arisen upon such Committees when a wish has been expressed that those hon. Gentlemen who were not Members should retire, and when that wish has been disregarded. I hope, therefore, the House will take these facts into their consideration, and that they will come to the conclusion that the evidence taken before this Committee shall not be made known before our investigations are complete and our Report is drawn up. This, as I have previously said, is the strong feeling of a majority of the Committee, and I cannot help hoping that, knowing this, the House will so far place confidence in the Committee as to concede what they desire.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM: Sir, on a former occasion the House was so indulgent as to listen with patience to many reasons which I thought it proper then to adduce against the progress of this inquiry; but the country having loudly demanded an inquiry, and this House, the representative of the public, having appointed a Committee to prosecute that inquiry, I bow to their decision, and it would ill become me to repeat or to refer to arguments which, at the right time, I offered in vain. I think rather that, occupying again a private station, it becomes me, as taking part in this deliberative Assembly, if difficulties have arisen, and if there should be any degree of danger in this inquiry, to offer my opinion freely as to the best mode of avoiding these dangers, and of conducting the inquiry upon which the House has determined. I therefore shall abstain from any further reference to the former debate, or to any of the arguments which I then used. It does appear, certainly, somewhat extraordinary that at the very first meeting of this Committee, composed only of eleven Members, of whom nine were present, and in whom the House has been called upon to place implicit confidence, a great difference of opinion should have arisen among them. So great is the difference of opinion that already a division has arisen among the Members composing the Committee. Upon the very threshold of the inquiry, on the very day the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Roebuck) is voted into the chair, the Committee find themselves involved in such very great difficulties that really, in spite of all that has been said, it now becomes the duty of this House to rescue the inquiry from the disgrace of falling into the hands of a hole-and-corner Committee. Now, it is not a bare Report with which the House has been presented. Though terse, it is very pointed, and contains the reasons which have induced a majority of the Committee to make their recommendation to the House. It says that, in the opinion of the Committee, the objects of the inquiry will be best attained, injustice to individuals will be best prevented, and the public interests will be most surely protected, if the Committee be made a Secret Committee. Secrecy, in the opinion of the majority of the Members of the Committee, is the sure mode of prosecuting the inquiry in the most safe manner, of best protecting the public interests, and of most surely avoiding injustice to individuals. Now, Sir, with all respect for the opinion of the majority of that Committee, I demur to all their three reasons. I know that if this inquiry is to be prosecuted—and it is quite right that I should now assume that it is to be prosecuted—the public interest will best be promoted, the inquiry will best be conducted, and injury and injustice to individuals will be most surely prevented by the Committee not seeking the shelter of secrecy, but conducting the inquiry openly before the world. I stated on a former occasion—and I may just refer to it in passing, as I wish to guard myself against misapprehension—that I could not shut my eyes to the very considerable danger which would attend even publicity; but I know no ground, except the discretion of the Members of the Committee, why the inquiry should not be conducted under the eye of the public, for where danger to the public interests begins there the inquiry as conducted by them ought to terminate. That is the limit which ought to be fixed to the inquiry, and beyond which the public ought not to demand it to be pushed. With respect to precedents, I will not touch upon the ground taken by my right hon. Friend the Member for Midhurst (Mr. Walpole), further than to observe that all the precedents upon which he relies, if I mistake not, relate to great naval and military operations, which had been brought to a close before an inquiry was instituted. Certainly, with reference to these precedents, I do not remember that my right hon. Friend cited one in which a Committee of secrecy was appointed. The last inquiry was an inquiry at the bar of this House, in a public manner, at the close of the Walcheren expedition, into the conduct of that expedition. There was, certainly, attending that Committee of inquiry a Committee of secrecy, but it had no reference to the conduct of the officers employed, being merely a communication on the part of the Government of certain information which it was not thought expedient to lay before the public. In fact, this information formed no integral part of the inquiry, but was merely an appendage to it. Now, I must shortly remark to the House that it is important they should observe how different has been the view taken in the House of the composition of the Committee. By several majorities, and those narrow ones, the naval element has been excluded. Nothing could be more fair and honourable than the statement of the Chairman of the Committee as to the mode adopted with reference to the inquiry. The matter has been studiously and carefully balanced—balanced with reference to party, and balanced by agreement. Last night, by a small majority—I believe it is not irregular for me to name an hon. Member in reference to the appointment of a Committee of this kind—last night Sir John Hanmer was chosen, and he will probably form the pivot on which the inquiry may be said to turn. The hon. Member is selected as the makeweight in this Committee, holding, as it were, the balance of ingredients so compounded and so neutralised, that reason, truth, and justice are almost suspended. It is, therefore, of the very highest importance that we should take care that the sacred cause of truth and justice is not injured by an inquiry conducted by a Committee so composed. Nothing can be more true than what was stated by the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, as to the rule of this House with respect to Secret Committees. If this House adopts the Report of the Committee, and gives its fiat to secrecy, its whole power and control over the future conduct of the inquiry are gone, and gone for ever. There can be no appeal to this House on the part of any Member composing the Committee—there can be no Report except by the concurrence of the majority of this Committee of eleven. What was said by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Pakington) is most true, with regard to these proceedings. I have great faith in publicity, as the great check where the cause of justice is at stake—and why is any tribunal here involving the conduct of public men, the character of admirals, of generals, and of statesmen, to be conducted on principles different to those which prevail in our courts of law? In our courts of law—life and property—and what are dearer than life and property—namely, the character and position of men in society, daily become the subject of investigation before our tribunals, and it is the life and spirit and the very soul of justice that publicity shall pervade and check all these proceedings. The sacred cause of justice itself is promoted by it. Bystanders constantly afford the means of contradicting false evidence, or suggest the means wanting to complete evidence. This tends to promote the cause of truth and justice and, if the same principle be adopted in a Committee of this kind, I am convinced it will have the same effect. I believe the object of the Committee is, to satisfy the desire of the public, that an investigation should take place. I believe that that desire on the part of the public is an honest desire to have the truth ascertained with a view of correctives being applied to mal-administration, and I do not believe that there is anything whatever vindictive in that desire. Perhaps the House will pardon me, if I say that we, the representatives of the people, acting upon the desire of the public, are influenced by somewhat different motives. Party feelings and party objects have mingled in our discussions in reference to this subject. It is impossible to deny it. It is patent on every side; the existence of those feelings, swaying even the judgment of the most honest men, will interfere, unless you take due precautions, with the justice of the investigation, and I know no check so strong as that the name of every person who puts a question shall be known to the public. His motives will be well understood, his words will be well weighed, and thus the salutary check of public opinion will be brought to bear upon the inquiry. I also conceive that the inquiry itself will be infinitely more guarded when every witness knows that what he says before the Committee is certain to be subject to the ordeal of publicity and the consequent ordeal of public opinion. Well, then, what is the assertion made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington). He has reminded you, and he has reminded you rightly, that, if you make this a Secret Committee, your power over the inquiry is gone, and it will depend entirely on the vote of a majority of that Committee—perhaps upon the vote of the one Member nominated last night—whether any questions that may be thought inconsistent with the secrecy required shall be expunged and altogether omitted. Indeed, I know no reason, if such injustice should sway a majority of the Committee

why even extracts from the answers of a witness may not be given. The power of this House, Sir, in the matter will be gone, and it will depend upon the Committee whether they report the evidence at all, or whether they merely report the result produced on the minds of the majority of their body. Nay, even the proceedings of the Committee need not be reported to the House. You need not know who voted in favour of the Report, whatever it may be. It may be the report of only a single Member, and yet it will carry with it all the authority of a Report of this House. I am well aware that implicit reliance is to be placed on the honour of Members of this House. If the House decrees that the Committee is to be secret, I do not believe that intentionally any member composing that Committee will betray the secrets which pass in the Committee. But still, even if they keep a constant guard on all they say in public and among their friends, it must be remembered that witnesses will be examined over whom they can have no such control. The witnesses will easily ascertain, from the questions put to them, what is the tendency of the inquiry, and what are the feelings of the persons who question them, and they, not being placed immediately under your control, will infallibly disclose the proceedings of the Committee. Now, Sir, my belief is, that between No. 17 upstairs and Printing House Square a whispering-gallery will be established, which, day by day, will disclose to the public, in a manner that I think most exceptionable—namely, partially and imperfectly, what takes place before your Committee of secrecy. Now, Sir, I have an affection and a desire to maintain the character and the position of this House stronger than any other feeling which actuates me. That mace—that “bauble”—[pointing to the mace upon the clerk's table]—contended against the sceptre of the Stuarts and overcame it. In my time the Reform Bill was carried by a majority of this House, despite the opposition of a majority of the House of Lords. Now, Sir, I entreat this House well to weigh the consequences of a conflict with the press of this country. If the House embarks in that conflict—[“Oh, oh!”]—I have before said that, with the permission of the House, I would express my opinion as a private gentleman in a deliberative assembly, amid great public difficulties, and that I would warn the House of what occurred to me as dangers to be avoided. Now, Sir, what I wish to say is this—that if this House does give an order of secrecy, and if that order of secrecy is constantly and deliberately violated, you will be lowered in public estimation if you have not the courage and the constancy to give effect to your decision. But, if you are going to enter into a conflict with the press of this country, you must gird up your loins and prepare for a serious struggle; and I warn you, that in that conflict you will not succeed unless you are backed by public opinion. My belief is that, if you engage in such a conflict, as matters now stand, you will not succeed. I will say more—that I think you ought not to succeed, because I believe that the public interests will not be promoted by your order of secrecy. Public opinion will be grossly violated by it, and justice to individuals will be placed in the utmost jeopardy. I have told you of the danger of your entering into an encounter with the press, without reason or justice on your side, and in violation of public opinion; but is there no other danger to be avoided? Have you considered your relative position with reference to the House of Lords? The House of Lords have, I believe, notified to you—at least, I saw the messenger here just now, though I am not aware whether his message has been delivered—that they have given their consent that one of their body shall attend the Select Committee of this House, if he should think fit to do so. You change the character of your tribunal. You convert it into a secret tribunal. Are you sure that the House of Lords will consent that one of their Members shall attend a secret tribunal? Your Committee now becomes, not a court of justice, not a court of inquiry, but an inquisition, composed of eleven inquisitors, five of whom have prejudged the question which will be mainly at issue before them. I know not what the decision of the House of Lords may be, but I warn you how you come into conflict with the press of this country and with the privilege of the House of Lords in such doubtful circumstances; depend upon it your position will be an unavoidable one. I could, if I thought fit to detain you, multiply instances of many coming dangers which I foresee from your proceedings; but I think the two which I have mentioned incidentally, as lying on the very surface, are enough to warn you to be cautious in the proceedings you are about to take. If Ministers, admirals, generals, are to be tried—if their conduct is to be submitted to this ordeal—if further sacrifices be necessary—immolate, I say, in the face of day. Do not smother and stifle persons' reputations, which have hitherto stood the test of time, in No. 17 upstairs. Act as become the representatives of a free and generous people, who never seek concealment for their thoughts or for their actions. What they dare to do they are ever ready to avow. There are, perhaps, dangers in this inquiry. I shall not revert to them. I stated them at too much length on a former occasion. I am willing to intrust the inquiry to the eleven gentlemen to whom you have committed it, if you will keep over that Committee the convenient check of publicity. I shall look upon that inquiry with apprehension greater than I shall state if you should, in an ill-omened moment, come to the decision to-night that the proceedings of that Committee shall be secret. In that case I see dangers innumerable; I think the object for which the Committee was granted will not be obtained; and I entreat the House carefully to pause before they give effect to what I must consider a most injudicious recommendation.

MR. LAYARD said that, when the question of the appointment of a Committee was brought before the House, he had felt it his duty to express his opinion that it would give rise to great inconvenience, and would shackle the Executive. The appointment of the Committee, as was well known, was carried by a large majority, and the Government themselves stated that they would accept that vote as a vote of confidence or no confidence. The House was, therefore, obliged to deal with the question as it was placed by the Government, putting aside its merits. Upon that vote the Government went out of office. If the question had been brought forward since the present Government had been in office, and if they had placed it on the ground of a vote of confidence, he would have felt little difficulty in determining in what way he should give his vote, for he could not say that either the House or the country felt much confidence in the existing Administration. He had entertained objections to the appointment of the Committee, because he did not think that the Executive Government could be carried on by men whose conduct was under criticism in a Committee room upstairs; but that objection had been removed by the retirement from the Administration of those members of the Government whose conduct had been impugned. The House having decided that inquiry should be prosecuted by a Committee, was his duty to ascertain in what way the inquiry could be conducted with the greatest advantage to the public interests, and in a manner to secure the results which were expected by the country. He had been somewhat astonished to find that the two hon. Members of the Committee who had voted against the secrecy of the inquiry, were Gentlemen who had voted against any inquiry at all, and that, to on the ground that the appointment of such a Committee would be a mischievous and dangerous proceeding. He supposed however, that they had some reasons for thus ostentatiously showing the country that they were now voting against secrecy. He was still more astonished at the line of argument pursued by the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham) and some other hon. Members. The noble Member for Totnes (Lord Seymour) had asked whether any new facts had come to their knowledge. He (Mr. Layard) would at once reply, that new facts had come to their knowledge. The three right hon. Gentlemen near him had stated the other night that, if they were put upon their defence, that if this inquiry were prosecuted, they might be compelled to enter into very delicate matters, and to call in question the conduct of our Ally. They then expressed a strong opinion against the appointment of the Committee, but to-night, forsooth, the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham) contended that the Committee should be an open Committee, and that all dangerous questions might be avoided, although it was only the other night that he told them they would have to enter into transactions which had taken place between the Government of this country and our Allies. One objection to the inquiry being an open one was, that it might affect private character, and that was, undoubtedly, a strong objection; but still that was not the objection which would influence his vote, for he looked rather to the question of danger to the public interests in connection with our relations with our Allies. It was said that secrecy was a novelty, but so was our alliance and union with France—the union of the two armies in one great enterprise was a novelty. There were three courses open to them. The first was, to prosecute the inquiry by a Committee open to the public. What was the objection to that course, putting aside any question with reference to private character? They talked about private character, but was our Ally to be criminated, either directly or indirectly, without having an opportunity of defending himself? A right hon. Gentleman had insinuated that we were not the guilty parties; he did not mean to say the right hon. Gentleman would throw blame on our Ally, but that was the inference which must be drawn, and we should then be in the position of carrying on the inquiry, our Ally not having the means of defending himself, without knowing to what mischief it might lead. These being his objections to an open Committee, they applied equally to a Committee at which the Members of this House would be allowed to be present. The country would not consent to a half-and-half measure; they would either have one thing or the other. This was a great question; it affected every man in the country; there was not a cottager who did not feel as deeply upon it as any Member of that House, and the public would not be satisfied if they were excluded when Members of Parliament were admitted. He wished to make no insinuation against any Member of that House, but he would remind them that Committees had sat before now to which Members alone had been admitted. Such a Committee sat last year, seriously affecting the character of some Members of the House, and what was the result? Why, the most scandalous accusations were spread abroad against those gentlemen whose conduct was the subject of inquiry. Would the right hon. Gentleman make no distinction between eleven Members, who were directly responsible to the House, and 600 Members, any of whom might come into the room, and who were under no responsibility at all? If the Committee were strictly secret, of course if anything transpired they would know exactly the persons who were accountable for it. Then, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham), said the press would be against us; but he must say that was an appeal to a popular prejudice which the right hon. Gentleman ought to have avoided. His hon. and learned Friend had given notice of this Resolution last night, and, if the press had been so opposed to it, would not the press have spoken out upon the subject this morning, before the House could come to a decision? If the press took so deep an interest in the question—if it attached such importance to the inquiry being an open one—would not an expression of its opinion have appeared this morning in every newspaper? Would not a strong appeal have been made to the public, such as the leading papers knew how to make? Would not an appeal have been made to that House to reject the Resolution? But no such appeal had been made, and he regretted that the right hon. Gentleman was trying to get up a feeling upon the question for party purposes. The press had too high a sense of the immense interests at stake in this question, to cry out after a majority of the Committee had decided that it should be a Secret Committee; it had too deep a feeling of responsibility to compel the House by public clamour to adopt a measure dangerous to the public interest. The character of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Roebuck), who had for so many years been connected with the popular party, was sufficiently well known to be a guarantee to the public that the Resolution of the Committee had not been adopted upon light motives. No man had more to lose than himself (Mr. Layard) by having voted in its favour; but he would not be a coward. When he saw that an act of duty was necessary, he would perform it, and he firmly believed it was essential to the interests of the country that this should not be an open Committee. The right hon. Gentleman had repeatedly told them that they must rest their defence upon the conduct of our Ally; the right hon. Baronet has also used the expression that the inquiry must "run up" into our connection with France. If that were so, our Ally must either rest under the accusations made against him, although they might be calumnious, or the right hon. Gentlemen must be refused the means of justifying themselves, should the inquiry be an open one. He had, therefore, with great regret, and after mature deliberation, being fully aware of the ingenious arguments which might be urged by the right hon. Gentleman, who, he knew, would take the opportunity, if possible, to damage his character in the eyes of the country, arrived at this conclusion, but nothing would compel him to withdraw from the opinion he had formed. He had now stated his motives for voting in favour of the Resolution; he did not regret having voted for it, and he thought it his duty to stand by that Resolution.

MR. H. HERBERT said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down appeared to him to have exemplified, by a circumstance that happened during his late visit to the Crimea, the absolute necessity of having this inquiry a public one. If he recollects aright there appeared in the papers an accusation by the hon. Gentleman the most galling and the most offensive that could be made by any one man against a gallant Admiral employed by this country. If he recollects aright, though, perhaps, he might be partially mistaken, there appeared to be a certain amount of mystery over the whole transaction; but it appeared an accusation was made by the hon. Gentleman against a gallant Admiral in our service, and he believed he made that accusation on the ground of having seen some letter, which letter he believed was made public, on which he put a construction which he thought justified him in making the accusation. Thanks to the publicity given to that letter by the press, the statement of the hon. Member went abroad, and it met the eye of the gallant Admiral who was accused, who immediately gave notice that he would have this accusation fully and publicly canvassed, so as to enable him to give it a full and public contradiction. Now, what was the result? It appeared that there were some other letters which had not been published, but there was published what appeared to him to be a retraction and an apology by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Aylesbury. Now let them apply that to this case. Might there not be some other letters, some other evidence that might be produced before the Secret Committee which would bring Members to come to a conclusion equally erroneous, but which the parties could not, in consequence of that secrecy, have an opportunity of contradicting. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir J. Pakington) had stated that the people of this country and the army had demanded an inquiry. He should not stop to ask whether the army had demanded the inquiry, but of this he was certain that that gallant body of men would scout the idea of an inquiry into their case being made in secret, and of accusations being made in secret, however beneficial the result of the inquiry might be to themselves. If he had the high honour of being connected with any public office, with any command of the army or navy, he certainly should refuse to give a single answer to any question put to him by a Select Committee. He would throw himself on the generosity of the country; he would appeal to his countrymen, and he believed the appeal would not be in vain.

MR. LAYARD: I hope, Sir, I may be allowed to trespass for a few moments upon the time of the House after what I have fallen from the hon. Gentleman, and I appeal to the House to say whether it was good taste on the part of the hon. Gentleman to introduce a subject perfectly irrelevant to the question under discussion, especially after I had done all in the matter to which he referred that, as an honourable man and a gentleman, I could do? The circumstances to which he alluded have been so misrepresented—for I have allowed myself to be made the victim of misrepresentation rather than bring the case before the public—that I entreat the House to allow me to tell them exactly how matters stand, at least so far as I am personally concerned. First of all there was no letter whatever from me in the public press, dated "from the main-top of the Agamemnon. But there was a letter written from the Agamemnon, the ship in which I was then staying. Now what was the history of that letter? I had been travelling with a gentleman for nearly six weeks, and consequently living with him upon terms of the greatest intimacy. When he left me, a few days before the battle of the Alma, I agreed to write him an account of what was passing, as a friend, not as a gentleman connected with the press, although he was certainly connected with the press, but with that portion of it with which I had before been, if not upon hostile, at least not upon very friendly terms. For that gentleman I have the greatest personal esteem, and I entirely separated him from his profession. I wrote him two letters, which were sent by the same post—one of them containing various facts which might have been published by any one. At the end of it I added a short sentence to the effect "That he was at liberty to make use of the facts, but not to print the letter in full." There was no reflection whatever in that letter upon the character of Admiral Dundas. But there was a private letter attached to it—a letter most strictly private, most strictly confidential—in which those remarks were made that gave offence to the gallant Admiral. I have been unjustly accused of having betrayed confidence in making these remarks; but supposing even that I had intended them for publication, how far could that accusation be justified? What was their history? A captain in Her Majesty's Navy brought a letter to a table at which were present fifteen or twenty persons, civilians as well as gentlemen belonging to the navy. That letter was read publicly, and it contained an expression which led me to say in my private letter, that Admiral Dundas was rejoiced at the sinking of part of the Russian fleet. My letter was unfortunately published. The moment I heard of the publication of this letter I went to Admiral Lyons, at whose table Admiral Dundas's letter had been publicly read, and explained the circumstances to him. I also went to the gallant captain to whom Admiral Dundas's letter had been written, and said, "This is a most unfortunate thing, and I am ready to offer you an ample apology. I am not responsible for the publication of a private letter, and can only regret that a letter should be published which was not intended for publication." That apology—apology I will not call it, but that explanation—was accepted by that gallant captain. With Admiral Dundas I had no communication, as he was absent at sea, although I sent a message to him. When I came back to this country I was perfectly willing to do what I have since done. When an hon. Member opposite (Admiral Walcott) declared some time ago that I had accused a British Admiral of want of personal courage, I was taken aback. So little did I believe that anything I had said reflected on the private character or personal courage of Admiral Dundas, that such an interpretation did not strike me as being possible. Sir, I would not accuse any Englishman, much more an officer of Her Majesty's navy or army, of a want of personal courage. Why, good God! from the highest to the lowest, every man in the navy is ready to display the highest personal courage. I was told afterwards that such an interpretation was attached to what I had written, but all I can say is, that I never meant to insinuate anything of the kind. Sir, I repeat that, so little did I conceive that such a construction was possible to be attached to what I had written, that it did not occur to me to do what I have been ready to do at any time since the matter was pointed out to me, namely, to give the fullest explanation here in my power on that point. However, various reports were circulated that some legal or other proceedings were going to be taken against me; and what was the course I took? I told the hon. Member (Mr. Drummond), who acted as Admiral Dundas's friend, that I was ready to give any explanation with regard to those words which had been construed into a reflection upon Admiral Dundas's personal courage or character, and that I would explain what I have now stated in any way he liked. Well, the moment the hon. Gentleman came to me I said, "I do not want any lawyer-like dealing. I hope Admiral Dundas is an honourable man, and that I am an honourable man. Let us take a pen and ink, and whatever you dictate to me as a man of honour I will sign." I had no wish to shelter myself under the plea that the letter was a private one. Well, I sat down and wrote at my hon. Friend's dictation the explanation which has been published. I said, "Take it, and say I was ready at first to do what I have done now." Admiral Dundas explained that he had said he rejoiced at the sinking of the Russian fleet, because the Russians had spared us the trouble of doing that which we were ready to do for them. I was willing to accept that interpretation of Admiral Dundas. [Mr. DRUMMOND: The word "rejoice" was not in the original letter.] Well, that was the construction I put upon it. I accepted that interpretation, and wrote the letter that has appeared. I did then hope that no hon. Gentleman in this House would have taunted me any further on this subject. I may have shown some indiscretion in writing the passage in question in a private letter to a private friend, but I hope the House will believe that I have acted throughout strictly as an honourable man and a gentleman.

MR. H. HERBERT said, he must beg to state, in explanation, that he did not mean to attack the hon. Member for Aylesbury; and if he had spoken warmly, it was out of regard to the gallant Admiral, his friend. He had only referred to the matter as illustrating the danger of such an inquiry as that before the Select Committee being conducted with privacy.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, he would confine himself to the subject under discussion, but he thought it a good opportunity to revert to the vote they gave on a former occasion, and which led to the appointment of this Committee. He was one of those who, without hesitation, voted against the inquiry, as proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Roebuck). Now, that Motion was supported by the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Layard). He (Sir B. Hall) felt that if the Committee was appointed it might lead to most serious and disastrous results, and might, perhaps, cause a disruption between ourselves and our only Ally, or rather, perhaps, our only sincere Ally. The hon. Member for Aylesbury said when he voted for the Committee he knew great inconvenience would arise from it, and that he did not vote for it as a vote of want of confidence in the Government, but the whole tenor of his speech was a vote of want of confidence in the Government, and he intimated that he never intended the Committee to be appointed. He (Sir B. Hall) considered this was one of the most disastrous votes ever given. If the House did not want the Committee, and had not confidence in the Government, why had they not the honesty and the candour at once to propose a vote of want of confidence? Instead of that they voted a Committee, and then said they would not let the public in to hear the proceedings. This was a proceeding which was not worthy of that House. He was thankful day after day that he had not voted for the Committee. Well, hon. Gentlemen said they never intended to have this inquiry; and his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe), who was very fond of a little good-humoured mischief in that House, tackled the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, and said, "Do you really mean to have this Committee, or is it a delusion?"—and the hon. and learned Gentleman said, "I do mean to have the Committee;" and if any one cheered him more loudly than another, it was the hon. Member for Aylesbury. [Mr. LAYARD: No, no!] The hon. Gentleman said "no;" then why did he vote for the Committee? What the hon. Gentleman proposed now was to have it a Secret Committee. He objected to the proposal to have the Committee a secret one; and when the right hon. Baronet the late First Lord of the Admiralty stated that it would be difficult to keep the proceedings from the public press, and said very truly that the press exerted a great moral influence in the country, and that it was unadvisable to interfere rashly with that moral influence, he was certainly surprised to hear the hon. Member for Aylesbury characterise the power of the press as a "popular prejudice." Who was there in that House who indulged more in that popular prejudice than the hon. Member himself? But the House had lately received a message from the House of Lords —and the right hon. Baronet (Sir Graham) had previously alluded to the fact—to the effect that a person holding the highest rank in this country would be called before the Committee. If he (S. B. Hall) were placed in the position of the Duke of Newcastle, and if he had given his consent to appear before a Select Committee, and was afterwards informed that it was to be a Secret Committee, he would at once rise in his place and say that he would not go before that Committee and allow five or six Gentlemen to extract from his evidence whatever they might please, and place it before the House, perhaps in a very different light from that in which it should appear according to the tenor of the whole evidence. It was impossible to say what might happen as regarded the character of that noble Duke. Why was he to be called before the Committee, except in order that he might tell the whole truth as regarded the conduct of this war when he was Secretary of State for the War Department? That noble Duke might feel it his duty to give such evidence in order to exculpate himself as might place the blame very properly upon other shoulders than his own. Why, then, should his evidence be subject to be tampered with, or portions of it struck out, by some hon. Member? He hoped that, the House having granted the Committee, the inquiry would go on, and that it might be a full and searching inquiry conducted in the face of the public. If hon. Members who composed the Committee were afraid of the duties they had undertaken, and afraid of conducting the inquiry in the face of the public, he hoped they would have the courage at once to come down to the House and say so at once, and let the inquiry be either proceeded with in reality, or given up altogether.

MR. G. BUTT said, he had supported the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Roebuck) because he was not satisfied with the conduct of the Government in respect to the war; but at the same time he felt it necessary and just that a Committee of inquiry should be appointed. Fully agreeing with those who said that the inquiry should be full and searching, he was at a loss to understand how it possibly could be satisfactory, as far as the public were concerned, unless it was made a public inquiry. He was certain the inquiry could never be fair or just to those concerned—whether high or low, that was immaterial—unless they knew the charges made against them, and could give evidence in exculpation of those charges during the course of the investigation. On these grounds, he had to oppose the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend that the Committee should be a secret one, and he did so the more reluctantly, knowing his hon. and learned Friend's sincerity. If any dangers attended the inquiry, they would be greater if it were secret, or half secret, than if it were full and open. He had never meant to say that the Duke of Newcastle had been most in fault in the administration of the war. If it were put to him, he would say that those Members of the Government were most in fault who had the most experience if they did not check what was wrong as they went along, and if they did not give their counsel in time. He would say it, with great respect for the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, that he was in fault if he did not aid the Duke of Newcastle with his great experience and knowledge. He had intended his vote as a vote of want of confidence; but, if there were to be an inquiry, it was only fair and right it should be full and searching.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I wish shortly to state the grounds on which I am adverse to the Motion brought forward by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield. I confess that when this Motion was first announced yesterday my own impressions were strongly against it, but at the same time I wished to hear the reasons, if any, for the course that it was intended to adopt. I have listened with great attention to everything that has passed, and I am bound to say that I have not heard anything which in any degree tends to alter the opinion which I at first sight entertained in this matter. No doubt, when this Committee was first proposed, I felt the objections which have been urged by my hon. and learned Friend in his Motion to make this Committee a secret one. I felt that it was possible—and I stated so to the House—that it was very likely, that in the course of the inquiry there might arise matters involving in danger the relations that so happily subsist between us and our great Ally, but the House overruled this consideration. It was stated not only by me, but by many others, that this evil might arise out of the investigations of the Committee; but the House, with the full knowledge of this probability determined twice, nay thrice, that the inquiry should be prosecuted. I stated, when the question was as to the naming of the Committee, that, in my opinion, it was not desirable that we should fetter their inquiries. I thought if you succeeded in selecting men of prudence, discretion, and knowledge of business, the best way was to place confidence in them, and not attempt to fetter their inquiries by any instructions from this House. Upon the same principle, I would not impose upon them the restriction of secrecy. There are cases where a Secret Committee is desirable. If you have to lay before a Committee documents involving matters which, although of great importance for the purposes of inquiry, nevertheless cannot be made public without great inconvenience to the public service or danger to individuals, there is a reason why the Committee should be secret, and also power in the Committee to maintain its secrecy. If you have to examine witnesses, such as bankers and others, touching their own affairs, with regard to which knowledge is requisite to the Committee, delicacy and good faith towards the witnesses render it necessary that the evidence should not be made public, and at the same time, as it is their interest to keep it secret, that secrecy is maintained. But where you are going to examine witnesses touching matters with regard to the secrecy of which they have no interest whatever, although you may be confident the Members of the Committee will perfectly observe the secrecy imposed on them, there is no possible restraint on the witnesses. If they publish their evidence the Committee has the power of committing them, but the Committee has no power to prevent them stating in conversation the nature of their evidence; therefore, the secrecy which you desire to impose upon the Committee is a perfect nullity, and you do not accomplish the purpose, whatever it may be, for which secrecy is imposed. There is also this inconvenience, which has been fully and forcibly stated, that the public will never be satisfied with an inquiry of which they do not know the progress. They will think it a juggle. They will never be convinced that the House of Commons is really redeeming the pledge it has given, and the proceeding will be replete with injustice to those whose conduct may be made the subject of investigation. For these reasons I shall certainly give my vote against making this a Secret Committee.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, if there is any measure upon which the House of Commons should hesitate before they give it their sanction it is the appointment of a Secret Committee. There is only one instance, since I have had the honour of being a Member of this House, in which a Secret Committee has been proposed, and I felt it my duty to resist that Motion. It was on a subject of great interest, and which had produced considerable excitement in the country, namely, the conduct of the Post Office in regard to the opening of the letters of foreign refugees. The conduct of the Government of Sir Robert Peel about the year 1844 was, in that respect, called in question, and a Select Committee was proposed by the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe) to inquire both into the circumstances and, if my memory does not deceive me, into the law of the question. I remember that one of the most distinguished Members of the House, a Member of Her Majesty's then Government — who, though himself not personally responsible for the act called in question, was responsible, I believe, through fulfilling the duties of an absent colleague — declared his opinion on that occasion. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham), who has informed us to-night that he is only to be looked on as one retired into private life, has favoured the House with his instructing and guiding remarks on this subject; but, if I recollect rightly, the line then taken by the right hon. Gentleman was, that if a Committee of inquiry was to be a searching Committee it must be a Secret Committee. That was the position which the right hon. Gentleman at that time enforced upon the House, and, not satisfied with enforcing it, he moved an Amendment to the Motion of the hon. Member for Finsbury, that the Select Committee of inquiry should be a Committee of secrecy, and the House agreed to the appointment of that Committee as a secret one. It is not for me, Sir, to enter into a discussion whether that was an occasion which did or did not justify the appointment of a Secret Committee; but, as a considerable interval—upwards of ten years—has elapsed, it may be interesting for the House to know—and I say it on the authority of the Members of that Committee—that not one single title of evidence given before that Committee has ever transpired. It was, of course, the wish of the House that it should not transpire, and I mention it as an answer to the right hon. Member for Carlisle, who now says that such a Committee cannot keep its secrets. Here is a very great authority that if you would render an inquiry searching it should be secret, and the authority, in my mind, obtains double weight from the speech with which we have been favoured this evening by the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman has indulged in a style of rhetoric of which he is a great master and which he knows how to employ on an occasion like the present. It may be described as the oratory of terror. He readily accumulates every possible contingency of menace that can occur, even probable or improbable danger, to influence the decision of the House. I hardly remember an occasion when the right hon. Gentleman has not taken up that mace and knocked down the House of Commons. This is the third or fourth time he has appealed to "that bauble," and attempted by menacing allusions to influence the decision of the House. Now, Sir, my opinion is, that whether this Committee be secret or only select, it will be an extremely beneficial inquiry, and I do not anticipate, whatever may be the decision of the House as to its form and method, that any of those dangers that are anticipated will ensue. I observe that every Member who has opposed a secret inquiry also opposed the original inquiry, and that has made me look with considerable suspicion on the opposition which has been offered to the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield. Nor can I admit the argument of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Graham) to be valid, that a court of justice should never be secret, because in our present system of jurisprudence we have a precedent for secret inquiry in the action of a grand jury. It has been urged that it is quite impossible to maintain secrecy, which is the object of this Motion. I have already alluded to an instance in which secrecy has been observed. But I cannot conceal from myself that the nature of this inquiry is of so multifarious and so comprehensive a character that the difficulty of securing secrecy is proportionately increased. Nor, Sir, can I understand how you can draw a line between the admission of what is called the public and the admission of Members of this House. If Members are admitted, and the public not admitted, probably we shall only have garbled, where otherwise we should have complete and impartial versions of the proceedings. I do not, for a moment, credit that if this were a Committee of secrecy,

Mr. Disraeli

I have such confidence in the common sense and honour of a Committee of the House of Commons, chosen under these circumstances, that I do not believe that secrecy would be violated. I believe practically you might, by establishing an absolute Secret Committee, by excluding the public and Members, obtain the object sought for by this Motion. But, against some convenience which would no doubt be experienced, there are great disadvantages which must be incurred if an inquiry of national interest and importance in which the opinions and feelings of the country are centred, and which may be prolonged to a considerable extent, should be carried on in a manner to excite suspicion and distrust in the public mind. I think that the balance is in favour of public inquiry. I do not myself anticipate those dangerous consequences to the maintenance of a good understanding between ourselves and our Ally which have been so frequently and so needlessly, I conceive, put forward. My trust, I repeat, is in the discretion and ability of those who guide and conduct this inquiry. I do not see those difficulties, which have been admitted too easily, in carrying on this investigation with persons possessing those qualities of prudence and caution which I hope are the characteristics of a Select Committee of the House of Commons. What, then, will be the main inconveniences which will accrue from this public inquiry? There may be some. I do not for a moment pretend that there are not objections to either course, and disadvantages which belong to either system which we may adopt; but I think the balance of advantage greatly in favour of adhering to an open inquiry. And, Sir, though it may be for the personal convenience of Members, which has been alluded to by the noble Lord the Member for Totness (Lord Seymour), that the public generally should not be admitted, and certainly that discussions of this kind should not be carried on under the influence of clamour and excitement, still I think it advantageous, if we have a public inquiry, that means should be taken that the result of that inquiry should go before the public in a complete and impartial manner. If the House should decide that this shall not be a Secret Committee, I think it is also bound to take means to insure that the Report of the proceedings of the Committee shall be full and authentic.

MR. DRUMMOND: Before addressing myself, Sir, to the question before the House, I wish to bear testimony to the faithful accuracy with which the hon. Gentleman near me (Mr. Layard) has narrated what passed on a subject of which I hope we shall never hear more. I am not one of those, Sir, who plead guilty to having given a factious vote with regard to the appointment of this Committee. I did not vote for one thing and mean another, for if it had been a plain and simple question of overthrowing the Government I should have voted for the Government. There was one consideration alone which possessed my mind—and after due deliberation I hope I shall not be accused of too great obstinacy in holding to it still—and that was—what would have been the effect upon the minds of our soldiers in the Crimea when they were told that an inquiry into the causes of their sufferings being asked for, this House had refused to make it? The instruction which I have placed on the paper shows the objects to which I consider this inquiry ought to be confined; but I see plainly there are heads quite as wise as mine on the Committee, and I see, likewise, I cannot have everything my own way. There is no danger that I can perceive in making this simple inquiry, "Why, at this day, have we voted 4,000 horses to go to the Crimea when there is not a morsel of hay for them to eat when they arrive?" Here you go on night after night voting supplies for the Crimea, while every newspaper tells you that your men are starving as soon as ever they get there. I am very suspicious of the words now so often used, "a full and searching inquiry;" and I observe that every person who uses them connects them with a fear of danger to our alliance. Well, I am not particularly enamoured of that alliance, and I very much doubt whether the people of England know what it is. Indeed, I doubt very much whether it is an alliance. I have heard, certainly, of a live man being chained to a dead one; but I do not know whether that was called an alliance or not. When the time comes—perhaps before this Session is over—I may think it my duty to state plainly to the House and the country what I suspect the nature of our alliance to be. I do think it is very necessary that some measure should be taken to prevent this Committee going into what hon. Gentlemen have to-night talked of inquiring into—the whole policy of the war, and our naval and military proceedings. I would have them all excluded. The right hon. Baronet behind me (Sir J. Graham) has detailed to us the advantages of an open Committee, and he has talked at the same time of that awful thing—the press. It is just because of this cowardly cringing to the press that I fear this open Committee. I know that men, thus placed as it were in the presence of the public, will be pushed to ask questions which otherwise they would never have thought of, and these are not the men who in old times would have wielded "that hauble" (pointing to the mace) against the House of Stuart, from whom there was real danger. Now-a-days, Sir, the danger is exactly from the opposite side, and no man dares to do his duty and rise up against it. But of all the cringing baseness which has ever appeared in English history, commend me to the conduct of the Liberals towards the daily press.

MR. ELLICE said, that, although the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire had endeavoured to lead the House to view with suspicion the fact that those Members of the Committee who desired that it should be an open Committee were exactly those who had originally voted against the appointment, yet he could assure the House, both for himself and his noble Friend near him (Lord Seymour), that they still adhered to that vote, and would repeat it were the occasion to occur again. That, however, was a very different thing from asserting that the public had no right to demand a full and searching inquiry into the maladministration of the army in the Crimea; on the contrary, he considered it absolutely necessary that some such inquiry should take place, when the operations in that country were over, and when it could be conducted without danger to the public service. He had always protested against the doctrine that this Minister or that Minister was to blame. So far as the Ministers were concerned, all were equally to blame; or, if one more than another, it was those who, doubting of the policy and the measures which were being pursued, delayed to insist upon the adoption of a different course. He must say that if there were any two Members in that House who had almost expected the evils which had resulted, although perhaps not to so great an extent—who had less cause to be surprised at the maladministration and mismanagement of the army departments—it was himself and his noble Friend near him, who had been engaged in so many inquiries into military subjects, and who too clearly foresaw the results which would occur from the neglect of the Government to establish War Department which should be responsible for the whole administration of the army. With respect to the wish expressed by the majority of the Committee, making this Committee a secret one, would have been better if the example of other great Committees appointed to consider important matters had been followed. For instance, the Committee appointed to inquire into the administration of the Ordnance, the Army and the Navy, which s three years, did not admit the public, because it would have been inconvenient to carry on discussions in the presence of the public, nor did it publish the evidence day by day, because that would have been unfair to the parties concerned, but Members of the House were admitted, and the evidence was reported from time to time whenever it was thought that one portion of the subject was complete. He had no objection in the abstract to the admission of the public, but he doubted whether it was feasible. Look at the number of persons whose feelings, interests, anxieties, and sentiments, would be engaged in the proceedings of the Committee, and who would be ever watching its movements and discussing the transactions about which the Committee would be inquiring. If partial publication of the evidence should get abroad it might seriously affect many, and no one would be able to calculate the consequences. He should certainly consider it the duty of the Committee to report to the House as often as any part of the evidence should be considered complete and give so much of the evidence as might be fairly made public. Many of the subjects that would come before the Committee would not bear the character of secrecy. For instance, the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Layard) would no doubt be called as a witness. That Gentleman had been to the Crimea, and he could give a statement of facts that would be highly interesting to the public. There could be no secrecy required on such matters. Again, the great misery, wretchedness, and ruin, he might almost say, that had befallen their troops in the Crimea could be no matter of secrecy, neither could an inquiry into the causes of those calamities, and why they were not mitigated or prevented. But when they came to inquire into the policy of the war, and of the expedition and joint operations of the English and French armies, then the Committee would be approaching subjects which would require to be handled with the greatest caution and deliberation ; but he, for one, should avoid as much as possible touching on those subjects. He was of opinion that if the inquiry had been limited, and the Committee had been specifically directed to ascertain the state of the army at Sebastopol, and why timely supplies of food, clothing, and other necessaries had not been made to it, the wishes of the people out of doors would have been fully met. It was his desire that there should emanate from the Committee such a Report on the state of our military administration as should force upon the House a sense of the all-important duty of bringing the whole affairs of the army under one sole and central direction. So far as the present Government had gone, he gave them credit for their policy, and placed confidence in them for the first steps they had taken. But having had great experience on the subject, and having watched the changes that had been made for many years past, his opinion was, that unless the Minister was made responsible for all appointments in the army, and was placed in superiority over the administration of the Horse Guards, very little good indeed would be done. It was twenty years since he was appointed Secretary at War, and he took the office upon the condition that a Committee of Inquiry into the details of the expenditure of the army should be appointed. On that Committee sat the late Sir Robert Peel, his right hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham), Lord John Russell, and Lord Hardinge. The Committee unanimously agreed to recommend to the Crown that no staff officer either at home, in India, or in the Colonies should hold his appointment for more than five years. The House would scarcely believe it that that Resolution up to the present day had never been acted upon. He was a Member of the Committee appointed last year to inquire into the question of promotion in the army, and he then asked whether the system of appointing staff officers had been changed, and he found that up to that time no change had taken place, and that the persons holding those situations had been considered as tenants for life. Why should that be ? Why should such men as Sir Willoughby Gordon and Lord Raglan hold those appointments for thirty or forty years, and other officers not be allowed to have the chance of gaining the experience which such appointments would enable them to do ? One word more before he sat down. The House had recently sustained a great loss in the death of Mr. Hume. He would entreat those hon. Gentlemen who were younger than himself, and who had more time to devote to these subjects, to tread closely in the steps of that excellent man. This war, he doubted not, would soon be at an end ; and when it came to an end it would be more than ever necessary to turn their attention to the military establishments of this country, and more especially to the particular subject to which he had called their attention, namely, the administration of the Horse Guards. Unless the Minister of War was backed by that House in insisting upon regulations being established which were suited to the times in which they lived, and in going a little further forward than the old routine of the last fifty years, it would be a never-ending subject of discontent in this country, and the people would fairly say that the House of Commons had abandoned their duty.

MR. ROCHE said, that having been one of those who had the courage to vote against the appointment of this Committee, he had listened with great pleasure to the debate, because every hon. Member who had spoken had used arguments which justified those who had voted against it. It appeared to him that the House was in a greater difficulty than ever. The Government were constitutionally responsible for such an inquiry, as their acts might be impugned ; but a Secret Committee, with power to publish only garbled or imperfect reports, could afford to laugh at the public. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) had said that the whole subject to be considered was appalling. He would ask if anything which had occurred in the debate had tended to give fresh courage to the Members of the Committee who would have to approach that subject ? He contended, then, that the investigation ought to be undertaken by the Government. The inquiry ought to be full and untrammelled, and how that end could be attained by an irresponsible Committee he was at a loss to conceive.

MR. J. BALL said, it was clear that the House were about to give a decided negative to the proposition of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield ; but he was of opinion that no amount of discretion could prevent danger to the interests of the country arising from the investigations of the Committee, for they would not be able to avoid raising questions which would involve charges against persons who were 3,000 miles away; and it might so happen that, at the very moment these charges were being brought forward the subjects of them might be struck down while in the service of their country. If the proceedings of the Committee were to be public, the responsibility would rest upon the House alone, and especially upon its leaders, for both the noble Lord at the head of the Government and the chief of the Opposition in that House were in the position of men who, standing at the helm of the vessel, saw breakers ahead, and would not interfere.

MR. BENTINCK said, he was anxious to state the grounds upon which it was his intention to vote against the Motion. On a former occasion, he had stated that he fully appreciated all the dangers which might be incurred in consequence of the indiscreet prosecution of this inquiry, but such an inquiry having been resolved upon he thought it would be utterly impossible to prevent the secrets of the Committee from transpiring in some form or other, and the only way to prevent those secrets being communicated through improper channels, and published to the world in a garbled manner, with equally injudicious observations and results, would be to have an open inquiry. In all probability, if the hon. Members composing the Committee acted under the knowledge that their proceedings would from day to day be submitted for the consideration of the country, they would be more discreet in their questions than if the inquiry were secret. Another reason why the proceedings of this Committee ought to be public was the deficiency of the naval element in its constitution. He was still of opinion that, considering much of the inquiry would be upon nautical affairs, the Committee—and he said it with great deference to the ability and capacity of its Members—would be incompetent to deal with many of the subjects which would be brought before it. On these grounds, in his judgment, it was of the utmost importance that the investigation should be public.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, that on the occasion of the debates respecting the appointment of the Committee, from the pertinacity with which the Members and supporters of the Government had persisted in stating that they considered the Motion nothing but a vote of censure, he smelt a rat. It was his opinion, that if they could possibly have avoided it the Governor never would have consented to the inquiry and he was confirmed in that opinion by the subsequent remarks which had fallen from the noble Lord at the head of Treasury. He had, therefore, on that occasion asked the hon. and learned Member for Shoffield whether he was in earnest and would prosecute the inquiry? The hon. and learned Gentleman answered that he was in earnest and come what might he would prosecute the inquiry. Now he begged the House to observe that not a word was said in the Motion about the being a Secret Committee. The secret of the Committee was certainly advocated by those right hon. and hon. Gentlemen who opposed its appointment, but he must say that, in his opinion, a greater triumph had never been exhibited over the arguments of those Gentlemen than had been exhibited during the present debate. What had the Committee already come to? Before any difficulty had arisen, they came before the House and told it they were incompetent to conduct the inquiry. The Resolution now before the House had been supported both upstairs and that evening by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington). That right hon. Gentleman was extremely candid at the time of the nomination. "If," said he, "I am appointed, I will certainly make the most rigid inquiry into the state of the army. I see no danger whatever in prosecuting this inquiry; but don't blame me afterwards if I am a sort of ferret upon the Committee." Not one word, however, did he then say about the propriety of its being a Secret Committee, notwithstanding he had so candidly told them the conditions on which he would serve upon it. If the Committee felt that their proceedings must be secret, and that they could not go on without, all the House had to do was to appoint another Committee. Nine other hon. Gentlemen could be got quite as good as they. They might be of opinion that the objects of the Committee could not be obtained without injustice being done to individual and public interests unless its proceedings were secret. But what was the ground on which the Committee was appointed? Was it not appointed in accordance with public feeling and opinion? And public opinion, he could tell the House, would not allow this inquiry to be stifled, evaded, garbled, compromised, or modified. Therefore if hon. Members did not like to serve upon the Committee, because its proceedings were to be public, the sooner they gave place to others the better. He contended that the object for which the Committee was appointed would be best obtained by publicity, and that less injustice would be done to individuals by the inquiry being made an open one. The late Secretary at War had been blamed among others for the disasters in the Crimea, and that right hon. Gentleman, while opposing the appointment of the Committee expressed his readiness to have his conduct investigated. Was, then, that blame to continue to rest on the right hon. Gentleman, and was he to have no opportunity of vindicating himself, and making known his vindication, if he had any, to the public? Then with respect to the Duke of Newcastle. In the course of his experience he never recollects any public man so loaded with obloquy as that noble Duke, and it was therefore only right that he should have the opportunity of going before the Committee, and that his vindication should be as public as the obloquy cast on him; but if, on the other hand, he had no vindication to offer, then let the obloquy rest on him. They must recollect the opinion that had been given by the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, and the correspondence that had been read, from which it appeared that great credit was due to the Duke of Newcastle for the manner in which he had discharged his duty; that it was the fault of the system, and that he was controlled by others. The Duke of Newcastle made another statement in another place, and the public generally thought that the statement made by him was perfectly satisfactory. He (Mr. Duncombe) had never heard that statement controverted in that House. Let the Committee publish the evidence they received, and he thought that the only instruction the House ought to give to the Committee was, that they should report from day to day, and thereby anticipate any perversion or any misrepresentation on the part of the public press or any one else, and justice would, in his opinion, be thus done to individuals. Then they were told that, somehow or other, the alliance with France might be jeopardised by the investigations before this Committee. Now, it was his opinion that the Committee had nothing whatever to do with any inquiry connected with our allies the French; but the people of this country, after sending 54,000 fine troops to the Crimea, and finding that only 14,000 remained there, wanted to know, as the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield asked on a former night, what had become of the other 40,000? They wanted to know who starved the troops, who refused them shelter, or misused them in any way, and why disease had so fearfully overtaken them. He confessed that his confidence in the Committee was somewhat shaken at seeing them so childish as to come down to the House, before any difficulty had occurred, and ask to have the Committee made secret. If, upon examining the Duke of Newcastle, that nobleman had objected to give his evidence unless the Committee were made secret, that would have been a reason for the Committee appealing to the House, but the Committee had examined nobody, and there was no apparent difficulty except a little squabble among themselves. Now it really was time that something should be done with this Committee, and one way of dealing with it would be to add to it some Members with firmness and courage enough not to trouble the House with such childish conduct. The wrongs and disasters to our troops, of which the people complained, had been perpetrated in the eyes of the world, and the inquiry ought to be conducted in the light of day. That was what was required of the Committee, and if the present one was not competent to perform their duty, the House must appoint another who would not come with a childish request to make secret a Committee the proceedings of which would be anxiously waited for from one end of the country to the other.

MR. NAPIER said, he thought the tribunal which the House had appointed was the best judge of the mode in which the inquiry should be conducted; and as the Committee, with a knowledge of facts which hon. Members generally did not possess, and after deliberation, had, as conscientious men, assured the House that it was necessary for the execution of their duty that the investigation should be conducted in secret, he felt bound to acquiesce in their decision, and he was the more inclined to do so when he saw some who had opposed all inquiry, and who were perhaps anxious now to render inquiry abortive, object to the proposition that the investigation should be secret. Though publicity, he admitted, should be the general rule, there might be exceptional cases like the present, where secrecy was requisite.

MR. CROSSLEY said, he must deny that public feeling was in favour of this Committee, unless what appeared in the newspapers was to be taken for public feeling; but the public out of doors did not want the responsibility shifted from the right shoulders to the wrong. They did not want a Committee of that House to undertake the management of the war; but they expected the House of Commons to support a Ministry able and willing to carry on the war vigorously and to a successful issue, and to withdraw their confidence from any Administration not capable of such energetic conduct. He was quite sure that if the Committee were to sit with closed doors, and if, nevertheless, hon. Members generally were allowed to be present, reports of the evidence would be published from day to day in a most incorrect manner. If hon. Members were excluded, still statements would be gathered from the witnesses examined, and would be published in an equally incorrect style. He therefore said that if there was to be a Committee at all, it ought to be a public one. Let every question and answer be fully reported, and he was quite sure that the public would soon see that the object desired would never be attained by means of the Committee, and the war, to be properly managed, must be conducted by the Executive.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he thought it was the duty of that House to take care that the inquiry should enter a safe channel. They should tell the Committee not only what they were to inquire into, but what they were not to inquire into. They should ascertain why it was that, with the vast means at their disposal, and the vast expense that had been incurred, they had been unable to maintain the army that was sent to the East. That was a safe inquiry, limited to their own establishments and departments, and to their own people and officers. It would not be necessary even to make a run upon individuals. Nothing would be more unjust than to charge upon a few of the Members belonging to the late Government the exclusive blame of what occurred in the Crimea. The question of the policy of the war would be one for future consideration, but the immediate object of any inquiry at the present moment should be to explain the unaccountable disasters, arising principally from want of system. It would be an act of madness on their part if they did not give instructions to the Committee, and he trusted some person would take the matter and have the Committee reected to make a simple inquiry on so plain and intelligible grounds. The object of the House should be to find wh the hitch really was, in order to reconstr the departments, or at all events, pl them in a more efficient state. It v quite clear that if they attempted to ma the Committee secret, they would occas evils of the greatest magnitude, and should therefore join with the noble Lo the Member for Totness (Lord Seymor) in resisting the Motion.

MR. BOWYER said, he understo that the proposition for a Secret Committ was advocated because the Committ would thereby be enabled to ~~erase~~ su portions of the evidence as in their opinio ought not to be published. That, at fir sight, might appear to be a specious argu ment; but unless the public were to hear not only the truth, but the whole trut they would not be satisfied. If any pa of the evidence were omitted, the raiander would be worthless; for the pa omitted might modify or explain the pa placed before the public. He believed th difficulties of the investigation were greatl overrated. The proceedings in the Crime had been fully canvassed in the newspaper and in that House, and they had not heard anything of blame or misconduct attached to their allies. On the contrary, every thing that had become known showed that we had received from them the most valua ble assistance, and that their services were of the utmost importance. There was no danger that anything could possibl be said in the investigations before the Committee that would offend the sensibilitie of the French. If the Committee were public there would be less danger of any thing indiscreet being said. Men would talk nonsense and say imprudent things in a Secret Committee, which they would not dare to utter if they spoke under the consta nt check of public opinion, and of the persons who were in their presence. The publicity itself would be the best security against the occurrence of anything that was urged as an objection against the publicity of the Committee. It was said that the public characters of the generals and other persons would be impeached, and that from day to day the proceedings would be made public, and that charges against them would appear in the public press; but if he (Mr. Bowyer) were one of those persons, he would much rather that those secrets, whatever they might be, should be spoken out publicly, than that things should be said behind his back without any opportunity being afforded to himself, or to his friends, to meet them. He had looked to the precedents on the subject, and he found there was no instance of a Secret Committee where charges were made, or to be made against public officers, except where there was an impeachment intended.

MR. ROEBUCK: Sir, as I think the proposal I made was one of an extraordinary nature, and the powers which I intended to ask the House to permit me to employ was equally extraordinary, and one which ought not to be placed lightly in any man's hands, I fancy the feeling which I find prevails throughout the House precludes me from going to a division. And as this measure is, as I have said, one of an extraordinary nature, it ought to be justified by the almost unanimous opinion of the House; and as I find the opinion is almost unanimously the other way, I suppose I must yield and proceed with the inquiry in the manner the House desires. I trust, however, that I may be permitted to say a few words in explanation of myself and my colleagues. The Gentlemen composing the Committee, I think, are all seriously bent on a thorough and searching investigation. Now, the hon. Member for West Surrey (Mr. Drummond) says, he looks with great suspicion on the words "thorough and searching investigation;" but I think the words explain themselves. They do not mean a wide field of examination, but a thorough and searching investigation, confined to the period and to the circumstances to which the inquiry refers. Now, Sir, as I found that a portion of my colleagues wished a thorough investigation, and as they believed that could only be obtained through the means of a Secret Committee, I (coinciding in that opinion) made the Motion which I have submitted to the House; and it is a rather suspicious circumstance, that a great majority of those persons who spoke against secrecy, are the very persons who voted against the appointment of any Committee at all. The arguments which they have used tonight are arguments against the appointment of a Committee, and those who opposed the Committee seem to consider the withdrawal of the present Motion a triumph in their favour. There is a homely phrase, that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander, and the moral of that appears to have escaped the notice of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham). What is good for him is good for me. I do not say who is the goose and who is the gander—but, in July, 1844, the right hon. Baronet had to face a proposition of the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe), for a Select Committee to inquire into the conduct of the Post Office, in regard to the opening of letters. On that occasion the right hon. Gentleman moved an Amendment, and what was the nature of it? Why, that the Select Committee should be secret. And what grounds did he allege for that? He said—

"I have stated, on a former occasion, that I do not think a revelation to the House of all the details connected with the exercise of this power would be conducive to the public good; and I retain that opinion. I do think that there must be an inquiry, not before a Select Committee, but before a Secret Committee, the Members to be nominated by the House."—[3 Hansard, lxxvi. 226.] And there is another passage in which the right hon. Baronet said a full investigation could not be made before a Select Committee, but that a Secret Committee was absolutely necessary for a thorough investigation into a delicate question of this kind. Now, this is exactly the opinion of the Committee of which I have the honour to be Chairman. They felt they had to deal with a very delicate question, and that if persons, on being examined, were to say the evidence they were about to give would involve the public safety, they would be enabled to shelter themselves behind that statement, and thereby escape inquiry. Now, we wanted to take away that screen. It is because you wanted a strict and searching inquiry that we wished to take away from them the means of evading one. I believe that difficulty will arise, but I am not of that cowardly disposition spoken of by the hon. Member for Finsbury, who thinks we shall be totally incapable of conducting the inquiry. I believe the inquiry can be carried on, and I consider it will be most effectually carried on in the manner we have suggested; but still I believe an inquiry, such as the House desires, can be conducted, even in an open Committee. Now, a great mistake has been made with regard to this Secret Committee. It is fancied that the evidence will be given in darkness, and kept in darkness. No Committee could report to the House without the consent of the House being obtained, and that consent must be obtained by a Select Committee, as well as by a Secret Committee. Therefore, in both cases the same course must be pursued. I should, as Chairman of the Committee, in both cases have to report to the House, and then bring up the evidence entire and complete. This inquiry, I believe, has already done good, and I think the Gentlemen who opposed the appointment of the Committee will be the first to assent to that proposition. As long as the Committee exists, it will be a spur to the side of the Government, and will incite them to those reforms which, if the Committee had not been appointed, would not have been proceeded with. Yielding, therefore, to the opinion of the House, I will, with their permission, withdraw my proposition.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

ARMY ESTIMATES—SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee of Supply; Mr. BOUVERIE in the Chair.

(1.) 64,000*l.*, General Officers.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to know from the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Peel), whether there were any Supplementary Estimates for the Army forthcoming, in addition to those now produced, and he would particularly wish to be understood as referring to the Land Transport Service.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL: None others, excepting the Commissariat.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he would take that occasion to ask whether the clothing of the army was still left to the colonels of regiments? On looking into the Estimates for 1853, he found that the clothing of the marines cost the country 17½ per cent less than the rest of the army, although the clothing of the marines was of a superior quality.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, the colonels had superintended the clothing for the ensuing year, but that after this year the Government intended to take upon itself the clothing of the army.

MR. PHINN said, he wished to inquire whether the Government had issued any general warrant regulating the promotion of general officers; and, if so, whether it contained a provision that any officer who had served six years as equerry to the Sovereign should be entitled to the rank of a general officer?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, that the warrant referred to had been in the hands of hon. Members for some time. The hon. and learned Gentleman, however, mistook its effect. Any lieutenant-colonel having served six years as equerry was to be promoted to the rank of colonel.

Vote agreed to; as was also—

(2) 55,000*l.*, Full Pay, Reduced, and Retired Officers.

(3.) 318,000*l.*, Half Pay and Military Allowances.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he wished to call the attention of the Committee to the list of officers receiving half-pay. He found there were in it 108 cornets and ensigns, 788 lieutenants, 754 captains and 178 majors. No officer ought to be allowed to go on half-pay with a low rank if he wished to retire from the service, he should be compelled to sell his commission that would relieve the country from a charge of from 200,000*l.* to 300,000*l.*

MR. P. O'BRIEN said, he believed this was not an improper occasion on which to complain of a practice that had of late been most invidiously exercised—namely, the bringing in gentlemen from off the half-pay list to fill up the regimental vacancies, to the prejudice of those who had served for considerable periods in the army. He himself knew of cases where the claims of officers who had fought gallantly on the fields of the Alma and Inkerman had been thus overlooked in favour of those who were long distant from those scenes. He believed arrangements of that kind were most ill-considered.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL, in reply to the observations of the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Williams), said, that the half-pay list had been fully looked into at the Horse Guards, and that every officer capable of doing duty had been called on to accept of service in the East. He believed the consequent reductions in the list amongst the subalterns and captains amounted to 200.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he thought the Horse Guards were perfectly right in adopting that course. But the fact was, many officers had been placed upon the half-pay list in consequence of the difficulty of finding regiments for them. It followed, therefore, that the authorities at the Horse Guards had acted most wisely and considerately, under the circumstances.

COLONEL NORTH said, that not having had an opportunity of addressing the House last night on the discussion relative to the sale of commissions, he would wish now to observe, that if officers were to be deprived of the power of selling their commissions, the country would be saddled with a very considerable expense. His objection to the proposal of last night was, that it went to deprive men who had done good service to the State, of the power of retiring from the army, and maintaining themselves and their families at no expense to the country. The fact was, the moment a non-commissioned officer rose to the rank of captain, he immediately began to consider how he could raise a sum sufficient for the support of his family, and he therefore very properly decided on selling his commission, and making place for a younger man. Nor did the country suffer because a respectable non-commissioned officer realised a sum of 1,800*l.* or 2,000*l.*, as it might be; yet, by his vote of last night, the hon. Member for Lambeth would prevent such a man from rendering his family comfortable, and would place additional burdens upon the country.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he was not so unjust as to suppose that any man who had paid for his commission should not have his money back again.

CAPTAIN STUART KNOX said, that the hon. Member for Lambeth had shown his ignorance of the service by the observations he had made. If the hon. Member admitted the justice of an officer being allowed to sell his commission, surely he must also allow persons to buy commissions.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that undoubtedly if one officer sells, another must buy, but the officer who sells does not, in such case, come upon the half-pay list, and, therefore, does not burden the public.

MR. OTWAY said, he believed nothing to be more just than that, when an officer had become incapacitated by wounds or disease, he should be allowed to retire on half-pay. If the rule laid down with regard to retiring upon half-pay were adhered to, he did not think that any one could object to the half-pay list.

MR. LOVAIN said, he must congratulate the army upon the accession of so powerful and able a supporter of the system of purchase and sale as the hon. Member for Lambeth. It was delightful to see, notwithstanding what had occurred on previous occasions, with what vigour the hon. Gentleman now supported the purchase and sale of commissions, and it would be very hard if Gentlemen who sat upon the same side of the House with him should oppose his views.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he wished to ask the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the War Department, if commissions had lately been sold by the Government, and, if so, what it was proposed to do with the money so received.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, that in consequence of the augmentation which had taken place in the army, a number of ensigncies had been created, and a certain portion of them had been sold by the Government with the intention of investing the money, he believed, in Exchequer bills, for the purpose of reducing the half-pay list.

COLONEL NORTH said, he must complain of a statement made on a previous occasion by the hon. Member for Lambeth. That hon. Gentleman had referred to a case of punishment in the 26th Regiment, and he had averred that the younger officers of that regiment, being on oath, had, in order not to displease their seniors, agreed to the sentence, which was afterwards carried into effect. Now, he would just state what were the facts of the case. The man was not tried by regimental court martial at all, but by district court martial, so that the officers of the 26th Regiment had nothing to do with the sentence. The crime for which the severest punishments were inflicted in the army was theft from a comrade, and this man had been not only guilty of that crime, but also of desertion. There was no extra severity used towards the man. When he was in the Prussian army, the captain of a company there was empowered, without court martial, but solely by his own free will, to inflict fifty lashes upon a soldier. There were other punishments practised in that army which would not be tolerated in this country. What he found fault with was this—the hon. Member for Lambeth was in the habit of inflicting the cruellest attacks upon the honour and character of officers, without previously making inquiries as to the truth of his impressions.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he was always opposed to flogging under any circumstances. He denied, however, having cast any imputations upon officers. He had only read a statement respecting them out of a newspaper.

MR. BELLEW said, that corporal punishment had been virtually abolished in the army, except for certain crimes which were looked upon as disgraceful, and he could not believe that the retention of this punishment, to the limited extent in which it was at present made use of, was at all likely to be injurious to the service or to society.

COLONEL GILPIN said, he wished to inquire of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Peel) whether the system of selling commissions on the part of the Government, which, so far as he knew, was an entirely novel system, was to be continued?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, that the sale referred to took place before he had entered upon his present office, but it certainly was not intended to continue it, because it had exclusive connection with the recent augmentation in the army.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he hoped it was not to be avowed as a principle in our army that the commissions arising from an increase of the army were to be sold. On the part of the army, he thought the practice a most objectionable one, and if it were repeated he should certainly bring the question before the House.

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to inquire in whose hands the proceeds of the sale of these commissions were to be placed, and to the credit of what account they were to be brought?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, he had previously stated that the sum received had been invested in Exchequer bills, and, it was at present understood, would be held for the purpose of reducing the charge on the half-pay list, which otherwise would be considerably swollen when the number of commissions now in existence were reduced upon the termination of the war.

MR. HENLEY said, his question had not been answered. He wished to know in what office this money was—whether in that of the Secretary for War, or of the Commander in Chief?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, he imagined it would be in the office of the General Commanding in Chief. Who the parties were in whose name the money was invested he could not state without inquiry.

(5.) 124,454*l.*, Pensions to Widows.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he had not the slightest objection to make to this Vote, but he could not understand what reason there was why the widow and orphans of a soldier in the ranks should not be as much the object of consideration to the State, to which he had given his services and for which he had shed his blood, as the widow and orphans of an officer. If they wished to promote enlistment into the army, they were bound to hold out every reasonable inducement for that purpose. He was one of those who had done every thing in his power to promote the success of the Patriotic Fund, which he thought honourable to the humane and beneficent spirit of the nation. At the same time he thought the necessity of such a fund was a circumstance discreditable to the institutions and military system. Suppose we received in a few days news of 3,000 men more being killed and wounded, what was to become of their widows and orphans under the present system?

COLONEL NORTH said, he quite agreed with the observations of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire), being unable to see the justice of providing for the widows and orphans of one class in the army and not for those of another. It was both mean and impolitic in a generation like this, to send round a begging box, calling on the public to do that which he maintained the State was bound to do. They ought to have a statement made by some Member of the Government as to what was intended to be done with the sum collected from the public bounty. The disposition of the Patriotic Fund at the end of the last war had been very unsatisfactory, a surplus of something like 80,000*l.* having remained, which, he believed, eventually found its way to the National Debt Office. He could not resist bearing testimony on this occasion to the kindly sympathies and indefatigable zeal of Major Powys, who had provided for hundreds of women and children, who, but for his exertions and the liberality of the gentlemen associated with him, would now be starving in our streets, or pining the existence out in workhouses. He trusted the Government would manage the fund in the most careful manner.

MR. SHAFTO ADAIR said, that as a member of the Executive Committee of the Patriotic Fund, he fully concurred in the testimony paid by the hon. and gallant Member for Oxfordshire to the success which had attended Major Powys's exertions. With regard to what had been done by the Royal Commission, he could state that the Committee had, after much consideration, prepared a scale of relief for the warrant officers and sailors of the navy, and for the privates and non-commissioned officers of the army and the Marines, which would come into operation from the previous day—March 1. The Committee had been most anxious to meet the wishes of the donors, and with this view had thought it their duty, in the first instance, to provide for the widows and orphans of the classes he had mentioned. There would, however, be doubtless many cases of urgent necessity arising amongst the widows and orphans of commissioned officers, which, if the terms of the warrant permitted, the Committee would gladly relieve; and he thought if it were generally known that the Royal Commissioners were prohibited by the terms of the warrant from so appropriating any portion of the money, the public would contribute to a special fund, to be devoted to that purpose. He was glad to see that so much sympathy existed in the objects of the fund, not merely in this country, but in all parts of the world almost. That morning the noble chairman of the Commission had reported a large contribution from a number of Chinese gentlemen who were engaged in the Singapore trade, and a considerable contribution from Mahomedan families in the East Indies. He could assure the Committee that in the distribution of the money, the utmost pains would be taken to carry out the intentions of the contributors, and that none but fitting objects would be relieved, regard being always had to the immediate wants of the applicants.

LORD ALFRED PAGET said, he was desirous of knowing whether there was any intention that the widows and children of officers who died in the service should receive either the value of the commissions of those officers or any compensation in lieu of such value? It was said that there was not a colonel at Inkerman or Balaklava who had not from 8,000*l.* to 12,000*l.* hung round his neck. The meaning of this was, that if officers of that rank were killed in action those amounts would be sacrificed. The fact was, that an officer who gave the full price for his commission did not get more for his money than if he had invested it in London and North-Western Railway shares. He had a relative in the Guards in the Crimea, who was a widower with four children, who was present at Alma and Inkerman, and if he lost the value of his commission he would lose nearly all that he had in the world. A brother of his was in command of a regiment of cavalry in the charge at Balaklava; had he been killed in that action his widow would only have had a very trifling sum left for her subsistence. He thought it could not be known that cases of this kind existed, or some compensation would be given to the families of officers who died on service for the value of their commissions.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, he was most unwilling to say anything which might seem disparaging with respect to the claim of the private soldiers of our army to the gratitude of their country, but he must remind the Committee that during a time of war the compassionate feelings of the country were very deeply excited by the sacrifices and sufferings of our soldiers and officers, and that the Government were called upon to be liberal, and even profuse, in affording assistance to them and to their families. But if the Government yielded to this pressure, the consequence was, that at the termination of the war they were charged with being extravagant and forgetful of the economical interests of the country. It had been said that in this Vote there was a great anomaly, as it did not recognise the claims of the widows and orphans of private soldiers and non-commissioned officers, but that it recognised only the claims of widows and children of officers. Now, it should be recollect that no provision was made for the orphan children of officers, but that a liberal provision was made for the children of soldiers. The House had recently granted the sum of 23,367*l.* for the education and maintenance of the children of soldiers, and no less a number than between 800 or 900 boys were provided for. Hon. Members should remember that the subject was not so one-sided as they seemed to think. The principle of this Vote was, however, that of affording some compensation to the widows of officers who died in the service for the value of the commissions of such officers. If an officer sold out of the army he realised the value of his commission, and this Vote had been adopted in order that, when officers died in the service, their widows might receive some compensation in lieu of the value of their husbands' commissions.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he must remind the Committee that he had made a calculation of the loss sustained by the wives and families of officers who had died since May last, and he found that no less than 365,000*l.* had been lost to them by the war. It was therefore the duty of the Government to bring forward a liberal scale of compensation for the widows and children of officers. At present their means of living were severely scrutinised, with a view of cutting down the miserable pittance which they were entitled to receive. He hoped the Parliament of England would provide some compensation for the losses which were sustained in the country's service.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he could not help feeling, as he was sure every man felt, that a very great hardship was inflicted upon the widows and children of officers who sacrificed their lives in the service of their country. If an officer disgraced himself, then his commission and the value of it ought to be forfeited; but when he fell in battle, then provision should be made by the country for his widow and children. He, for one, would deprecate most sincerely the view taken that the widows and children of officers were entitled to participate in the Patriotic Fund, as that fund was not subscribed for them, but for widows and children of the non-commissioned officers and privates of the army. The country would expect that the fund should be strictly limited to the purposes for which it was collected. But he felt that it was a case of desperate hardship upon the widows and children of officers killed in battle, that at the moment when they were deprived of husbands and fathers they should be also deprived of the means of living. He thought that Parliament was bound to consider this hardship, and provide a remedy.

COLONEL NORTH said, with regard to expending the Patriotic Fund in the way stated by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), he might mention that Mr. Cunard gave 500*l.* upon the express condition that the widows of officers were to receive part. He felt that if any class ought to be benefited by the fund it was the widows and orphans of officers. He would do all in his power to press upon the Commissioners the necessity of giving some provision to the widows of officers.

MR. OTWAY said, he wished to call the attention of the Committee to the case of the late Colonel Moore, who had met his death in a transport vessel en route to the Crimea. That gallant officer, who refused to leave the burning ship while one of his men remained on board, had paid 14,000*l.* for his various steps; and yet the pension which his widow received was only 90*l.* a year. He would like to see the purchase-money of officers' commissions returned to their families, in case of their death in the service.

MR. BELLEW said, he was willing to provide for the widows of soldiers who had been killed in the service. At the same time he should like to see some measure for providing for the families of soldiers who died either in battle, or from disease in the service of their country.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, such a measure would be a very fit subject for consideration.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he could not conceive the case of an officer not actually killed in action, but who died two or three days after receiving a wound in the trenches. Would not his widow and children have a fair claim to rank with those whose husbands and parents had died in action?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, the terms of the warrant would be relative to meet such cases.

CAPTAIN ARCHDALE said, having served under the late gallant Colonel Moore, he wished to state that, although his wife would only be entitled to a pension of 10*l.* by the regulations of the service, yet, considering his distinguished bravery and mode of his death, the Government raised the pension to 200*l.*, and the Queen had added another 100*l.* to that sum.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he must request the Committee to consider what had been suggested by his friend the Under Secretary of War. In the present moment, when operations were going on, and when the generous feelings of the public were excited by the gallant deeds of our officers and soldiers, the national impulse was to deal liberally and generously in all those matters that concerned the families of the officers and soldiers of the army. Pensions for wounded widows, and provisions for orphans were liberally made. But on the return of peace, Committees were appointed to inquire into the amount of the Army Estimates, and Reports were made as to the great and heavy amount of the charge. The Government was then urged to pare down and diminish the provisions made in the moment of liberality, and the allowances made were taken away on the plea of economical prudence. The House of Commons ought, therefore, to preserve the greatest caution not to embark in grants which might be irksome to the country afterwards to maintain, and which they could not, in good faith or without causing serious disappointment, take away or diminish. That applied especially to the proposition made for pensions to the widow of soldiers. What had just happened was an instance how these grants would increase. The first suggestion was to pension suitably the widows of soldiers killed in action. Then another Motion proposed that pensions ought to be given to the widows of all soldiers who died of disease in the service of their country, whether in time of war or of peace. He hoped these matters would be left to the discretion of the Government, because the Committee might feel sure that the Government shared in those feelings of gratitude for the services of officers and men which the country entertained. But it must be kept in mind that it was neither wise nor prudent—that it really was not conferring a benefit on any class—to grant one day what on a future day they would take away. In the last war there were a great many grants given, and afterwards narrowed and cut down by successive Committees and votes of that House. Of course that created great disappointment to the class to which it was applied. The grants to the upper classes might be so diminished, but if grants were made to the widows of soldiers, and not permanently maintained, great injury would be done to the service, and great disappointment would be created among those classes from which the army was recruited.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he trusted that, if an officer did that which caused him to lose his commission, he deserved to lose his position in society also. He was very happy when he saw an instance of a man expelled from a regiment when he had done that which deserved such expulsion. Such a course exalted them in the eyes of those whom they commanded.

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON said, he was sorry to say that these commissions were given sometimes as a mere matter of patronage, while a fund might be created from such commissions wherewith to relieve the widows.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he regretted to find that the noble Lord at the head of the Government had not fairly treated this matter. The noble Lord was afraid that if that House granted provision for the wife and child of the soldier, it would be cut down by the economists in that House. Now, he (Mr. Maguire) denied that any economist would cut down that which should be fairly given. The Under Secretary of War had remarked that the State did make a provision. Now, as far as he could see, it was more a matter of sale and bargain than anything else. It was a subject of the greatest importance, forced as it now was upon the mind of the country, and deserved to be brought prominently before the House; and if no other Member brought it forward, he should do so himself on some occasion before the close of the Session.

COLONEL GREVILLE said, that the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the War Department had stated that evening, in answer to a question which he had put to him, that the rate of pay, in the case of the clergymen of the Church of England and the Roman Catholic chaplains in the Crimea, was somewhat in proportion to the scale of living to which the clergymen of the two Churches were accustomed. Now, he wished to ask the hon. Gentleman what his idea was of the scale of living of the Roman Catholic chaplain to Kilmainham Hospital, for whom last year a salary of 50*l.* had been provided, but for whom no allowance was set down in the Estimates this year?

MR. VANCE said, he wished to know how it was that, while there was accommodation for 300 persons in Kilmainham Hospital, provision was made for only 144 persons?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, he was not aware why there had been an omission in the Estimates this year with reference to the salary of the Roman Catholic chaplain at Kilmainham. If that clergyman continued to discharge the same duties as last year, he saw no reason why he should not receive the same amount of salary.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that the duties of the Protestant clergyman at Kilmainham were of a much more onerous description than those of the Roman Catholic chaplain.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that while the Protestant clergyman at Kilmainham had no other source of income than that which he derived from the discharge of the duties connected with his office there, the Roman Catholic chaplain had, besides his salary, certain parochial dues.

MR. BELLEW said, that the voluntary contributions of parishioners depended very much on the amount of attention from the clergyman, and the Roman Catholic chaplain of Kilmainham had very little time to give to external duties.

MR. I. BUTT said, he wished to know if the rumour that it was the intention of the Government to reduce the establishment at Kilmainham was correct? The warrant of 1845 ordered that there should be four resident captains, and 700 in-door pensioners, in that institution. The noble Lord the present Secretary of War had, however, undertaken, upon his own responsibility, to make a reduction in that number some years ago. That order of the noble Lord had, however, been rescinded by a Resolution of that House upon a Motion which he about two years since had had the honour to propose. But the right hon. Gentleman the late Secretary at War had not acted in accordance with that Resolution, and the number of inmates in the hospital at Kilmainham had continued at the number to which it had been reduced by the order of Lord Panmure. He thought the right hon. Gentleman might be considered to have committed petty larceny in that respect, the original order having been little short of downright robbery. He wished, therefore, to learn what were the intentions of the Government upon the subject.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that the present was a time at which, instead of reducing the establishment at Kilmainham, increased accommodation should be provided. It was perfectly clear that there would be, during the war, a great number of wounded soldiers for whom such accommodation would be found necessary.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, that it was not the intention of Government to make any reduction in the establishment at Kilmainham at present.

COLONEL GREVILLE said, that to give the Catholic chaplain at Kilmainham only one-fifth of the salary which was received by the Protestant clergyman, was not placing them in the same favourable position as that in which they stood in the Crimea, where their salary was one-half.

MR. VANCE said, he would beg to ask, what was the meaning of the sum of 50*l.* on a former Vote if it was not for a Roman Catholic chaplain?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL: That was for the widow of the Protestant chaplain.

Vote agreed to; as were also the two remaining Votes—

(9.) 38,700*l.*, Superannuation allowances.

MEMBERS' QUALIFICATION.

MR. MURROUGH said, he would beg to ask for leave to introduce a Bill to abolish the Property Qualification of Members of Parliament. He hoped that that late hour (ten minutes past two o'clock) the House would extend to him the courtesy of permitting his Bill to be introduced without his making any statement in its support on that occasion.

MR. W. WILLIAMS seconded the Motion.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he trusted that no such courtesy as the hon. Gentleman had asked for would be granted him. This was a very serious question and he thought that it ought not to be considered in the absence of the majority of the leading Members of the Government. If it were advisable to introduce such a Bill, it ought to be proposed by the Government, and not by an individual Member.

MR. HADFIELD said, he should support the measure. He thought there was no justice in having a qualification for Ireland and none for Scotland. He objected to a property qualification altogether, as he believed that by reason of it many good men were excluded from that House.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought that the Bill was part of the larger question of reform, and had better be deferred until the great measure which the Government had promised to introduce after the conclusion of the war. The question had often fallen to the ground when left to stand by itself, that it would be a charity to refuse leave to introduce the hon. Member's Bill.

COLONEL SIBTHORP said, he strongly opposed the Motion. He could not see and never had been able to see, what good reform had done the country. Talk of genius being excluded from the House by the property qualification—give him property—give him men who, having property of their own to take care of, would take care of other people's as well. He only wished the property qualification were ten times greater, and then the House would be more respectable than it was. At present, we are a company without a shire among us. For the House of Commons as a body he entertained a high respect.

but there were those among them whom he could only look upon as belonging to the tagrag and bobtail of society. They were a sort of mixed company, and, if such a measure as that which was now proposed were adopted, the people of England would laugh at them and say they were only fit to be a set of scavengers. He had been a Member of the House of Commons for twenty-six years, and was sorry to say that he found it going down, and sinking lower in respectability every Session. Keep up the respectability of the House of Commons by property men, and the people at large would be more satisfied that their true interests were protected.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he certainly could not undertake to oppose the measure on the grounds which had been urged by the hon. and gallant Colonel. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Murrough) had requested to introduce his Bill without prefacing it by any statement; now such a course was only allowed as a matter of courtesy, when any hon. Member brought forward a Bill, the provisions of which were unknown to the House. This was not a case of that sort, because everybody knew the nature of the measure which the hon. Member proposed. For his own part, he differed from the hon. Gentleman, for, although in Scotland no qualification for Members was required, that arose out of the Act of Union, and was an exception to the rule applicable to England and Ireland. He did not think there was any logic in an attempt to make the rule bend to the exception; but this was not the moment to enter into any detailed reasons why it seemed to him that it was not such a measure as it was desirable should be adopted. He would take the broad principle, that if any changes were to be proposed in the representative system of the country, there was an understanding that those changes should not be proposed now, but should be postponed to another period. On that ground, therefore, he should object to the introduction of the Bill.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he did not think there was much force in the argument of the noble Lord, that, because the practice which obtained in Scotland was an exception to the rule that was established in England and Ireland, therefore it ought not to be introduced into those countries. The question was, whether the non-qualification principle worked well in Scotland. He contended that it did; and if so, there was no reason why it should not work equally well in other parts of the United Kingdom. After the decision of the Barnstaple Election Committee, it was impossible to stand by the principle of a property qualification.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he could not concur in the argument of the hon. and learned Member, that, because the non-qualification principle worked well in Scotland, therefore it ought to be adopted in England and Ireland. The civil law no doubt also worked well in Scotland, but was that a reason why it should be introduced into this country?

MR. MURROUGH, in reply, said that the obstructive power of the House was very great in regard to such measures as this; but his only chance for this Bill was to press it to a division now. The hon. Member for Antrim (Mr. Macartney) had said that if they wanted a comprehensive system of reform they must look to the Government of which the noble Lord was the head; but he would ask any one who had heard that night the speech of that noble Lord, the soi-disant leader of a Liberal party, whether he could be so deluded as to expect large measures of Parliamentary reform from him. And how could the noble Lord have spoken thus, remembering that within his own Parliamentary experience Mr. Priusep, the East India director, with far larger property than most of the Members of that House, and Mr. Wilberforce, at another period, were unseated on technicalities, and that there was a petition to Parliament, of the most vexatious description, against the Attorney General for Ireland, who was a member of his own Government? That hon. and learned Gentleman, at least, ought to step forward and assist in carrying this measure. He knew that Cabinets were often divided in opinion upon the question of Parliamentary reform; and some liberal members of the Government ought to support an independent Member in a Motion of this description. The Bill which he now proposed only followed that which was introduced formerly by an hon. Gentleman lately the Member for Devonport, and he did not ask the House to bind itself to the principle, but to allow the Bill to be brought in, and its details to be discussed.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Leave be given to bring in a Bill to abolish the Property Qualification of Members of Parliament."

The House divided:—Ayes 27; Noes 28: Majority 1.

SECRETARIES OF STATE (HOUSE OF COMMONS) BILL.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he would now move for leave to bring in a Bill to enable a third Secretary and third Under Secretary of State to sit in the House of Commons. By an Act of 6 Anne, and 15 Geo. II., no more than two Secretaries of State could sit in the House of Commons; and by 22 Geo. III. it was doubtful whether a third Under Secretary could sit in the Commons. There being now four Secretaries of State, it might be conducive to the public service if more than two Secretaries and two Under Secretaries of State could sit in the House of Commons.

Leave given. Bill ordered to be brought in by Viscount PALMERSTON and Sir GEORGE GREY.

Bill read 1<sup>o</sup>.

EDUCATION IN INDIA.

LORD MONTEAGLE said, that in rising to move for the papers of which he had given notice, he was anxious to state the grounds which led him to bring these papers under the notice of the House. In all cases in which important changes had been effected in our laws or system of government, it behoved us to pause and to review carefully the working of our new measures in order to form a judgment of their success. This, though very generally true, is peculiarly so in a case like the present. He would remind their Lordships that Parliament had recently passed an Act which entirely remodelled the Government of India. It was into the operation of that Act in one of its most important parts, that he proposed to inquire; for the consequences of British legislation on Indian interests demanded the especial and constant care and superintendence of Parliament; for their Lordships would find, on looking back to the way in which former Acts of Parliament relating to India had been carried into effect, that many enactments, on which great reliance had been placed, and from which reforms of the most important character had been expected, in practice had been totally set aside by those who were charged with their administration; and this have seen done almost as soon as the laws were passed. At other times have seen them carried out in a manner which defeated the intentions of those who had framed them. He could cite many instances in illustration of this proposition. For instance, the Act of 1813, renewing the Charter of the East India Company contained many enactments of great importance, some of which were practically set aside as soon as passed. The provision contained in that Act, which directed that an annual sum should be set aside and applied for the purpose of education in India, had been either forgotten or neglected by the East India Company until, after many years, the fact transpired during the proceedings of a Commission appointed to consider the question of education; and it was not till then that the default on the part of the East India Company was even attempted to be corrected. Even then, it was done reluctantly, and inadequately corrected. In the same way, under the Charter Act of 1833, that important clause, the 87th passed distinctly with the view of opening the appointment to offices in India, without distinction of caste, colour, or birth to all subjects of the Crown, had been repealed in practice. Another most important clause of the same Charter Act had also been set aside in like manner. An especial mode was prescribed for admitting persons into the civil service of the Company, and providing for their education at Haileybury. The candidates, who were to be appointed by the nomination of the East India Directors, with the proviso, however, that three or four candidates were to be named for every vacancy, and the appointment should only be conferred on him who proved his competency after a fair struggle with his rivals, similarly recommended. This clause also, had been totally set aside by the East India Company. Instances like these, I thought, established the importance that Parliament should inquire from time to time, and closely watch whether the laws which it passed were properly obeyed by the public servants charged with their administration in a distant country, and who were neither under the eye nor subject to the control of the Home Government. He would now proceed to describe the paper for which he intended to move. The first was a letter written to the Government of India on the 15th of July, 1854, for the purpose of providing a general system of education for the people of India. The Act under which that letter was written had received the Royal Assent in August, 1853, nearly one year before. But he did not complain of the time which had elapsed between the date of the letter and the passing of the Act; on the contrary, he thought the late President of the Board of Control had acted most prudently in taking time for consideration. This was required both for communicating with the Court of Directors and with the authorities in India, whose concurrence no doubt had been obtained, before he drew up the Minute. Parliament was not informed officially to whom the great merit of this measure was due. The divided system left it in doubt whether it was attributable to the Company or to the Board of Control. He felt himself therefore free to choose, and therefore preferred to trace it to the hand of an old colleague and valued Friend (Sir C. Wood), late President of the Board. With respect to the document itself, he could not find words to express his sense of its importance, or his admiration for the able and statesmanlike manner in which it had been drawn up. A more interesting document, or one more honourable to the statesman who framed it, had never in his judgment been brought under the notice of Parliament. It left no part of the question of education in India untouched, and it dealt with every branch of the subject judiciously and effectually. He thought, moreover, that this document was of the utmost importance, as finally and absolutely disposing of a question which even in our own times had been in some quarters treated as a matter of considerable doubt—whether the education of the people of India was a task which England ought to charge herself with, or whether, on the contrary, it was to be viewed as an undertaking full of danger and peril to British supremacy. His opinion, he need hardly say, on the point entirely coincided with that of his noble Friend (Lord Glenelg), who, on one occasion, when the subject was brought under discussion, declared with generous indignation that if the dominion of England was to be maintained only by keeping the people of India in a state of ignorance and debasement, the sooner it was abandoned the better for all parties.

The letter he now moved for, and the evidence on which it was founded, settled the question authoritatively and for ever. Besides, it is made clear that it was now beyond the power of those who opposed education in India to arrest it. The progress of education is now irresistible, and it is advancing and extending with great rapidity among the people of India. Sir Charles Wood, therefore, deserved the national gratitude equally of England and India, for having interposed at the time and to the extent he has done; realising as he has by this document a general system of education for the people of India. His plan is complete in all its parts, the highest as well as the lowest, from his scheme of rural or village schools, to collegiate establishments, and completed by an enlarged system of university education. With respect to the combined relation of religion and education, many persons who entered upon the last Indian Committee, did so with an impression that the Government of India and the educational authorities might be made instrumental in spreading the Christian religion among the Natives. He believed he might add, that all had left the Committee with the conviction that such connection would be detrimental to the interests of religion itself, would impede the progress of knowledge, and endanger the tranquillity of the British Empire in India. All who had considered the question were of opinion that it would be better both for the interests of education and the interests of religion, that Government should not be connected with the active propagation of any religion, which was to be left in much better hands—namely, in the assiduous and disinterested efforts of the missionaries. The Government was too powerful to undertake these duties without raising jealousy and suspicion. The masters of ten legions could never safely undertake the duties of Christian Apostles. He wished, on this subject, to obtain the opinion of the eminent man now Governor-General. It was probable that some correspondence had taken place, both previous and subsequently to the date of this Minute, and he trusted that, if such was the case, that portion of the correspondence to which there was no objection would be also laid upon the table. He moved for these papers in no spirit of hostile feeling—quite the contrary; but he was anxious to see how the suggestions of the President of the Board of Control had been received in India, and how far the Government of India was disposed to carry them out.

The next paper for which he was about to move was of a different description; and although there was much in it to admire, he regretted to say that he also found much from which he must withhold his consent. Their Lordships would remember that by the late Act the exclusive nomination by the Directors of the East India Company to the civil service was abolished, and a system of free competition and open examination established in its stead. At present this examination was for admission into the College at Haileybury, where a special education was provided and carefully administered for the civil service:—but it now appeared, by this paper, that it was proposed hereafter to put an end to the College at Haileybury, and to admit into the civil service candidates who passed a successful competing examination, substituting such examination for an established course of education and discipline. This, he thought, was a doubtful matter. By the Act of last Session the Board of Control was called on to frame rules under which these candidates were to be hereafter admitted to the civil service; and the Board had in consequence appointed a Commission on which were names of men entitled to the greatest deference and calculated to carry with them the strongest weight. These Commissions, of whom it was only necessary to name Mr. Macaulay and his hon. Friend now at the table of their Lordships' House, Mr. J. Lefevre, were called on to collect information and to advise the Government on this point. He confessed that he expressed any difference of opinion from such high authorities with great distrust; but he considered this paper, with respect to the open competition for the Indian civil service, to be liable to considerable objections, and as likely to act injuriously to the Natives of India, contrary, he trusted, to the intentions of the Commissioners. This was the more objectionable, inasmuch as he knew not in what spirit these rules might be carried out. If the intentions of the Commissioners were such as might be collected, not from their high character, but from the words of the paper for which he moved, they would go far to defeat the entire policy of last year. The point to which he referred was no less than the free eligibility of the Natives of India to political offices in civil service. The words contained in original Act of Parliament were enough—

"that no Native of the said territories, no natural-born subject of Her Majesty born there shall by reason of his birth be disabled from any place, office, or employment under said Company."

But we had witnessed an attempt with but too much success to exclude natives from the most valuable offices, drawing a distinction between covenant and uncovenanted servants of the Company; but no such distinction really existed in the Act, and no one had the right to create such a distinction. The violation of the spirit and the letter of 87th section had been persevered in twenty long years. The principle was not disclaimed, it is true, and abandoned. The noble Earl (Earl Granville) who had charge of the Bill repudiated it boldly and unreservedly. The declaratory clause which he (Lord Monteagle) had moved, settling the question at rest, was objected to, and withdrawn only as being unnecessary. But Parliament beware lest one system of exclusion should be substituted for another equally fatal and equally hostile to Native interests. There were also other means of exclusion, which might be adopted under these regulations for the examination of candidates for the civil service; and he thought he should be able to show their Lordships that the course of examination was so framed—he would not say so intended—as to exclude the Native of India whilst admitting the European. There were two examinations of candidates; one for admission, and the other after a certain period of time had been passed in study, in order that the progress made by the students and their relative proficiency might be judged of. He very much feared that the effect of those examinations would be, that while the statute enacted that no man should be excluded by reason of caste, colour, birth, or parentage, that exclusion might be equally well effected by their course of examination. The proficiency of the candidate under examination was to be designated by marks of honour, of which the total number was 6,875. Of this number, however, 2,625 were given for the Latin, Greek, French, German, and Italian languages. He certainly did not think that the natives of England and the natives of India would stand upon an equal footing in this branch of examination; to call upon the latter to enter into competition with the former in respect to the dead and modern languages of Europe, was absurd, and not consistent with fair play. He had no doubt that under this course of examination the natives of India would be unfairly dealt with, if not excluded. It might, perhaps, be said that the natives of India enjoyed correlative advantages over Englishmen, inasmuch as they would have a superiority in the examinations in Oriental knowledge and languages. But this was very far from being the case. The vernacular languages of the East were omitted altogether, while Sanscrit and Arabic only were included. More than doubts, however, had been expressed by some of the most experienced men, whether any great advantage was to be derived from the study of those, the learned languages of India. The knowledge of the vernacular languages was of importance, but the other two languages, though useful to scholars in the same way that the Anglo-Saxon dialects were useful to scholars in England, were comparatively unimportant in the political administration of the Indian Empire. But, waiving this argument, presuming them to be important, there was an unfairness in the plan laid down, inasmuch as that, while in the course of examination 2,625 marks of honour were given to Englishmen for proficiency in the Greek, Latin, French, German, and Italian languages, only 750 marks, being less than one-third of the numbers, were to be given to the natives of India in respect to the Sanscrit and Arabic languages. That could not fail to operate in some cases as a most unjust exclusion of the natives of India from the civil service of the Company. Then there were to be 1,500 marks assigned to success in the examination in English. To this he did not object, considering it quite right that the Indian candidates should be exposed to the freest competition in our literature. But it was somewhat curious that the whole of the examinations in history were to be in English history, and that there was to be no examination in the history of India till the period of the second examination was reached, from which Indians might be excluded by the European characteristics of the first examination. He had already shown that, with references to modern and ancient literature, the Hindoo and Parsee would not be admitted, unless honours were obtained to the extent of 2,625 marks in studies exclusively European, thus forming, as he believed, a practical exclusion. For mathematics, pure and mixed, and for natural and moral sciences, there were 2,000 marks, and to that there could be no objection—in these branches the European and Native might justly be placed on terms of perfect equality; but a general view of the case induced him to believe that, though the paper in which this scheme was laid down was prepared with consummate ability, the scheme for the examination paper was framed without the slightest possible reference to any one Native establishment, or the interests of any native of India. It is stated that the interests and the course of study at Oxford and Cambridge had been considered. What he complained of was, that the interests of the Hindoos and Mahomedan colleges had been forgotten or neglected. He might, however, be mistaken, and he could assure their Lordships that nothing would give him greater pleasure than to get an assurance from Her Majesty's Government that in the framing of those papers there had been no intention unfairly to exclude from the benefits intended for them by Parliament, any one of the Indian subjects of Her Majesty who should prove himself to be deserving.

There only remained one other subject to which he would refer. He had said that the noble Earl (Earl Granville) had been quite frank and unreserved in admitting that Lord William Bentinck's 87th clause did admit and was intended to admit Natives to the civil service, and that it was only a forced construction that would exclude them under the terms of that Act. He admitted, in a manner equally distinct and unqualified, that the same was the intention and import of the present Charter Act. This is now beyond all doubt and cavil by what has since occurred, and which has broken down once and for ever the distinction between the covenanted and uncovenanted service, and the consequent and unjust, if not illegal, exclusion of the natives of India. A very extraordinary illustrative case had since occurred which did great honour and credit to a native of India. It was the case of a young Indian of high caste, a Brahmin, who, having gone through a most successful course of instruction for the medical profession, both in India and in Europe, had, notwithstanding his high proficiency, been refused by the East India Company to be admitted as one of their civil servants. The East India Directors had been parties to Lord W. Bentinck's clause admitting Hindoos to all offices whatever, without reference to birth, religion, or caste; and yet they refused to confer an appointment on this gentleman, on the ground that the applicant for it was a native of India, and that the office which he sought, and for which he was pre-eminently qualified, was a covenanted office. This gentleman, however, whose perseverance and nobleness of heart in contending against the cruel opposition to which he was exposed, did him the highest honour, though compelled to return to India rejected and disappointed, was nothing daunted, and had, at last, succeeded in his object, and had been admitted under the new Act as a civil covenant-ed servant of the Company. This gentle-man was Dr. Chuckerbutty. His history is most curious and instructive, and will, it may be hoped, serve as an encouragement to his fellow countrymen. At the early age of six or seven he had made great pro-gress at a Native school in the Native languages. Struck with the appearance and evident superiority of a European who accidentally visited the village, the Hindoo child determined to learn English; and, accordingly, packing up his few articles of clothing in a handkerchief, with a small quantity of parched rice, he left his home and travelled on foot to a school at a considerable distance, where English was taught, and where, in consideration of his acting as cook, he received English les-sons. He passed from school to school, and from progress to progress, till, at last, his talents having excited attention, an offer was made to him that he should go to England to complete the study of medicine. He accordingly went to England, at the hazard of losing his caste, of losing the favour of friends in India, and the future chances of pro-motion there. He entered upon a course of instruction at University College, Lon-don, and carried off gold medals and cer-tificates of honour; and then applied for the appointment to which he was entitled, if the East India Directors had acted as they ought. He met with the generous and persevering support of Sir Edward Ryan and Mr. Cameron, who have now the consolation of being rewarded for the protection they gave to this noble-hearted Native. They sought to obtain for him an appointment of assistant-surgeon. That appointment was refused him; but he was not daunted; he went to the Conti-nent followed up his studies there, learned European languages, and afterwards re-turned to India, where he was appointed pro-fessor and lecturer in one of the many ful colleges that exist in the East, w-hich he gained new honours. When he un-derstood that by the Bill of last Session obstacles which had prevented him ob-taining the appointment he had applied for had been removed, he again sacrificed at least endangered, many important terests and everything that was dearest to him, and returned to England, not me-for the purpose of attaining the ob-ject of his own ambition, but of vindicating right of every one of his countrymen admission to civil employment under East India Company. He held in hand a letter from the Native gentle-men of whom he was speaking, addressed to Sir Edward Ryan, in which he said—

" You will see me soon in London, for I v-ant to compete for an assistant surgeonship there. I shall have to run many risks, but I will br-ing them. I will have to leave my family, my priv-ate practice, and my college appointment; in addi-tion to which, my trip will cost me from 5,000 to 6,000 rupees, a sum I am ill able to spare, es-sentially if I do not succeed. However, this is my last chance, for I shall be twenty-eight on next birthday, after which age candidates are eligible."

He added that " even if he failed, it would be a satisfaction to him that he had used his best efforts in the service of his cou-try, and that it was only a physical dif-ference thrown in his way which had been the cause of his disappointment and loss. He came over and succeeded; but he believed that meritorious man was indebted to the powerful interposition of the noble ar-gallant Viscount near him (Viscount Ha-dinge) for regaining, on his return to India, the appointment he had originally held there, but which, nevertheless, he would have been willing to relinquish in order to fight the battle of his countrymen. No-was this the only favour which he owed to his noble and gallant Friend. It had been said that there existed in India a great jealousy on the subject of the admission of Natives to such important positions in the public service. But this was a mistake. He was enabled to prove by one conclusive fact that this was no such thing. He (Lord Monteagle) had a letter from India, signed by exclusively British-born subjects in Calcutta, including Mr. Colville, Judge of the Supreme Court, Mr. Allen, Vice-President of the Legislative Council, Mr.

Lord Monteagle

Grant, a member of the Supreme Council, several Judges, Mr. Goodeve, the distinguished botanist and geologist—a letter with which they presented Dr. Chuckerbutty with a purse of 100 guineas, in order to assist him to come home on the last occasion of his visit to England, for the purpose, it should be remembered, of entering into competition with English candidates. In that letter they express “the hearty interest they feel for the success of his undertaking, and their warm approval of the determination he had formed, in spite of many obvious difficulties, of seeking, by open and honourable competition with Englishmen, to be the first native of India who has obtained a covenanted appointment under this empire.” They conclude by saying, “We sincerely hope, not only that you yourself may obtain success, but that you may be the pioneer of similar success to many others of your countrymen in future years.” He (Lord Monteagle) had also heard various objections to the appointment of Native assistant-surgeons, the one more stupid than the other. The appointment of a Native assistant-surgeon was refused on the ground that it was incompatible with the safety of their Indian dominions; and he had heard that no European, particularly of the other sex, would call in the aid of medical gentlemen of Hindoo caste. But these objections, even if really felt, which he doubted, would speedily vanish. He thanked their Lordships for the indulgence with which they had listened to his statement. He hoped the House would interpose to give effect to their own generous intentions—that they would enforce the operation of their own measure, and that such an interpretation would be given to the Act as would prevent any attempt at a system of exclusion. The subject was a very important one, and he should be gratified and comforted if it led only to a renewed admission from the Government that natives of India were really eligible for offices in the civil service, under what may now be termed the Constitutional Act of the Empire in the East, as interpreted by the framers of that Act, and confirmed by the victory won by the perseverance and intellectual superiority of the young Brahmin who so successfully fought the battle of his country. His Lordship concluded by moving—

“That there be laid before the House, Copies or Extracts of any Correspondence between the Board of Control, the Court of Directors of the East India Company, and the Authorities in India, on the Report, dated November 1854, on the Examination of Candidates for the Civil Service of the East India Company: Also, On the Letter as to the Company's College at Halleybury, and Regulations framed for the Examination of Candidates for Appointments to the Civil Service of the East India Company: And also, On the Despatch to the Government of India on the Subject of general Education in India.”

LORD ASHBURTON said, that the speech of the noble Lord was a direct censure on the Committee from which the Report proceeded; for it would be a most severe imputation if it could be made out either that they intended to exclude natives from the covenanted service, or that they had so blundered as accidentally to bring about that result. There most assuredly was no intention to exclude the natives of India from the covenanted service of the Company. The evidence of Sir E. Ryan bore directly upon the question at issue. Sir Edward had given it as his opinion that those examinations had been so framed as to leave very considerable advantages to the natives. He said that in a competition in English composition, history, and literature, some Indians surpassed English students; and he (Lord Ashburton) very well understood how that could be; it would be just as a stranger who visited London for a few days would have a better chance of success in an examination upon London antiquities than a Londoner would have who had lived all his life in London, without paying any attention to antiquarian research. An Indian spent in the study of the English language and literature all those years which an Englishman spent in the study of the classical languages. Certainly, with regard to Latin, Greek, French, German, and Italian, an Englishman would possess certain advantages; but in mathematics, pure and unmixed, Sir Edward Ryan said the chances of an Indian were superior, the Indian genius being more apt in that department than the English; and in natural and moral sciences his chances were quite equal; while in Arabic and Sanscrit their superiority was necessarily considerable. Therefore, he thought the noble Lord ought to feel a little relieved from the excess of anxiety under which he was labouring. The noble Lord seemed to throw some slight slur upon the insertion of the French, German, and Italian languages in the curriculum in question; but if he thought that that kind of knowledge was really and absolutely required of candidates, he was much mistaken. The object of the Commissioners, he believed, was to make the first examination a trial of strength, to bring out the qualities, whatever they might be, of every candidate who presented himself, no matter where he had begun or completed his studies, and no matter what the nature of those studies might have been. Whatever a man knew was to be brought out, and it was for that reason that so very extensive a list of requirements had been made up—it was sufficient if judgment and vigour of mind were exhibited with regard to any species of knowledge. If a man could show that he had exercised judgment and ability in the study of the German language, for instance, his knowledge, genius, and powers as displayed in that department would be counted to him. It was upon the same principle that the examination paper included Sanscrit and Arabic. If a man chanced to know Arabic, for instance, why should it be said to him, " You shall not have an opportunity of displaying the ability with which you have dipped into that language," for the object of the Commissioners was that whatever a man knew he should be enabled to come forward and show it? The Commissioners were most anxious that no one should be excluded from the competition, but that whatever candidates might have learned before, at London, Edinburgh, Dublin, or Aberdeen—whether they had studied French, or German, or Italian—if they showed that they had acquired correct knowledge on such matters and could exercise a satisfactory judgment upon that knowledge, they should be admitted as competitors. He (Lord Ashburton) entirely agreed with the earlier part of the speech of the noble Lord; he considered that there were many parts of the Act of last year which were of immense importance to the future interests of India, which would require the constant vigilance and superintendence on the part of the Legislature, as to the manner in which they were carried out, in order that they might be worked to good, and prevented from working mischief.

THE EARL OF ALBEMARLE expressed his gratification that the matter should have been brought under the consideration of the House by his noble Friend (Lord Monteagle). The attention of their Lordships was invited to two classes of persons who, in the legislation of this country, presented a strong contrast to each other—he referred to the assistant-surgeons and the civil servants of the East India Company.

Lord Ashburton

There was, however, this distinction between the two cases—that for the assistant-surgeon there were no medical college in India, so that it was necessary for them to come to England for a medical education. But, though there was no medical education to be obtained in India, there was a facility for obtaining an education to fit natives of that country for the civil service of India; and it was perfectly impossible that the wants of the civil service in India could be supplied by forty youths annually sent out from this country, and he thought it would be most unjust to compel them to come to this country in order to acquire that which they could obtain as readily at home. He ventured to express a hope that the new President of the Board of Control, whenever he had any occasion to leave Cannon Row for advice, would not go further than the Admiralty. He (the Earl of Albemarle) had a most thorough conviction that if the India Bill of 1853 had been brought forward at the close instead of the commencement of the reign of the late President (Sir C. Wood), the experience which his right hon. Friend had gained before he quitted the office would have enabled him to produce a much different measure. He recommended the new President of the Board of Control to take into his counsels the new Secretary of the Board, who, as President of the Reform Association, had made himself acquainted with the necessities and wants of India, and he trusted that the appointment of the new Secretary was intended by the Government as an earnest of their intention to do justice to the people of India. Seeing the virtual impossibility of the natives of India taking advantage of the Act of 1853, from which his noble Friend (Lord Ashburton) disclaimed any intention of excluding them, he hoped that the Government would take steps to enable the inhabitants of India to fit themselves for the civil service without coming over here; and he would suggest that a certain number of appointments should be placed at the disposal of the Governor-General of India, so that the natives of that country or any British-Indian might have an opportunity of obtaining their fair share of the patronage of the Indian Government, from which they were at present excluded.

LOD WYNFORD said, that when it was considered that the natives of India would come a distance of 10,000 miles for the purpose of availing themselves of any advantages which they might derive from the Act of 1853, it was to deceive them and to deceive ourselves to say that there was any fair competition as regarded them. Although the energy of one man had overcome the difficulties with which the subjects of India had to contend—and he trusted that the future success of Mr. Chuckerbutty would be proportionate to the sacrifices which he had made to attain it—yet the Act was a mockery as a general measure. In order to make the examination fair towards all parties concerned, the place of examination ought to be the place where the honours were to be acquired. From all that he could learn, he could not find that any Governor-General of India, any of the Directors of the East India Company, or any one experienced in the affairs of India, had been consulted in framing the measure now in operation, and he thought that something far more beneficial to the Government of India might have been devised if the attempt had been made.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that he thought one point had been lost sight of in this debate—that the object and the duty of Parliament, of the Government, and of the Gentlemen who signed the Report which had been so often alluded to, was, in the first instance, to find the ablest men to conduct the government of India. No doubt one very great advantage would be to admit the natives to a share in that Government, but he doubted very much the advantage of greatly increasing the number of natives who should be admitted to the civil service of India, if, by removing the scene of competition from here to India, we admitted those who had not had an opportunity of showing their possession of that energy of character and moral courage which they must now exhibit to qualify themselves for that service. The noble Lord had, in referring to the case of Mr. Chuckerbutty, borne handsome testimony to the sincere desire of the Government to promote the advancement of the natives of India. He (Earl Granville) took that opportunity of saying that the Government viewed the success of that gentleman with the highest satisfaction, not only because it was in itself a well-merited reward of his talents and exertions, but because it disproved the tenor of the remarks made by many of the witnesses who gave evidence before the Committee of two years ago, who, while they spoke most strongly in favour of the attainments, the powers, the application, and perseverance of the natives of India, yet denied them the very quality of moral courage which Mr. Chuckerbutty had so signally displayed. It was unnecessary for him to say one word in praise of the scheme of education which was founded on the Minute of the Board of Directors, because the praise bestowed upon that document appeared to be universal, and some curiosity had been manifested as to who was its author—the Board of Directors or the President of the Board of Control. Nor would it be regular for him to say from whom it emanated. All he could say was, that in all the great reforms which had been introduced into the government of India during the last two years—greater within the last two years than any which had been carried out for many years previously—the President of the Board of Control and the Board of Directors had gone together in the most cordial manner. It was not necessary for him to enter into the question of Haileybury College, because there would be another opportunity for doing so when the Bill with respect to it came before the House. He believed, however, that it was clear that under the 41st and 42nd clauses of the late Act, it was competent for the East India Company to admit into their service, persons who had not been to Haileybury; nor could he help observing that if the system of education carried on there was open to the objections of Earl Grenville forty years ago, it would be impossible to support it along with the new system of education. It was impossible to send men whose attainments already qualified them for professors, to an establishment which was little better than a private school. He thought that the names of the gentlemen who had been appointed by the Government to prepare the scheme of examination for the candidates for Indian appointments were a sufficient proof of their sincere desire for the success of the project, and for the admission of the natives of Hindostan to a share in the patronage of the Government. Was it likely that Mr. Macaulay, who at an interval of twenty years had made probably the two most eloquent speeches that ever were delivered in favour of the natives, would now have lent himself to interpose obstacles in the way of their being fairly admitted into the Company's service?—or that, from want of sagacity, and of knowledge of what the natives could do, he should have produced a scheme which would be practically ineoperative in that respect? The mistake made by those who had animadverted upon that scheme was this—they treated the whole number of marks allotted to the various subjects introduced in the Report as if it was one likely to be obtained by any single candidate. Now, the Report of the Commissioners stated that they did not expect any candidate could take more than half the total number, and, for himself, he (Earl Granville) did not think there was much chance of any candidate obtaining one-third. A great experiment had been entrusted to these gentlemen, and what had been done by the Commissioners and by the Government was, they had framed what they thought the very best scheme which, under present circumstances, could be adopted for the purpose of making this great experiment. There was no pretension on their part that the number of marks they had laid down as necessary should be kept unalterable, like the laws of the Medes and of the Persians, or that the limitation as to age should, under all circumstances, be strictly adhered to. All he asserted was, that, most honestly and, as he believed, most ably, the attempt had been made to render this the best possible scheme; and he had been informed, on very good authority, that one, if not more, of the natives of India would compete the very next year for the high prizes offered to them.

LORD MONTEAGLE briefly replied, expressing his satisfaction at the discussion which had taken place, and at the sentiments which had been expressed by the noble Earl who had addressed the House on the part of the Government.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, March 5, 1855.

MINUTES.] New Warr.—For Barnstaple, v. John Laurie, Esq., void Election.
PUBLIC BILLS.—2<sup>d</sup> Tea Duties Decline Suspension; Purchasers' Protection against Judgments; Secretaries and Under Secretaries of State (House of Commons).

EDUCATION IN THE ARMY—QUESTION.

MR. EWART said, he wished to ask the hon. Under Secretary of State for War whether there could be laid before the House any statement of the measures now adopted for further promoting the education and professional competency of officers in the army; also of any measures adopted for giving useful and practical instruction to non-commissioned officers privates?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, that he had no objection to produce a statement showing the system of regimental schools and the nature of the examination which officers had to undergo before obtain their first commissions. The larger measure, however, which had been contemplated last year, had been left in abeyance for some time, but was at present being taken up by Her Majesty's Government.

MEDICAL OFFICERS IN THE CRIMEA QUESTION.

MR. LAYARD said, he wished to ask the hon. Under Secretary of State for War whether any brigade and divisional orders had been issued in the army before Sebastopol, to the effect "that no questions must be answered by medical men attached to the forces without permission from head-quarters;" whereby medical men attached to the army were precluded from giving complete evidence to the Commission sent out to the East to inquire into the state of the medical department. Also, whether it was true that Dr. Lawson had been appointed to the superintendence of, or to any other high employment in, the hospitals of Scutari, Smyrna or Rhodes; and, if so, by whose authority such appointment was made, and whether it had been sanctioned by the authorities at home?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that he would answer the first question of his hon. Friend, and his hon. Friend the Under Secretary for War would reply to the second. Her Majesty's Government had received no official information of any such divisional or brigade orders as those to which his hon. Friend had alluded; but they had been informed by private correspondence that some such orders had been issued. He could only assure his hon. Friend that their meaning must have been that the medical officers were not to place themselves in communication with the Commission without authority so to do. He could not possibly conceive that the orders could have gone to the extent of interfering with the function of the Commission in obtaining every information necessary for the due performance of their duties. But his noble Friend as the head of the War Department had lately written out to inquire how the matter stood. At the present moment all that the Government knew about it was contained in a private letter, which, of course, could not be relied upon as being quite accurate or very minute in its details.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, that in reply to the second question of the hon. Member for Aylesbury, he had to state that Lord Raglan, about the middle of January, had directed Dr. Lawson to proceed to the hospital at Scutari, where he had been placed in a subordinate capacity under the orders of Dr. Cumming, who was at the head of that hospital. There was no intention on the part of Government to place Dr. Lawson in charge of any hospital.

MR. LAYARD : Am I to understand Dr. Lawson was merely sent from the Crimea to the hospital, but not to take charge of it?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL : The general orders were, that he should proceed to Scutari and report himself to the officer at the head of the hospital, but not to take charge in any way.

MR. LAYARD : Was he not sent away from the Crimea after an investigation on a charge of misconduct? That is what I meant by the question.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL : He was sent from the Crimea after he was censured in a general order by Lord Raglan.

THE APPOINTMENT OF DR. MEYER— QUESTION.

MR. PERCY said, he would take that opportunity of calling the attention of his right hon. Friend the Member for South Wiltshire (Mr. S. Herbert) to a statement which had appeared in one of the public journals, that Dr. Meyer, who had been appointed to the direction of one of our hospitals in the East, was a German gentleman who was not possessed of any diploma, and whose only qualifications for the situation to which he had been appointed were, that he had managed a lunatic asylum abroad, and had attended with some regularity the levees of His Royal Highness Prince Albert. He wished to ask his right hon. Friend whether there was any truth in this statement?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he was in some degree responsible for the appointment of Dr. Meyer, because he recommended him to his noble Friend now at the head of the War Office (Lord Panmure). There must be some great misapprehension, because Dr. Meyer was an Englishman, born at Norwood, near London. He was educated at Hammeramith, afterwards at Eton, and studied the medical profession at Guy's Hospital. He was a member of the College of Surgeons, where he passed his examination with great distinction, and had been at the head of large establishments in Norfolk Island and Van Diemen's Land. He (Mr. S. Herbert) believed that he was very favourably known at the Colonial Office; and so far from his having attended the levees of Prince Albert, he informed him (Mr. S. Herbert) that he had never had the honour in the course of his life of seeing His Royal Highness.

EDUCATION IN THE ARMY.

Order for Committee of Supply read.
Motion made and question proposed,
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. RICH said, he had intended to move for a Committee to inquire into the military education of our officers, both staff and regimental, but he found that he should not be able to bring on a motion to that effect before Easter, and therefore he was reluctantly compelled to forego his intention. The subject was, however, so important that he could not omit altogether calling the attention of the House to it. It was a lamentable fact that this nation, foremost in all peaceful arts, was not so in military matters. That, without doubt, chiefly arose from our imperfect organisation, and also from the fact that for the army officers were not specially educated. It was impossible without that education that officers could be fitted for their duties, and still less keep pace with the scientific improvements which surrounded them. With the exception of the Duke of Wellington's campaigns, and a few brilliant but isolated exploits, the history of our army from the time of Marlborough was one of blunder and failure, and not unfrequently of disaster, whereas that of the navy was one of great achievements and an almost unbroken series of successes. Why, he would ask, was there that difference? Was it not that in the navy every officer entered it as a profession, and was duly and professionally educated and subjected to severe tests before he was advanced? It was essentially treated as a profession, and its officers sustained and encouraged to undergo its severe labours by the hope of gaining its rewards. The navy were always ready whenever they were required, at the beginning, at the close, or during the progress of a war; but not so the army. We were told that there was no practical school for the army to learn its business in ; there was undoubtedly some truth in that, but only half a truth. We neglected, two years ago, an opportunity of extending that school. India was the principal quarter where the military profession might be learned practically within the British dominions ; and there we had 30,000 troops. Two years ago, we agreed with the East India Company to increase the number of European troops by 10,000. But how did we effect this ? Did we add that number to the Queen's troops, which would not have cost the Government one farthing, as they would have been all paid and supported by the East India Company ? No, we gave authority to the East India Company to add that number to its own army, thereby creating 10,000 less good Colonial troops, instead of augmenting by 10,000 the number of, and the field of instruction for, our own troops. He earnestly hoped that this error would be rectified, or that the whole of the army in India, at least that the European portion of it, would be brought under the Crown. We might thus extend the practical skill of our officers, and we ought also to inspire them with more enterprise and energy, by a juster system of promotion and distinction. At present such inducements were not held out. Officers were placed upon the staff without any question as to military qualifications. Once upon the staff they continued upon it, and to the staff promotion mainly fell. It was impossible to overrate the unfairness of the promotion of our staff officers. There was an instance when the Queen visited Ireland. She was received at Cork by two officers, one of whom was of thirty-two years', and the other of twenty-eight years' standing ; neither of them were promoted. But at Dublin, for a similar ceremony, no less than three aides-de-camp of the Lord Lieutenant's staff received the brevet rank of major, though the united services of the three would not amount to either of that of the Cork officers. That was an instance of what staff promotions were. One of those Cork officers subsequently went to Canada with his regiment, and died at his post ; and the other went to Inkerman, where he fell at the head of his regiment. Of the three aides-de-camp staff officers who received promotion in Dublin, one was struck by a natural visitation, and sold out, the second was still employed on the Lord Lieutenant's staff, and the third had preferred a civil appointment to service in the Crimea. He (Mr. Rich) might go multiplying these instances, if it were necessary. The efficiency of our staff officers, and the education which fitted them for their duties, were totally disregarded, yet, in time, these staff officers became the leaders of our armies ; a could we, with such a contempt for fitness and preparation, wonder at the almost constant failure of our military expeditions ? There was no royal road to the art of war. It must be studied, deeply, perseveringly, hopefully, and embraced as a profession. When men were found who possessed the rare qualities which were essential for a soldier, they ought to be rapidly promoted. That was the practice in foreign countries, and it was the theory in our own. The Ordnance corps and engineers were, indeed, a credit to the service ; but in these a complete system of education was pursued, and no man could enter the Artillery as an officer who had not passed a satisfactory examination at the military academy at Woolwich. Those gentlemen who went into the engineers were also subjected to severe examination, and subsequently completed their education at the arsenal and at Chatham, but when, in that manner, a highly educated body of men was obtained, no use was made of them. The general routine duty of an officer of engineers, however brilliant his talents, was such as might be performed by the most ordinary officer ; he was employed to look after old buildings and barracks, and other unimportant concerns. Some of the engineer officers, thus disgusted, were what was termed "seconded," and sought occupation in matters quite irrelevant to their professions. He believed that the number of pupils at the Military College at Sandhurst was on the decrease, and that the institution had been allowed to dwindle down although not from any want of funds ; for it appeared that during the last three years, no less than 2,700*l.* had been paid into the Treasury as a surplus from it. In fact the college was not only self-supporting, but was, to some extent, a public charity, for some fifty of the cadets were maintained at half their cost, by charging the remainder nearly double their cost ; thus excluding the sons of the middle gentry from the institution by the exorbitance of its charges. In the Military College, the junior department was intended for the education of regimental officers, and the senior department for the education of staff officers, for it was supposed that those gentlemen in the senior department who obtained a certificate of having passed a satisfactory examination would obtain staff appointments; but, in point of fact, that certificate was a mere mockery, and with very few exceptions had never met its reward. Why was not the 900*l.* a year surplus which that college paid for the last three years into the public purse employed in educating more young men for commissions? Simply because, if that course were adopted, the patronage of the Horse Guards would be diminished. Now, with respect to the distribution of the commissions that were granted, he found that the number given between the years 1830 and 1847 was nearly 2,200; and of these, during those seventeen years, 446 were given to men who had shown distinguished merit in the ranks or as non-commissioned officers; of the remainder, 476 were given to the cadets who had passed through the studies and examinations of the Military College with honour, and had been recommended to the Commander in Chief. But what became of the rest? There were 1,269 commissions which had been granted, as it was stated, "to gentlemen"—that is to say, they had been given away by favour, or they had been sold. Several of those who procured them might have been also at the Military College, but merely as a place of resort, without being constrained to follow any department of study, or pass even any examinations. But half of them, at least, were young gentlemen who had not undergone even this preliminary, but had entered the army with no notion of following it as a profession, but who, being the heirs to large estates, had been placed in the army after having completed their school education, as a means of a very questionable discipline or prevention for keeping them out of the gaieties of London and Paris. These two classes furnished almost exclusively for the staff; the 446 who got commissions after having served in the ranks were, from their age and from their previous habits, not qualified for the staff, and the 476 who got commissions by their industry, their talents, and good behaviour at the college, being poor men, without interest, could not under the present system presume to obtain any staff appointment. So it happened that the staff appointments of the British army fell to the lot of the 600 or 700 gentlemen who without preparation and without previous merit got their commissions during those seventeen years by the sole advantage of their fortune or social position; now what security, therefore, was there for their knowing anything of that which it was necessary for a soldier to know? There was no security; and until 1847 there were no precautions taken that these men should be even acquainted with the ordinary education of a gentleman much less with the duties of their profession; since then an examination was instituted by the noble Lord who was then Secretary at War, of which he (Mr. Rich) did not say that it was a good one, but which he believed was likely to prove a much more successful examination than that which had been prescribed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Wiltshire (Mr. S. Herbert). It required a knowledge of the first elements of arithmetic and geometry, history and geography—a little smattering of Latin—or, failing that, of French or German, and some little knowledge of fortification; but, little as it was, it caused numbers of young men, who before that were intending to obtain commissions, to shrink from undergoing that examination, and so to abandon the idea of entering the army; and many others, who came up with all the assistance which "crammers" could render them, were "plucked" two or three times before they could pass. The poor orphan boys in the military school at Chelsea, or in the Royal Hibernian School, the sons of private soldiers, would have passed that examination, he believed, much more readily. Could we be surprised, then, at the inefficient character of our staff? and did not that throw light on our failures? It was said that the French army had a practical school of war in Algiers, but he doubted whether it was so good as ours in India. The French, however, did not rely upon Algiers only for the training of their officers. The French had six or eight different military academies to prepare officers and men for the staff for every branch of the service. And what was their preparation for the highest branch? A young man was selected who had passed through the inferior colleges with distinction, and was then, for the next two years, put through a course of military administration, history, geography, and topography; statistics, mathematics, and the sciences; mechanics, gunnery, fortification, and modern languages. For sixteen months of the two years the teaching was theoretical, for six months practical, and the other two months were filled up by a very severe examination. After that he was attached for two years to some regiment of the line, then for another two years to a regiment of cavalry, and subsequently for two years more to the artillery; and, at the end of those eight years, and not till then, was he considered fit to serve on the staff with honour to himself and advantage to his country. But what was our course? The lucky son or nephew of some good-natured general, or of a good-natured general's lucky friend, was accepted without hesitation as an aide-de-camp. The fortunate youth was then initiated in the mysteries of dancing and carousing, writing invitations, and singing a good song, laughing at his general's jokes and entertaining his guests. In due and quick time these accomplishments brought him promotion; he speedily became a major of brigade, or had a post in the departments of quartermaster general or of the adjutant general; thus he rose high in the army, but acquired no military knowledge, when suddenly a war broke out, and then the officer had to learn his duties—but how, and at whose expense? He learned them in the field, at haphazard, by error and mistakes, and at the cost of national disaster, and the noble blood of the English soldier, or, sadder still, of the miseries and privation which, by the ignorance of those in command, those soldiers were made to suffer. The honour of England and the lives of our army were too precious to be subjected any longer to such direful deficiencies. Let the Government, therefore, take this matter into their most serious consideration. Let them take care that all the officers of our army, whether for regimental or staff service, should be well and thoroughly educated, and that, afterwards, those who best fitted themselves for duty should be encouraged by the juster dispensation of the professional honours.

CAPTAIN SCOBELL seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, "it is expedient that measures be taken for promoting the efficiency of our Military Academies and other established provisions for preparing Officers for Regimental and for Staff Appointments,"—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, the hon.
Mr. Rich

Member for Richmond who had bro this subject forward had expressed regret that he was unable to move for appointment of a Committee. Now (Mr. Peel) would admit that such a Committee might have led to the collection a valuable body of evidence, but he not sorry that it had not been propo for he believed that, so far from cing this question to make any prog it would have had an opposite tende inasmuch as the Government were giving their attention to this impo subject, and if a Committee were appoin the Government would be bound to pend their action until the Commi had made their report upon it. He cnsidered it inconvenient, both to himself to the department with which he was connected, that, seeing the little time wh the Government had yet had to mat their views upon the many import questions that were pending, he should called upon to express an opinion up matters of great moment vitally affect the organisation of the army and follow each other in rather close successi Only two or three nights ago the Ho was treated to a discussion which volved the question of admitting priva and non-commissioned officers of the arm—men advanced in age, and however w acquainted with the duties of a soldier, i possessing an education superior to th given in common elementary schools—in the class of commissioned officers ; a now the hon. Member (Mr. Rich) h brought forward a question founded up an opposite assumption, for it was recommeded that a higher education should given to the officers, and that superi qualifications should be exacted of them. Now, with regard to the general value education for our officers, there could no difference of opinion whatever. As h right hon. Friend the late Secretary f the Colonies said the other evening, eve officer ought to understand the practi part of his duty, but no officer was th less capable of doing his duty because he understood the theory and scienc of the military profession. He (M. Peel) believed that the more our officer had their minds disciplined and their intelligence cultivated, the more would the resources be multiplied, enabling them t adapt themselves with the more facility t the varying exigencies of the military ser vice. He did not speak merely of a pro fessional education, but of general litera ture. A Bill which passed that House the other day, for raising a foreign legion, might illustrate the importance of general studies to an officer. Under that Act, we should have an assemblage of diverse nationalities, to place which under the command of an English officer would require that he should be acquainted with the different languages of Europe—German, French, and others ; and so an officer familiar with foreign languages would enjoy multiplied opportunities of getting employment and of advancing himself. But although he (Mr. Peel) was favourable to education, he would not have it of too high a character. He believed that if too high an educational standard were established for the army, we should lose the services of many competent and valuable men. It was a common remark, that men, who at school and college were beaten by their competitors, would afterwards, in the real business of life, leave those competitors behind, not because in all cases they possessed greater social advantages of wealth or station, but from their having an instinctive knowledge of the way in which to turn what they did know to account for the public benefit. This should be strongly kept in view in the education of our army. The hon. Gentleman referred, amongst other matters, to the present means which this country had of furnishing education to our officers. It did not require more than a cursory glance at those means to feel satisfied that they were extremely scanty, and that the institutions which were established in this country did not, and were not intended to, supply the want which was referred to by the hon. Gentleman. Excepting the institution at Woolwich, there was nothing but the Military College at Sandhurst, and that the hon. Gentleman said had been reduced because the Commander in Chief was unwilling to lose his patronage. But there he thought the hon. Gentleman was mistaken, because it was not the Government, but that House, which had restricted the extent of its accommodation. It was a self-supporting institution at the present time, but not exactly in the way stated by the hon. Member. The hon. Member said there were ten inmates who paid nothing at all, and forty who paid a moderate sum. But the fact was, that there were twenty-five orphan children and other sons of officers who paid a sum of 40*l.* a year, and the College was able to take them at that low rate in consequence of the high charge which was levied on a third class containing some 110 pupils ; and the advantages of the education of the officers were so great, that there was no difficulty on the part of the college to procure boys who paid a sum which was not only sufficient for their education, but also to support those who were received at a lower rate. The hon. Member suggested that the basis of the college should be enlarged, and that every officer intended for the army should pass through that institution. He was not disposed to agree in the policy of that recommendation, as he believed no great results would be found to attend a system which educated in a military manner persons of very youthful age. By devoting themselves to one particular study, narrow notions of their professions would be formed by those for whom the education was designed. The best class of public officers would, he conceived, be found among those who had passed through the public schools and universities, and who possessed a knowledge of general literature. The hon. Gentleman had also referred to the examinations as at present required by the rules of the service. He (Mr. Peel) was not aware of what was required by the examiners, but at least the examination secured that the officers were not illiterate. He thought that the plan recommended by his right hon. Friend secured that which the hon. Gentleman proposed, that when an officer required a commission, he should be prepared to pass a preliminary examination, and that he should receive, not merely a military education, but a general one. The plan of his right hon. Friend went on to provide, and he thought properly, that when an officer had received a first commission he should be required to pass subsequent examinations before he obtained a further grade, or before he obtained his company ; and the only reason why the scheme had not been brought to maturity was the difficulty of appointing instructors in consequence of the persons who would have been selected being required for the more pressing service of the army in the East. He thought, however, the circumstance of there being a war was no reason why they should not proceed in carrying out the plan. Whether the war was or was not to be continued, it was for the Government to see that measures were taken to provide officers with the means of acquiring a full knowledge both of the theory and of the practice of their profession, and the plan of his right hon. Friend, that there should be appointed at every head-quarters in this country and the Colonies certain instructors before whom the officers of the regiments serving in that command should be required to attend a course of lectures, and to pass an examination with success, before they received a further promotion, would, he thought, be attended with very advantageous results. With regard to the staff appointments, considering that those who were on the staff had very considerable advantages over the regimental officers, he certainly thought that those staff appointments should be considered as the prizes of the profession. Under the present system it not unfrequently happened that officers were appointed general officers, who, not from any fault of their own, but from the fault of the system, were familiar only with one branch of their duty. It would be possible to select officers who had most distinguished themselves at the district examinations proposed to be held, and to send them to some central station or to one of the large encampments to be formed when they would have an opportunity of learning the duties of all the difficult branches of the service, and from men thus trained and qualified, the Government might select those who were to hold staff appointments. With regard to the état-major of the French army, as he understood, that was a staff corps distinct from the other divisions of the army. Whether it was desirable or not for us to adopt that system was, of course, a matter for serious consideration. He trusted that the hon. Gentleman would be satisfied with this cursory review of his observations, and that he would not press his Motion.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that there was one very easy means of improving the education of the army without costing the country anything, and that was simply by ensuring employment to those officers who knew their duty. The great reason why we had no good staff officers was, that, whatever might be their attainments, their study, or their knowledge, they found them no recommendations for employment. Another great reason for the deficiency of our staff officers was the fact that there did not exist in the English language a single really useful work devoted to a description of the duties of staff officers, and there was scarcely an officer to be found who could define with accuracy the duties either the adjutant or quartermaster general. During the visit of the French officer to the camp at Chobham, they expressed their opinion that our regimental system was perfect, but that our staff arrangements were sadly deficient. It was perfectly absurd, in his opinion, to suppose that any academies of the country would produce staff officers. Every staff officer must educate himself. He should go to France, make himself master of the French language, and make himself acquainted with the system adopted in that country. He considered, at the same time, that it was impossible, from the peculiar constitution of the British army, to introduce the French school of the état-major into it. He would again repeat, that the staff appointments ought only to be given to those who were, upon examination, found perfectly qualified to discharge the duties of the appointment.

MR. OWEN STANLEY said, he hoped the hon. Member for Richmond did not intend to press his Motion to a division, but notwithstanding he thought the Government had adopted a proceeding which would prove injurious to the army by promoting sergeants to the rank of officers. Composed as the English army was, it required great caution as to the system of promotion which should be adopted. If there should be an indiscriminate promotion of non-commissioned officers, it would inevitably do injury both to the army and to the individuals themselves. He was glad to find that the Government was taking the whole system of the army into their consideration. That was much better than having isolated Motions brought forward by independent Members, which only had the effect of preventing the Government taking immediate and decisive measures on the subject.

MR. OTWAY said, he could not avoid expressing his surprise that the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of War, when speaking of the circumstances attending the expedition to the Crimea and the education of the officers, should have treated the subject as merely a question of money. With regard to the Motion before the House, he would observe that in France there were many colleges where persons were educated by the State; but in England no such thing could be said to exist.

By a return which had been made of the number of orphans of the officers of the army who were gratuitously educated at public institutions, it appeared that there were eight educated at one establishment, and only two at another. He was pleased to learn from the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Peel) that the plan of the late Secretary for War was to be carried out—namely, that periodical examinations should be made of every officer before he should obtain any increased rank in the service. With regard to the appointments on the staff, he did not concur in what had fallen from the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Dunne) as to the facility with which officers of the staff might be educated. A most disastrous affair had recently occurred, which illustrated how necessary it was that a staff officer should possess higher qualifications than merely those of a regimental officer. He alluded, of course, to the cavalry charge at Balaklava. An order was conveyed from the commander in chief to a general officer in command, and a misunderstanding arose between that officer and the aide-de-camp who was the bearer of the order, as to the interpretation to be put upon it. Now, if the general officer was possessed of the power, not only of carrying out the order of the commander in chief, but also of interpreting it, then it would be immaterial whether the aide-de-camp possessed the qualification of interpreting or not. But when power was given to that staff officer to put a construction upon the order, then it was not enough that he should be a good rider, but that he should also be an officer capable of interpreting the orders of the commander in chief to whose staff he belonged.

MR. BELLEW said, he thought, as reference had been made to the charge at Balaklava, the House ought not to forget that the order in that case was a written one, and had the officer who carried it to the general of division simply delivered it the charge in question might not have been made.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, he hoped the House would not rush into the opposite extreme, under the idea that education would make a good general. The Duke of Marlborough, it was well known, was one of the most illiterate men of his day, and Marshal Saxe could not sign his own name. With the exception of Bernadotte, there were few of the French marshals—and he might certainly say neither Soult nor Massena—who had received any education. There was great danger that, having heard too much on one side, they might now rush into the opposite extreme.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON : Sir, there is no doubt much truth in what the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Phillimore) has said, but the case comes to this—when you apply a test of qualification for a particular employment, you must take care not to employ a test applicable to another totally different employment. It is quite true that the attainments which qualify a man to be a good officer are not the same which would qualify a man to be a learned professor; and if you require your officers to pass an examination which will qualify them for a professorial chair, you will certainly commit a great error. Upon the other hand, great advantages would arise from taking care that upon each step of promotion an officer should keep himself up to proper progress in the attainments belonging to the profession of which he is a member. The qualities which constitute a good general are qualities which must be inborn in the man. The combination of qualities which make a great general is one of the rarest which occurs in the moral constitution of man. My belief is, that you will find a great many more men fitted to be successful statesmen than men suited to take command, and who have all the foresight necessary for the performance of the duties attaching to that station. At the same time, it is highly important that your officers should keep well up and make progress in their profession; and those examinations which have been alluded to are examinations which I think ought to be tests of military knowledge. It would be desirable that that test should not only be applied upon the first entrance into office, but that the officers should also understand that unless they occupy their minds and perfect themselves in those matters which are essential to a proper performance of military duties, they will not gain such promotion as they are desirous to obtain.

COLONEL KNOX said, he thought it would be of great advantage to their service if the system adopted in foreign armies was carried out. There, when a young officer was perfect in his military duties, he was for a short time attached to the artillery, then to the engineers and the cavalry; and he thereby learned the routine of all the branches of the service. There was no means in their service by which a general officer could obtain that knowledge which would enable him to make effective use of the different arms. He was quite certain that more would be learned in that way than by any system of examination.

MR. RICH said, that after the satisfactory statement the Government had made, he would not press his Motion.

ORDNANCE ESTIMATES—SUPPLY.

House in Committee of Supply; Mr. BOUVERIE in the Chair.

MR. MONSELL said, that the present Estimate for the expenses of the Ordnance Department was the largest that had ever yet been laid before Parliament. Although the estimates showed such a very large increase of expenditure, there were few hon. Members in the House who would not be able to give a reason for the increase of almost every one of the items. He would first call the attention of the Committee to the Supplementary Estimates, for which a Vote had previously been taken, but no details of which had been presented to the House. The total amount of the Supplementary Estimates for last year was 1,402,961*l.* The first Vote was a sum of 267,000*l.* under the head of barrack supplies, and it included a sum of 129,518*l.* for barrack bedding for the hospitals at Scutari and Smyrna, and for replacing stores at Malta. There was a sum of 106,000*l.* for additional great coats, boots, and shoes, for the troops. Some remarks had been made with respect to the size and quality of the boots sent out to the troops. Those articles were not, however, supplied by the Ordnance, but by the clothiers of the regiments. With respect to the boots that were sent out, the precautions were taken that two smaller sizes of the boots established by the Army were left out, and in the place of them two larger sizes were selected; and although the boots might have been too small in cases where the men wore two or three pairs of stockings, still they were, in fact, larger than those usually supplied to the Army. The remainder of the Vote was a sum of 42,806*l.* for miscellaneous stores. The next Vote was 142,000*l.* for warm clothing for the convalescents, and 92,000*l.* for blankets, &c. Then there was a charge of 54,800*l.* for huts for troops in the Crimea, 19,041*l.* for stable huts for the Crimea, and 12,969*l.* for hospital huts for 2,000 patients. And also a sum of 12,930*l.* for huts for 3,000 men at Heligoland. The next Vote was a sum of 382,500*l.* for warm and waterproof clothing and waterproof articles for troops. In justice to the gentlemen who undertook the supplies of those articles and who, in his opinion, carried out the directions given them by the Government with great celerity, he stated that the whole of the supplies which were lost when the Prince were replaced within three days of the time when the news first arrived of the loss of that vessel. The Committee would doubtless be surprised, but thought at the same time gratified, to hear the enormous extent of the shipments of these articles. In the month of November there were shipped from the Tower 1,000 tons of warm clothing, and by Messrs. Hayter and Powell 344 tons; in December, 752 tons from the Tower, and 2,000 tons by Messrs. Hayter and Powell; in January, 309 tons from the Tower, and 180 tons by Messrs. Hayter and Powell. He would next ask the Committee to consider whether this clothing was, under the circumstances, supplied economically. It was supplied in great haste, under very urgent circumstances, and of course anybody who had to do with the supply of felt that the real object they had to consider was not price, but to get the things they wanted as rapidly and expeditiously as they could. He had caused an accurate calculation to be made of the amount. The price paid exceeded the price at which they might reasonably expect to obtain the article, if they were not in the hurry he had described. The calculation had been made by independent authorities; one of whom was connected with the Ordnance Office, and the other was not connected with that department. The instruction given to the gentlemen connected with the Ordnance Office was to give the benefit of any doubt he entertained against the department, and his calculation was that the extra amount paid was about 10 per cent more than should have been paid if the articles were got in the ordinary course of business. From the other calculation it appeared that the extra amount paid was 7½ per cent more than the ordinary price. The essence of the contract made with the contractor for the clothing was time, and in every instance the object was to get the article as rapidly as possible. The amount of fines imposed for the non-fulfilment of contracts amounted to about 4½ per cent; and, balancing the two figures he had mentioned, he thought the amount the country had paid for warm clothing, over and above a reasonable sum, was somewhere about 4½ per cent. There were of course some articles dearer than others. Some were got at a very reasonable price, and there were other articles for which they were charged a great deal too much. But, on the whole, the average amount paid over and above the sum that should have been paid if the articles were obtained in ordinary times, was about 4 per cent. With regard to the quality of the articles supplied, he had the advantage of obtaining the opinion of Messrs. Hayter and Powell, and the persons they employed, and they stated to him that the articles supplied were of excellent quality. He (Mr. Monsell) was firmly convinced, after a searching inquiry, that the warm clothing sent out was, generally speaking, of a most excellent quality. There was another point to which he wished to call the attention of the Committee, and that was with regard to the mode in which it was said the stores sent out to the East were packed. There was a statement in the public prints that the Robert Lowe transport ship had conveyed medical stores to Scutari, over which were placed cylinders of powder for Balaklava. That matter had been carefully investigated by a Committee appointed by the late Secretary of War, and that Committee unanimously reported that the charge was entirely unfounded, and that such an arrangement was, from the nature of things, utterly impossible; because the cylinders were of such enormous weight that they must be packed with great care in the hold of the ship, and could not be placed elsewhere. With regard to the Prince, it was stated that the shot and shell for Balaklava were placed on the top of the medical stores, but the Committee having also investigated that charge, declared it to be entirely unfounded. The neglect that had occurred in the case of the cargoes of these two vessels was not on the part of those who packed the goods, but of those who had to deliver them on their arrival at their respective destinations. The next item in the estimates was 25,000*l.* for erecting a shell factory for the manufacture of Lancaster shells. Hon. Gentlemen were not probably aware that the new invention was first submitted to the Government in the year 1852. Investigations and experiments with regard to it went on, but before the invention was quite ripe for use, the war broke out, and it was considered desirable to make use of them in the best way they could. The use of Nasmyth's hammer was necessary in the construction of the shells, and before they were sufficiently tested by experiments it was thought unwise to get a large number of these very expensive articles. The construction of the shells was very expensive, because they had to be reheated eleven times in consequence of there being only one of the Nasmyth's hammers in use. There were 1,800 shells made, and the cost of each was 6*l.* In the month of November last Lord Raglan transmitted to this country a Report from Colonel Lake, with regard to the operation of the guns and shells before Sebastopol, and that Report was extremely satisfactory. It appeared that when the shells were handled and the guns were loaded by persons who had experience in the management of them, they were on the whole—if not perfect—of very great use in the field. Therefore, it was decided by the Government that a large number of these shells should be produced with as little delay as possible. He had had the advantage of a consultation on the subject with Mr. Nasmyth, who had most liberally placed his factory in Manchester at the disposal of the Government for the construction of shells; but on finding out the plant that would be required to be erected, and having a plant already at Woolwich, he came to the conclusion that the arrangement would not be an economical one to the Government, and that they should proceed with the work in their own factory. This was accordingly done, and the factory having been completed by the great exertions of Sir Charles Fox and Mr. Henderson in the course of two months, they were now producing sixty shells a day, and would very soon be producing one hundred shells a day. Those shells would now cost about 1*l.* 16*s.* 2*d.* a piece instead of 6*l.* The next Vote which he came to in the Supplementary Estimates was for a sum of 15,000*l.* for the erection of a gun factory at Enfield. In Vote 6 of the Estimates there was a sum of 40,000*l.* demanded for that factory, making the entire sum required for it 55,000*l.* A Committee was appointed last Session to consider a proposition made on the part of the Government for the erection of a very large factory, where it was intended to have produced by machinery, at a cheap rate, 150,000 muskets a year. That Committee, however, was unfavourable to the project on so great a scale, and they recommended that a manufactory should be tried on a limited scale, which would serve as an experiment, to show the advantages to be derived from a more extensive application of machinery, besides serving as a check upon the price of contractors, and supplying a resource in times of emergency. After the report of the Committee was given in, three gentlemen went to America, namely Colonel Burn of the Royal Artillery, a distinguished officer; Captain Ward, who had devoted a great deal of his attention to the construction of small arms; and Mr. Anderson. It had been very generally stated by persons who were opposed to the proposed factory, that his (Mr. Monsell's) views were founded merely on theory, and that there was no experience to support them. The gentlemen sent out were authorised to expend in the purchase of machinery a sum of 10,000*l.*; and a little time after they had arrived in the United States they communicated with him (Mr. Monsell) on the subject of the machinery they had witnessed there. Colonel Burn wrote, stating that the more they had seen of the operation of the musket machinery in America, and the extraordinary effect it produced, the more they were convinced of the absolute necessity of a radical change in our system, and of our establishing a complete and permanent organisation to enable us to secure a continuous supply of the best article at a cheap rate. Colonel Burn also observed that, though the work of the machinery at Springfield, in Massachusetts, and at Harper's Ferry, in Virginia, differed in certain respects, according to the skill of the engineer, yet the operations were so perfect that an interchange of muskets in all their parts was made between them quarterly, and that the result was found to be the same as if they had been all produced by one engineer only. Subsequently, Colonel Burn applied for permission to spend a larger amount than the 10,000*l.* first specified in the purchase of machinery in America. He (Mr. Monsell) went with that letter to the Treasury, and subsequently authorised Colonel Burn to spend a further sum, and there was actually expended in the purchase of machinery in America a sum of 17,000*l.* When these gentlemen returned home, they brought with them a very elaborate and interesting report, stating the result of their investigations, with such ample reasons for what they stated, that it was impossible for any person to resist the conclusion which they had arrived. They stated their report that the anticipations entertained in this country, not only as to the rapidity with which muskets could be manufactured by machinery, but as to the cost at which they could be manufactured were more than realised, and they expressed their conviction in the strongest manner that the experiment of establishing such a manufacture in this country would be followed by great and most signal success. The next point that called for attention was the size of the factory which the machinery should be receive. The decision to which the Government ultimately came was, that it should be a factory capable of manufacturing 50,000 muskets a year. He could state, I thought, very strong reasons to induce the Committee to agree in that decision. It was found, upon very careful calculation that if the factory was constructed for the manufacture of one-half the number, the same staff would be required to manage it and very nearly the same quantity of machinery. For the manufacture of 50,000 muskets per year there would be required between 600 and 700 machines, and those machines very few would be in duplicate; there should be single machines for making single parts, and, unless the factory was constructed their of a size to enable them to manufacture 50,000, it would have their machinery for half a year perfectly idle. It was accordingly decided that a factory should be prepared in which 50,000 muskets could be manufactured per annum, and directions were given to the proper officers to prepare a place for that purpose. Very strong remonstrance were addressed to the Board of Ordnance certainly against the erection of a factory at Enfield, and the propriety of erecting it at Woolwich was suggested, but the thought they should adhere to the decision they had come to, and accordingly it was resolved to have the factory at Enfield. According to the first plan for the erection of a building, the estimate was about 30,000*l.*; but the gentlemen to whom he had referred, on returning from America where they had an opportunity of seeing the system on which the factories there were carried on, stated their conviction of the great advantage resulting from having abundance of room in the arsenals in America, and strongly pressed that the proposed size of the factory should be enlarged. Their views were adopted, and the tenders for the factory consequently amounted to about 48,000*l.* There would, however, be certain deductions from that amount, and he believed the actual cost for building the factory would be 43,000*l.* or 44,000*l.* With regard to the cost of the machinery, he should mention that, as he had already stated, the machinery purchased in America cost 17,000, but besides that they had purchased 9,000*l.* worth of machinery in this country, making the entire sum paid for machinery, 26,000*l.* During the months of October, November, and December, the Government had felt the deepest anxiety for the supply of small arms, and they had been compelled to have recourse to the markets of other countries to obtain an additional number of arms. Under these circumstances, the Minister of War decided that it was expedient that the factory should be proceeded with at once, and he authorised the Board of Ordnance to enter at once into contracts for its erection. Accordingly they did so, and at the present moment the factory was being constructed at Enfield for the sum he had mentioned. He believed they would be able to commence operations in it on the 1st of July; and although it would not then be in full operation, they might expect, even during the present year, to manufacture a considerable number of arms there. Passing from the subject of the Supplementary Estimate, he came next to the General Estimates for the year. In the Vote for pay allowances and contingencies there was an increase, as compared with last year, of 103,543*l.* but that was owing to the addition to the Ordnance corps of half a battalion of engineers and a battalion of artillery. In the Vote for the movement of troops there was an increase of 11,200*l.*; and in the vote for recruiting, the bounty having been raised, there was an increase of 12,084*l.* He need hardly point out the necessity for increasing the engineer and artillery force—a force which was now about 7,000 less in strength than it was in the year 1814. No force in any country could have distinguished itself more than our artillery and engineer corps had done in the recent operations in the East. It was a remarkable fact that our platforms before Sebastopol had required so little repair that, although shells had exploded over our magazines, not one of them had been blown up. He should next call attention to the Vote for Commissariat and Barrack supplies, &c., on which there was an increase of 103,473*l.* The sum required for barrack supplies amounted to 355,450*l.*, including supplies for the camp at Aldershot, 36,000*l.*, for foreign troops, 40,000*l.* for the dépôt about to be formed at Malta. There was a sum of 115,000*l.* for great coats, and in the amount for boots and shoes there was an increase of 43,512*l.* The clothing for the foreign legion was 90,000*l.*, men and clothing for the militia, an increase of 56,950*l.* He might add to his former remarks respecting the warm clothing, that the Government had sent out an able and experienced officer with an experienced clerk, and some of the best labourers from the Tower, well acquainted with the package of stores, to Balaklava, there to collect the warm clothing and send them to a storehouse in the Bosphorus, with a view to preserve them for future use. Vote 3 was intended to be withdrawn. There were certain changes likely to be made in the Ordnance Office, and when those were effected, an estimate would then be presented to the House. On Vote 4 there was an excess over the last year of 19,504*l.* for Ordnance establishments. There was an increase in the home establishments, 5,954*l.*; lodging the Irish militia, 10,000*l.*; lodging the foreign legion, 2,500*l.*; and additional clerks of works, 938*l.* However, in every colonial establishment, except those situate near the seat of war, there had been a diminution of expense, and the decrease upon that head would have been greater had it not been for the necessity of forming a new establishment in the Bosphorus. Vote 5, for wages, 368,872*l.*, was 81,027*l.* in excess of last year, arising, of course, from the enormous demand for labour at the different establishments. He would call attention to one item in which there was a decrease, which must strike everybody as remarkable, and which required explanation. It was a diminution of 16,336*l.* in the amount asked for the new gun factory at Woolwich. The explanation, however, was easy and simple. In the month of May last he found that the supply of shells was very deficient indeed; and, in point of fact, if any great action had been fought, either by land or by sea, they could not have replenished the magazines, and they would, consequently, have been exposed to great danger. Finding that to be the case, he sent for an officer of the most distinguished scientific talent, who had displayed great mechanical ingenuity and inventive powers, Captain Boxer, a gentleman whose services had been so much recognised in the East. His shell had been acknowledged by all the authorities at the seat of war to be the most valuable invention that had been introduced for more than twenty years into the service. He (Mr. Monsell) sent for Captain Boxer, and pointed out to him the position they were in. Captain Boxer at once undertook to remove the difficulty, if he were allowed to make use of an old storehouse in Woolwich as a factory for the manufacture of fuses, and the "bouching" of shells. The proposal was agreed to, the necessary works were erected for 7,000*l.*, and that 7,000*l.* was saved in the first six months. Having agreed to Captain Boxer's terms, he gave him the fullest authority in the matter, and left to him the erection of the factory and everything connected with it. In that factory there had been saved to the country a sum of 1,200*l.* in one week. The saving in that factory was at the rate of 60,000*l.* a year, but he did not mean to say that 60,000*l.* had been saved, because the factory was not sufficiently long at work. If it had worked every week in the year, in the way it had worked during the week to which he had alluded; the saving thereby effected would be 60,000*l.* in the year, and he believed that there would actually be a saving at the end of the year of about 40,000*l.* The factory was not always kept at work, because it was found that it was not possible to obtain the shell itself with sufficient rapidity for that purpose. A few items would show the great advantage which the factory had proved to the country. Before its establishment there were 500 Moorsom fuses made weekly; afterwards there were 1,050, and at a saving of 14*l.* Of shells prepared for fuses there had been 3,500 per week; since the establishment of the factory the number was 10,257, at a saving in wages of 110*l.* There had been 3,000 wooden fuses made weekly, now there were 10,000, at a saving of 72*l.* The result was, that whereas in May the number of 8-inch shells in the storekeeper's departments was 4,398, it now amounted to 10,886. He was perfectly aware that this country, with its manufacturing powers so extensively developed in all articles of ironwork, ought to produce any number of shells which could possibly be required; but still the fact remained that we had now been a year at war, and that a sufficient number of shells had not been supplied. The demand had, in truth, been much greater than the supply. It was found, also, that a considerable increase had been made by the contractors in the price of the shells supplied to Government. In 1852, 8-inch shells supplied to Government at 7*l.* 8*s.* per ton, but the price charged in 1855 was 13*l.* 1*m.* making an increase of 6*l.* 8*s.* per ton. doubt it would be said that this increase was caused, to a certain extent, by increase in the price of iron; but the of iron of the quality of which shells were made, which was, in 1852, 3*l.* 2*s.* 7*d.* per ton, in 1855 had only risen to 3*l.* 18*s.* per ton, being an increase of only 15*s.* The amount of fuel required for the manufacture of a ton of shells was said to be five cwt., and, at that calculation, the cost of fuel for manufacturing shells would be 4*s.* 9*d.* per ton in 1852, and in 1855, 6*s.* 2*m.* making an increase of 1*s.* 3*d.* In the same way, the labour which, in 1852, cost 1*l.* 1*m.* per ton, in 1855 cost 1*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.*, according to the authority of one of the largest manufacturing firms in Bradford—one of the principal places where the manufacture of Government shells was carried on; and lastly, the freight from that district which, in 1852, was 10*s.* per ton, in 1855 has risen to 1*l.*, being an increase of 10*s.* This made altogether an increase in the price of a ton of shells of 4*l.* 17*s.* 11*d.* The Government, therefore, feeling the immediate want of shells—though they knew that, in time, they should be able to obtain as many as they might require—taking into consideration the great increase of the price of shells, and the advantage of putting themselves in a position to control the contractors, and being sensible, moreover, of the importance of attaching a foundry to the Royal Laboratory, where they might be able, at a moment's notice almost, to supply any number of any given sort of shells which might be wanted on a sudden emergency, had determined to establish this foundry at Woolwich; and he was firmly convinced that, had it only been established six months ago, a saving would already have been effected of more than the amount—10,000*l.*—which was asked for its construction. It would be of the greatest service, too, in enabling the contractors to learn with greater rapidity how to make the particular sorts of shells which were required; for at present considerable time was lost before they were able to construct them with that accuracy and perfection which were indispensable in these articles; and he was

Sorry to say that very frequently the old contractors were backward in allowing the new contractors to inspect their modes of manufacture. This Vote, however, for the shell foundry was not the only one which he was about to ask for on account of machinery in connection with the Royal Laboratory, for it must be remembered, with regard to all these works, that they were required for the manufacture of articles for which there was no demand in the country except on the part of the Government, and that the country, therefore, to be prepared for the commencement of a war, must either have kept large stores of these articles, or else have had establishments in which these stores could be rapidly replenished. Now, nothing could be more inexpedient than to keep large stores at a time when every day was bringing forth new discoveries, and when a thing that was new one day was obsolete the next. As a mere matter of economy, it was of the greatest possible importance to have an establishment where, by means of the best machinery—which would soon repay its own cost by a diminution of the expenses of labour—large quantities of these articles could be rapidly supplied, and this really was the justification of all these votes asked for on account of machinery. The saving which would result from the erection of this machinery, independently of the greater perfection and accuracy insured, would be very great. For instance, it included machinery which would manufacture 150,000 war rockets in the year (the present supply of which was most inadequate) at a saving of somewhere about 30,000*l.*; also for making 60,000,000 small arm cartridges in the year by a new patent, by which somewhere about 25,000*l.* would be saved annually. The next Vote to which he wished to call the attention of the House was the sum of 800,000*l.* for small arms, being an increase of 543,600*l.* on the Vote asked for last year. There was considerable doubt, however, whether all this sum would be expended, for the accounts which he had received from the manufacturers, both in this country and at Liege, were anything but satisfactory. On the other hand, he must say that many of the manufacturers were using great exertions, and he was happy to state that two of the principal ones the other day informed him that, with the exception of one small grievance, which he had the power of removing at the moment, they had no grievances to complain of. They were perfectly content with the way in which operations were conducted by the Government, and he trusted that, under these circumstances, they would redouble their exertions, and not allow the country to be left in the miserable and melancholy condition in which it was placed last year with respect to Minié rifles. The Vote for machinery he had already alluded to, and consequently he would now pass on to Vote No. 7, where there was an increase of 454,679*l.* over the Vote of last year. This was partly occasioned by new barracks about to be erected by the direction of the Government on the western heights of Dover, which would cost 60,000*l.*, and which he believed to be absolutely necessary to the perfection of the defences there; by new barracks at Gosport for the same purpose, which would cost 61,000*l.*; and also by the erection of permanent barracks at Aldershot, which would cost a sum of 250,000*l.* These last would be complete barracks in every particular, and would afford to the troops a permanent opportunity for concentration and acting together in large bodies, thereby giving our officers the means of learning the art, not only of commanding regiments, but also of large detachments and bodies of men. These new buildings would be erected at an expense considerably less than the barracks which it had been the habit to use in this country. The change was chiefly owing to the Commission which had been sent over to Belgium to inspect the barracks used for a similar purpose in that country. The next Vote (No. 8) related to the scientific branch, and exhibited an increase of 3,828*l.* over the Vote of last year; the increase required for the Royal Military Academy being 1,759*l.*, and for the increase for establishment at Chatham 1,924*l.* The increase in these cases was occasioned by an increased number of cadets and engineers. A great item in this Vote was, as usual, occasioned by the sum for the Ordnance survey. In respect to this matter, the Committee were aware that last year a great controversy arose on the subject of the scale, and, queries being sent out, a large preponderance of the answers were in favour of a much larger scale than six inches, and arrangements were adopted for having a scale of somewhere about twenty-four inches to the mile. At the present moment, experiments were being tried to work the survey by means of contracts with private individuals and by piecework; and he hoped that in the course of three or four months sufficient experience would be obtained to enable the Government to come to a final decision on the subject. The maps, he believed, were to be engraved by the anastatic process. The next and last Vote, for the non-effective services, military and civil, exhibited an increase over the sum voted last year of 19,659*l.* This was occasioned by new warrants; and here he might mention that he found that the junior first captain placed on the list in 1805 averaged ten years' service, and he now averaged fourteen years' service. The senior lieutenant-colonel in 1805 was an officer of thirty-two years' service, and he was now an officer of forty-four years' service. The whole sum required for the non-effective services, military and civil, amounted to 197,657*l.*

"That a sum, not exceeding 1,402,961*l.* be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the Charge which will probably be incurred to the 31st day of March, 1855, on account of Barrack Supplies, &c., Wages and Ordnance Stores, &c."

COLONEL DUNNE said, he understood that an unfavourable Report had been forwarded to the Government as to the unhealthy site of the proposed hospital at Smyrna. He believed it was more so than Scutari, and, after the month of May, it would be very destructive to the lives of our soldiers. He hoped that those who were qualified to give advice on this matter would be listened to. As to the supply of greatcoats to the army and the militia, he would suggest, as he conceived it impossible for the Ordnance, for some time to come at least, to furnish the necessary supply, that the colonels of each regiment should be authorised to furnish them, and should only receive the actual price. Many of the greatcoats supplied to the French army—a portion of which were lent to our troops—had actually been made in London, and yet our army was most imperfectly supplied. The boots that had been sent were all, he understood, too small, and were consequently useless. They were wanted to wear over the men's ordinary shoes, and they ought to have been made large in proportion. He wished to know whether, in the camp equipage, tents were included. Last year he had several times called attention to the state of the tents when the expedition was going out, and he observed particularly that at that time they had no lining. He had not yet heard whether that want had been supplied. He also wished to inquire why it was that 90th, 46th, and 63rd Regiments, which had been sent out late in the year, had been supplied with warm clothing. It afterwards sent, but many of them did not receive it; the consequence was a mortality among the men when put to work in the trenches. The 63rd Regiment was reduced to two-thirds of its number. This loss, he considered, was entirely attributable to the neglect of the Government. The Ordnance, it was true, supplied the clothing as fast as they received the order; but the blame rested on some other department of the Government. In them it was owing that half an army perished. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mansell) had referred to the Committee which sat last year on the manufacture of small arms; but it should be remembered that Committee had none of the information before them respecting the manufacture of arms in America, which the hon. Gentleman had since received. He (Colonel Dunne) and the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) had gone to Mr. Colt's manufactory and examined Mr. Colt; and they found that none of the pieces manufactured by him would fit without being filed for the purpose. If the Government had now got better information from America, he hoped the proposed manufacture would succeed as well as they anticipated. The hon. Gentleman had given a satisfactory account of the improved and cheap mode of making shells. There had been a very prevalent idea, however, that the mortar shells at Sebastopol had not burst as they ought to have done. He hoped that this was not to be the general result of the cheapness to which the hon. Gentleman had referred. He believed that at this moment there were some 30,000 stands of arms locked up in the different barracks and storehouses in Ireland, while scarcely any of the Irish militia had arms or had been drilled. He hoped that the hon. Gentleman would report to the Minister of War the difficulty which was experienced in drilling the militia in Ireland in consequence of the want of arms. Within the last four years there had been 1,666,000*l.* expended in small arms. That sum ought to provide 350,000 stands of arms, and it had all been expended since the new pattern musket had been invented. He trusted that some arrangements would be made for the speedy delivery of those muskets. He objected to contracts being still made for arms of the old patterns.

Mr. Mansell

Why should the Government contract for arms that were obsolete?

MR. MUNTZ said, he should most certainly divide the Committee against the Vote for 40,000*l.* to defray the expenses of the establishment at Enfield. It would be recollect that the Small Arms Committee had recommended some augmentation in the Enfield manufactory, but it was only to a limited extent; and that Mr. Whitworth, the eminent American engineer, on being asked what would be the expense of working the stocks at that establishment, stated it at 5,000*l.* Well, last year the Board of Ordnance asked for a Vote of 25,000*l.* on account of the establishment at Enfield; and a few nights ago the House had seen a Supplementary Estimate brought forward, demanding a further sum of 15,000*l.*; making, with the previous estimate, a sum of 40,000*l.* as the expenditure of a single year. And again, this year, a sum of 40,000*l.* was asked for the manufactory at Enfield, making the enormous amount of 80,000*l.* in all. Now, the Committee must bear in mind that last year the Board of Ordnance made good none of their promises; and in every important instance they were obliged to admit they had been deceived in their calculations. But, notwithstanding that, the parties they were now sending to America to transact their business were the very same persons by whom they had been deceived at home. Nor was the hon. Gentleman the Clerk of the Ordnance very candid in his statements. He had not told the Committee why he had received so small a quantity of arms. Now the first reason was, that the Board of Ordnance was deficient in all sorts of knowledge; and the method of its constitution was but a sample of the way in which public business was transacted in this country. Men were placed to manage all sorts of boards without any sort of knowledge of their subject. The Government had received only 50,000 rifles during the year 1854, and he would show why. First of all, although the decision of the Small Arms Committee, of which he (Mr. Muntz) had been a Member, was given in favour of continuing the contract system for some time longer as early as April, the contracts were not given out until the 30th of June. But then, when were the patterns delivered to the manufacturers? Why, not until the 10th of August; while the materials—and he would beg the especial attention of the Committee to this fact—were not supplied until November. The contracts were for 90,000 rifles, and hon. Gentlemen might rest perfectly satisfied the whole of them would have been completed before this if the patterns had been given out in time. Again, with regard to the sighting of the guns. Although that was a point upon which the most precise instructions should be given, all was left in doubt and uncertainty. But then, when the guns were finished, they could not be used until the bayonets were ready; and how had the Board of Ordnance endeavoured to supply them? Why, first they tried to get them at 5*s.* 6*d.* a piece, although they were told it would be quite impossible to manufacture them of the description required at that price. Still they managed to make a few contracts with some second-rate workmen at that rate; but afterwards, finding by experience that it was impossible to get the whole of the contracts taken up at 5*s.* 6*d.*, the Board of Ordnance consented to raise the price to 7*s.* 6*d.*, and thus they managed to disturb the state of trade most injuriously. At the present moment the delivery of rifles from Birmingham amounted to 1,600 per week, and in a little time that quantity, he had every reason to believe, would be doubled, provided always that the manufacturers were only dealt with in a fair and tradesmanlike way. Let the Government get some man of business—some one who understood the manufacture of small arms—to manage matters for them. He had gone down himself to inspect the establishment at Enfield, and he could safely say it was a most excellent one; but yet, last year, there actually was a proposal to remove the establishment to Woolwich, and thereby swamp the whole of this vast outlay. Some time ago it had been proposed that a very distinguished townsman of his, Mr. Westley Richards, should superintend, on the part of the Board of Ordnance, all matters relating to the supply of small arms. He believed, however, that some paltry question as to the amount of remuneration to be offered that gentleman stood in the way of the arrangement being carried out, although Mr. Richards could have saved the country over and over again the amount of his salary. He would only say, that if the Government expected to have a large amount of small arms supplied by the manufacturers of this country, they must alter their mode of dealing with those gentlemen. He should divide the Committee against this Vote, as he felt unable to sanction the principle of an outlay of money, made without consulting anybody, and without knowing whether they were right or wrong. He considered the manufacture of carcass shells, as proposed now to be conducted, one of the grossest jobs ever known. In the end, the recommendations of the Small Arms Committee would be found far more valuable, and far cheaper, than those of any lot of scheming engineers.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

"That a sum, not exceeding 1,387,961*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the Charge which will probably be incurred to the 31st day of March 1855, on account of Barrack Supplies, &c., Wages, and Ordnance Stores, &c."

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON said, that after the experimental camp at Chobham had been established, it had been decided that it would be advisable for the Government to have at their disposal some large space for the purpose of exercising and encamping large bodies of troops, and, in consequence of that decision, a very excellent piece of land had been purchased for that purpose at Aldershot, a neighbourhood easy of access by two railways and a canal. They had heard for a considerable time that large barracks were to be erected there for the accommodation of troops which were to be ready for a large encampment in the spring. He found, however, that no steps whatever had been taken in the matter, that not even a tender was sent out before the 22nd of January, and then a tender was sent out for the erection of huts capable of accommodating 20,000 men, which huts were to be completed by the 15th of March. It struck him at the time that it was somewhat extraordinary that the Ordnance should allow so short a period as six weeks for erection of those huts, and he therefore entered into a calculation as to the amount of labour and material necessary for their erection. He found from that calculation that, from the number of trains required each day to carry the necessary materials, it would be impossible between the time the tender was accepted and the time fixed for the completion of the contract to supply those materials on the spot. He found also from the specification that the timber was to be fir from Memel, Riga, and Dantzig. More than three-fourths of the material used was to be yellow Christiana deal, and it would be found, on inquiry of any merchant or contractor, that there was not enough wood of this description Great Britain to erect one-half of the huts required. It was utterly impossible that the huts proposed to be erected could be completed in six weeks without a very large additional expenditure beyond estimate. About a fortnight after the 22nd of January the Ordnance Office issued another tender for bricks and concrete to form the foundations of these huts, so that only a month was allowed for laying the foundations and completing the erection. It was next to an impossibility, therefore, that the buildings could be finished within such a period, but if the huts were completed by the 15th of March he would willingly admit that it would be one of the most wonderful things ever accomplished in this country. It was not until the 22nd of January that the Ordnance issued notice for tenders for the erection of permanent barracks. The conditions of tender were believed, that 9,000*l.* or 10,000*l.* per month should be spent upon these barracks, as he supposed, until they were finished. He found, however, that no preparation had been made upon the ground to enable the contractors to commence their work. Had the Ordnance issued contracts last summer for making 20,000,000 bricks, and laid down a branch railway to one of the lines in the neighbourhood, he did not think it would have been necessary to provide one-half of the huts which were now to be erected at such a cost. The consequence of this was, that they must pay a very considerable sum, which it would otherwise have been unnecessary to expend, in consequence of the precipitate manner in which the operation was conducted. He believed the best plan would be for the Ordnance and all the Government departments where the application of materials was concerned to do as little as they could avoid out of their own offices. He had no doubt, if plans and estimates had been obtained by tender last year for erecting these barracks, that not only would there have been a considerable saving of money, but that the barracks would by this time have been ready for the occupation of the soldiers. He had heard it stated, indeed, that the reason why Messrs. Fox, Henderson, and Co. had carried out so successfully the various works they had undertaken was because, when the plan was laid down, they would not allow any one to interfere with them. With regard to the proposed manufactory of small arms at Enfield, he considered that it was a very bad principle either for individuals or companies to attempt to manufacture everything they wanted for themselves, unless they were certain the demand for the articles would be regular. He could not conceive that this country would always be at war, and, consequently, he thought it would be very impolitic on the part of the Government to have large establishments for the manufacture of materials which were needed in time of war, but which would not be required in a time of peace. Such a system would have a bad effect, with respect to small arms, upon private manufacture, especially in Birmingham. If the Government established a factory at Enfield, and consequently discouraged private manufactures, where would be the means of obtaining an additional supply of arms during a time of war if any sudden pressure occurred which the Government might be unable to meet from their own resources? He thought the preferable course would be to employ such men as Mr. Whitworth to ascertain the best mode of manufacturing small arms, and then, giving such information to the manufacturers, to leave them to perform the work.

LORD SEYMOUR said, that he had been a member of the Committee on small arms last year, before whom it was stated that the price of 3*l.* for a rifle was too high, and that such arms could be manufactured for a much less amount. The Committee were told that, if a little ornamental decoration, which was perfectly useless, was dispensed with, rifles quite as good as those now made could be produced at a saving of at least 15*s.* upon each rifle. The Government, however, would not give way on the point, and reduce the price by dispensing with unnecessary ornament. They said they must have rifles of their own manufacture, and that they could be made by machinery. When the Government were asked for an example of the manufacture of rifles or muskets by machinery, they said, "The Russians have such machinery already. They have got a far better musket than you have. They have the machinery, and you have not advanced in this respect so far as they have done." This statement occasioned some surprise, but he thought the actions in the Crimea had shown that our rifles were at least not inferior to those of the Russians. He certainly considered that, when an order was given for any description of arms, a pattern ought to be issued. If a gentleman gave an order for a quantity of ironmongery, would he not give out a pattern of what he required, even down to a poker? The Government, however, did not issue any patterns for arms. It had been insisted upon in the Committee that every contract ought to bear date from the issue of the pattern, but the returns which had been furnished gave no account of the date when the patterns were given out. The Government complained that the contracts were not completed, but how could they be completed when no patterns were issued to the manufacturers? The Committee was now asked to grant 40,000*l.* to the Board of Ordnance for the establishment of a manufactory of small arms at Enfield, but they were told that the arrangements of the existing Board of Ordnance had been so unsatisfactory that they were not to manage these matters for the future. They did not know, therefore, to whom they were going to intrust the expenditure of this large sum of money. It had been proposed last year that the House should grant some 25,000*l.* or 30,000*l.* to try the plan of establishing a manufactory, and to see how it answered. Government promised last year that if they got the money they would not only have the factory established, but the rifles produced; and he now wished to know if the Government works were so far advanced that some portion of the firearms was ready, or were hon. Members to be called upon to vote another 40,000*l.* in the dark? They were asked to place this sum in the hands of the Board of Ordnance, and at the same time they were not told who was at the head of that Board. As men of business, they ought not to be called upon to vote money until they knew to what sort of establishment it was to be given. For his own part, he believed they would obtain the weapons much more rapidly by dealing with the trade in a fair manner. He did not think they had dealt fairly by the trade, but on the contrary, he thought the speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) plainly showed that the Government had not treated the trade in a business-like manner. If he were desirous of giving an instance of the mismanagement of a public department, he could not adduce a more striking case than that of the Board of Ordnance. With respect to the proposed camp at Aldershot, he observed that no less a sum than 375,000*l.* was to be expended for barracks there during the present year. Now, he thought it was to be a sort of encampment, and that soldiers were there to be prepared for actual service; but he was afraid the men were to be so luxuriously housed, that they would be rendered totally unfit for real warfare. Did they mean to stable the horses in the same way as in cavalry barracks, where the animals were unfitted for work in the field? For military operations he doubted whether that mode was a wise one. When he looked at the large sum of 375,000*l.*, he was curious to know whether the Government had asked Sir Charles Barry to build the barracks at Aldershot. Again, the Committee was asked to vote a sum of 60,000*l.* for barracks at Dover. Who was going to look after their erection? No private individual would dream of commencing to build a house at the very moment he had dismissed his clerk of the works. Yet that was the very thing which the Government now proposed to do. They had got rid of the Board of Ordnance, and yet they came down and asked the Committee to vote 60,000*l.* for the erection of barracks at Dover, which, he presumed, had nothing to do with the war with Russia. Again, the Government asked for a considerable sum for the defence of commercial harbours—12,000*l.* for Liverpool and 10,000*l.* for the Humber. Now, that measure might be necessary; it was possible that our fleets could not defend our coasts from the Russians; but he did not think it would be wise in the Committee to vote so large a sum of money until they knew something of the establishment under which it was to be expended. He had heard no reason whatever for departing from the principle laid down last year with regard to the establishment at Enfield, and unless the Government could give them one, he should be disposed to reduce the vote by a sum of 40,000*l.*

MR. G. DUNDAS said, he was surprised at the hostility evinced by several hon. Members to the manufactory at Enfield for making small arms by self-acting machinery, under the surveillance of the Government. Last year, when there was not such a demand for arms as there was now, objections might fairly enough have been raised to that establishment; but he must confess that he was at a loss to understand the opposition to it in the present emergency, unless, indeed, it was to be attributed to a desire on the part of hon. Gentlemen who represented manufacturing districts to support the interests of their constituents. The question before the Committee was, whether small arms should be made by hand, in the old-fashioned or by means of machinery. It had been said by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) that the evidence taken before the Committee last year went to show that the Government were entirely wrong in their views. Now that he considered it was quite a matter of opinion. He thought the Government proved their case more completely by the evidence of scientists, all of whom concurred in assuring the Committee that it was most desirable that self-acting machinery should be adopted wherever it could be employed, so as to make the Government independent of the caprices of workmen and manufacturers. Twelve years ago he visited a manufacturer of small arms at Springfield, in America, and he never was more pleased with anything than with that. Every part of a musket was there made by self-acting machinery, and the persons employed were comparatively unskilled; in fact, the establishment altogether bore a striking resemblance to that of Colonel Colt, not from where he was now speaking. He trusted the Committee would adopt the suggestion that had been made by the clerk of the Ordnance, and not go to a division on the Vote.

MR. LAYARD said, the Committee had heard in the course of the discussion several pleasing instances of the negligence, mismanagement, and ignorance of the Government departments. The observations of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) and of the hon. Member for Coventry (Sir J. Paxton) could not fail to make some impression on hon. Members. These exposures were coming to be too frequent; and, what was very curious, they never heard of any person being punished on account of these things. There was one subject upon which he would like to have some explanation from the clerk of the Ordnance—he meant with respect to the fuses. He could bear witness to the fact, that the fuses issued during the early part of the siege of Sebastopol were so disgracefully bad, that out of every ten shells thrown, no more than three or four burst at all. He believed a Report was made to the head of the department upon the subject, representing that gross negligence had been shown in the construction of the shells, and he should like to know whether that Report, drawn up in the middle of last October, had been sent to this country, and whether in consequence any steps had been taken to investigate the case, and punish the guilty parties, whoever they might be? There was another question which he should also like to put to the hon. Gentleman. He observed in the Estimates a sum of 50,000*l.* for clothing, accoutrements, and knapsacks to the foreign legion. Now he should like to know where that foreign legion was? They had heard a good deal of it; the Bill for its embodiment was pressed upon them in a very hasty manner at the end of last year; but up to the present day he did not know where this mythical legion was, of what it was composed—whether of Austrians, or Germans, or Spaniards, or Dutchmen—or why they were asked to vote 50,000*l.* to dress these men of straw. Supposing, however, this foreign legion had been collected, had they been consulted with regard to their clothing, or was the Government going to provide for them trousers which were too short, and shoes which were too small—in fact, all that precious collection of dress sent out to our unfortunate troops in the Crimea? Then, again, with regard to the knapsacks. He had made some inquiries upon that subject while in the Crimea, and universal testimony was borne to the great superiority of the French knapsack over those supplied to the English army, which were heavier than those of our allies, and more galling to the soldier. Now, it would, he thought, be only fair to the Members of the foreign legion, wherever that might be, that they should be consulted as to the kind of knapsack and of accoutrements with which they were to be furnished. He wished also to touch upon another point. There was a large sum in the Estimates for the engineering department. Now he did not intend to depreciate the ability of our engineers, but he thought the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Monsell) was, no doubt, aware that, whatever the actual execution of that work might have been, the theoretical engineering work of the English army in the Crimea was not very creditable, and that not a single map of our siege operations before Sebastopol had been sent to this country, nor did he believe that (until lately, at all events) any such map was prepared by the officer in command of that department. Such a state of things, he believed, certainly did exist as lately as the end of the month of December, and he repeated that it was not creditable to this country. An hon. and gallant Member had referred to the proposed hospital at Smyrna. Now it was stated by a Member of the Government on a previous occasion that this hospital was merely intended for winter and not for summer. But the winter was almost passed, and summer was rapidly approaching in that country, and it was only to-day he read in the public papers that nurses and attendants were sent out to the Smyrna hospital. Now Smyrna was a very unhealthy place in summer. There was not a single English family resident in it who did not leave it during summer. Surely we had lost life enough already, and ought not to throw more away in this wanton manner. He did entreat the Government not to go on in this way any longer. The country was too excited with its losses to tolerate such conduct. Why, the hospital at Smyrna was built in the corner of a bog, at the lowest and worst part of the town, and in a few weeks the place would be afflicted with gastric fever, which always raged there in summer. He also desired to call the attention of the Government to the state of Balaklava. That harbour was a hole, surrounded by lofty mountains, and when the warm weather came they would have a plague breaking out at Balaklava, and perhaps carrying off every man there. He did entreat the Government to reflect upon that subject. Another subject to which he would refer was the Turkish contingent, which was to consist, as they had heard, of 20,000 men, to be commanded by English officers. Now, he knew nothing of the officer appointed to the chief command of that contingent, except that he was related to a noble Lord in the other House, but he saw that upon his staff already appointed was a relation of the noble Lord at the head of the War Department. General Vivian might be a very able man, but he was afraid that all the other qualifications he might possess were not sufficient to overcome his want of knowledge of the country and of the character of the troops he would have to command. He (Mr. Layard) did not think this Turkish contingent would answer. If the Government had sent out a sum of money to enable Omer Pasha to feed and support his men some months ago, they might have done some good; but he did not think that English officers alone would succeed in such a service. The Turks made admirable soldiers, and he was glad to see that Major Naemyth, at Edinburgh, the other day, bore ample testimony to their bravery; but he did not believe that such a body as that now proposed, commanded by an English officer, ignorant of the country and ignorant of his men, would answer the expectations formed of it.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that he had served on the Committee last year to consider the supply of small arms; the appointment of that Committee was the result of the proposal of the Government to found an arms factory, on the plea that they could not procure arms from the trade. The hon. Member who had spoken last but one (Mr. Dundas) had been a Member of that Committee; he heard the evidence, which decided the votes of the majority of that Committee against the proposal of the Government, who had sanctioned the appointment of that Committee; but the hon. Member had twelve years before seen the arms factory erected by the Government of the United States at Springfield, and therefore he could not believe that arms could be procured elsewhere than from a Government arms factory. He was an illustration of the fact, that there are some men who cannot learn. It was proved before that Committee that the arms trade of England had not only supplied the Government of this country, when fairly treated, but had at different times supplied large quantities of arms to the French, to the Spanish, to the Portuguese, to the Peruvian Government; in short, at different times, they had supplied large quantities of arms to the Governments of almost every country, and constantly supplied the whole quantity of arms required for our Indian army; and yet the Government departments wanted to persuade the House that the arms trade of England could not supply the English army, although a committee of the United States' House of Representatives had, in their report on the application for a renewal of Colonel Colt's patent, termed England the heart of the arms trade of the world. It had required some contrivance to establish even a seeming ground to so untenable a proposition: so Mr. Lovell, who had been inspector of small arms for the Ordnance for some years, had during the years 1851-2-3 established such stringent regulations for viewing the materials for arms, sent in by the trade, that one of the Government viewers, in his evidence, declared that it was impossible for the trade to supply materials for 25,000 arms at the price given by the Ordnance subject to those regulations, and that he had been compelled to reject quantities of serviceable materials. Even this.

coupled with the fact that the expenditure for small arms had been reduced from the average of 135,000*l.* a year, which had prevailed during the previous eight years, to 62,000*l.*, as the average of the three years 1851, 1852, 1853, had failed completely to prevent the supply being furnished by the trade; so Mr. Lovell compelled the Government workmen to put the sights on the first 20,000 Minié muskets ordered by the Government crooked, and, though warned of the fact, placed those arms thus mutilated in the hands of the Guards, by way of the illustration of the injustice at that time perpetrated by rejecting good materials. He would mention a fact; Mr. Lovell was appointed one of the judges for the Great Exhibition in 1851; a manufacturer of musket locks sent a lock for exhibition which had been rejected by the Government viewers, and Mr. Lovell, as judge, gave a first-class prize for the very lock which had been rejected under his own directions as unfit for the use of the army. By such unworthy means the arms trade had no doubt been injured and discouraged; and Sir Thomas Hastings, on the part of the Board of Ordnance, declared in his evidence that the trade could not be relied upon to produce 25,000 arms in the year for the use of the army. But what was the fact? Notwithstanding the mismanagement and misconduct of the officials of the Ordnance, notwithstanding the delay of orders, and of the delivery of patterns, which the hon. Member for Birmingham had described, the arms trade had furnished from 40,000 to 50,000 arms in the last year, almost all of the Minié construction, or nearly double the quantity Sir Thomas Hastings had stated as the maximum of their production. What happened last year? The Government came down to ask a vote of 100,000*l.* for an enormous Government Arms Factory, at the end of February. The House appointed the Small Arms Committee, that commenced their inquiry on the 2nd March. Upon the 7th April that Committee came to a Resolution that a factory upon a small scale should be adopted by the Government, but that the system of obtaining supplies of arms by contract from the trade should be continued. Well, if there was a real pressure for arms they ought to have sent an order to Birmingham. But they did not send such order. The Committee finally reported on the 12th of May. But no order was sent down by the Government for any such quantity of materials for arms as would enable the trade to cast aside their private orders and apply their whole resources to the service of the country till the 22nd of June. The noble Lord the Member for Totness (Lord Seymour) had very properly stated that an order for arms without patterns was merely waste paper. The manufacturers were required to supply an article made to one-thirty-thousandth part of an inch in accuracy. It was therefore impossible for them to produce such a weapon without a pattern. How was it possible for a man to work within one-thirty-thousandth part of an inch from a pattern that he had never seen? On the 21st of February, 1854, the Board of Ordnance entered into a contract for setting up—that was, putting together—20,000 muskets of the new pattern, which, compared with the quantity required, and the capabilities of the trade, was a small quantity; but when they did that they omitted to order the sights, so that literally they ordered the muskets to be set up without the sights; the pattern for the sights was not furnished till the middle of March. The first order for locks for the large order for 90,000 arms, which the Government were at last induced to give, was issued on the 30th of June, but the patterns were not delivered till two months later; the sights were ordered on the 30th of June, but the patterns were not delivered till the 11th of August; the rammers were ordered on the 30th of June, but the patterns were not delivered till the month of October. An order was issued for 30,000 bayonets on the 7th of August, and it was a part of the contract that they should be delivered on the 1st of September, but the pattern was not supplied the contractors till within a day or two of the date for delivery of the article. The Ordnance now came down to the House, and declared that they could not get their orders executed. Why, it was morally impossible that they could be; and he contended that the country owed a debt of gratitude to the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz), for having day after day devoted himself to obviating the difficulties which the mismanagement of the Ordnance had created. He believed, that with fair play, Birmingham, instead of having produced from 40,000 to 50,000 small arms within the year, would have produced 100,000. He said a year; but the dates of delivery of the patterns showed that it was within the last six months that most of the work could be done, for the manufacturers could not get on with the work until they had the patterns, and these they had had only six months. It had been stated in the public press in November that the Birmingham manufacturers were greatly deficient in meeting the exigencies of the state. Well a meeting of the manufacturers was called, and it was found, that, though it was the period of the year when the days were the shortest, there was not a single gas-light in any of the Government manufactories or view rooms, and the men were working only seven hours a day, and that the staff was so deficient that there were 10,000 musket barrels lying in the view-rooms uninspected, and thousands of other materials. The Government now came down to the House of Commons and asked it to vote 40,000*l.* for Enfield, 15,000*l.* postponed from before Christmas, in addition to 25,000*l.* in 1854. In other words they were asking the Committee to vote precisely what it refused them last year, on the ground that the trade had not supplied what their own negligence had prevented. The Small Arms Committee had reported that the system adopted towards the trade was a faulty one, and prevented their procuring the necessary supply of arms. The system, however, still remained unchanged. The Government relied upon Mr. Whitworth as a great authority on all mechanical subjects. What did Mr. Whitworth say in his evidence with regard to the system of having a separate contract for each part of the musket, and another for setting the parts together? Why, that it was simply absurd; contrary to mercantile principles, and the development of the arms trade, and altogether incompatible with success. Previous to October last there were only four contractors employed to set up the arms—that was, to put the locks, barrels, and stocks together, and make them into arms. The Government being at last persuaded that there were not sufficient contractors employed to do the work, appointed thirteen contractors more; and the seventeen together employed the whole of the labour of Birmingham. But in January they added another contractor. Of course he was a gun-maker; it would not be supposed that they would set anybody but a gun-maker to do the work! Would it be believed the Government actually gave the contract to make guns to a sword-maker who had not a workman in his employ fitted for, or instructed in, gun-making, and who, as the only thing he could do under the circumstances, went and bribed away the workmen from other contractors? Surely an occurrence of this nature was of itself almost sufficient to stop the work. There, then, was another instance of Government management. He might go on at yet greater length, detailing case after case, illustrative of the utter want of business management, and the total neglect of the mere commercial principles, which marked the transactions of the Government with the gun trade. Under the present system this must be the result. Let the Committee for a moment consider what that system is. They had, first, the Small Arms Committee at the Horse Guards to decide upon the pattern for the arms. These Gentlemen were, doubtless, very good soldiers and excellent officers, but not one of them knew how to make a gun more than he knew how to make his own watch. Yet to such men as these they left the question of what patterns the arms should be. They came to their decisions without possessing any experience or knowledge as to whether the arms could be produced according to their pattern, at a cost that would be paid for a weapon to be placed in the hands of the soldier. The next process was this—the Small Arms Committee, having decided on the pattern, sent it to the Ordnance; but amongst the officers of the Ordnance there was not a man who knew aught about gun-making; but they sent for the inspector of small arms. Well, it appeared that a former inspector had had the sights of 20,000 muskets put on crooked; that he had wilfully put those crooked-sighted muskets into the hands of soldiers destined for the Crimea, and that, if it had not been for the trade of Birmingham warning the Guards, they would have been sent out to the East with these mutilated arms. This showed how little the Ordnance could control their subordinate—the Inspector of Small Arms. True, they had now a respectable inspector of small arms in Mr. Gunner, but he was deficient in mercantile, though not in mechanical, knowledge; and while the muskets and materials for muskets came in at the rate of 1,600 per week—the rate at which they were at present produced—they could not expect him to be always in his place as a referee between the manufacturers and the viewers, and at the same time to be travelling throughout the districts where the construction of the several parts of the musket was carried on, for the purpose of seeing that the articles produced were of such a quality that they would eventually form a good musket, and were in course of production in such relative quantities that they would be ready for "setting up," that is, to be made into muskets at the time required. Why, it was physically impossible for any man to do both these things. What they wanted, therefore, was a well-qualified Commissioner to watch the progress of the trade, and to see that the several parts of the musket were produced by the time they were required. They had no officer of the kind, and the consequence was the creation of great confusion; but there was no blame to be attributed to the trade, who had produced within the year, and in the face of the greatest difficulties, nearly double the quantity of muskets that Sir Thomas Hastings had assigned as the maximum of production. If they only employed a business man to regulate the trade, as every commercial firm and as every foreign Government did, he (Mr. Newdegate) was convinced that we had in England available now, not six months hence, when it was said the proposed factory would be open, the power of producing arms as good as any manufactory that the Government could establish. It was absurd to suppose, however, that the trade could enter into large engagements so long as they knew they were in danger of being superseded. And the most effectual way of stopping the power of production was for the Government to commence a factory, by which means they would give an assurance to the trade that they would not get a return for the capital it had invested in machinery. The hon. Member for Linlithgowshire (Mr. G. Dundas) had spoken to-night as if there were no machinery employed by the trade. He could assure the hon. Gentleman that the most perfect machinery in the world was used in Birmingham for the manufacture of barrels—that machinery was used for bayonets and locks; in short, of every part of a rifle except the stock; and, according to the showing of Mr. Anderson, who recommended the Government factory, the form of the stock upon which the Government had insisted was such that it could not be made by machinery. He had heard it stated that Government had determined that, not being able to get a sufficient supply of small arms in England, they would get it from abroad—not insisting, however, upon the musket being so highly finished as it was in this country. Now, if the Government had been content with an efficient arm—not enhanced in price, and delayed in production, by unnecessary “finish,” or fashion, but serviceable, strong, well-bored, and with a good lock—they might have had double the quantity they were now receiving from the English trade. But they confined the trade to an expensive pattern, threw every impediment in their way that stupidity and want of business habits could suggest, and then complained that the trade of England could not supply the wants of the State. The plan embodied in this Vote was not, he was satisfied, intended to meet the emergency of the war in which we were now engaged. Nothing of the sort. If the Government factory had been commenced in March, 1854, according to Mr. Nasmyth, it would not have produced a musket till July or August, 1855. The fact was, that the Government had determined on taking the supply of arms from the trade of England, he knew not why, perhaps because they were actuated by a professional jealousy. The Small Arms Committee at the Ordnance Office would not admit the fact that gun-makers could make guns better than they themselves could. They were, therefore, determined to have it in their own hands, so that they would not be interfered with by practical men. They were jealous of suggestions; excluded them whenever they could; and, he believed, that they intended to exclude the intrusion of civilians by putting some artillery officers at the head of the factory, that they might study a trade to which they had never been apprenticed; no doubt they would bribe the best hands they could get; then they would come down to the House of Commons and exclaim, “See what an economical and efficient arrangement we have made!” By using the resources lavishly of the State they might no doubt supersede the trade. Thus, while they delayed the production of arms, they would manage to deprive the country of that great resource—that vast power of expansive production—which supporting her trade had hitherto afforded her, and which had not failed her in the present emergency.

MR. MONSELL said, he had never heard, since he had had the honour of a seat in the House of Commons, a statement which he could declare of his own knowledge to have been more entirely unfounded and erroneous than the one just made by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire; and this he thought he could prove to the satisfaction of the Committee. In the first place, the Board of Ordnance was accused of having insisted on a most elaborately finished gun, with a great many artistic devices about it which were utterly useless. No one attached more weight to the authority of Mr. Westley Richards than the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. When the Committee of which the hon. Gentleman was a Member had closed its inquiries, the Board of Ordnance asked Mr. Westley Richards what alterations he would recommend in the musket. Mr. Westley Richards most kindly devoted himself to the consideration of the subject, and suggested certain alterations, every one of which were adopted by the Board of Ordnance, and that was the answer to the noble Lord’s (Lord Seymour’s) charge of delay with regard to the pattern, for how was it possible to make changes without some little time being bestowed in considering what changes were desirable? Upon Mr. Richards’s recommendation a pattern was adopted, and by that pattern the guns were now made. [Mr. NEWDEGATE: “That was in 1853.”] That remark reminded him that the hon. Gentleman had indulged in denunciations of past times, and, for the purpose of censuring the Board of Ordnance, had raked up the ashes of Mr. Lovell, who died long since. But these charges against the Board of Ordnance could not be sustained. In the presence of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Scholefield) two contractors called at the Ordnance Office to make some complaint with reference to improving the stock of one of the guns. The representations they made were immediately attended to. He then asked the two gentlemen—one of them was the Chairman of the Association of Gunmakers of Birmingham—whether there was anything else with which the trade of Birmingham found fault? and those gentlemen replied that the Government was doing everything in the world that was right with respect to the Birmingham makers. Notwithstanding that, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Newdegate) endeavoured to raise a cry against the Government by denouncing these dealings with the Birmingham trade, and attempted to induce the Committee to reject a measure of the highest importance to the country. Now, what were the arguments in favour of a factory? Three gentlemen—Colonel Burn, assistant-inspector of artillery; Captain Ward, who had paid great attention to the subject of small arms; and Mr. Anderson, one of the most eminent mechanists in the country—proceeded to America, investigated most closely the American gunmaking trade, saw all that was done in the American factories, and made an elaborate Report, in which they assured the Government they could make these muskets as perfect as the Minié, at a cost not exceeding half that which the Government was paying for them, and now they were told that was an object of no importance, and which they ought not to secure. The hon. Gentleman talked of showing a good balance-sheet, as if he could not call for Returns, supposing any one were dishonest enough to present false accounts to Parliament. Those accounts, showing every single halfpenny expended, and the number of muskets made, would be presented at the end of every year, that the House might judge whether the factory ought to go on or not. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire had endeavoured to make it appear that there was an opposition between the Government factory and the gun trade of the country. But if the hon. Gentleman would reflect upon what was the number of arms required at home, abroad, and in the colonies, he would see at once that the gun trade of Birmingham need not be afraid in the least degree of having their orders stopped for many years to come. He did not think such an idea had entered the heads of the Birmingham gunmakers, for he had told them to make muskets as fast as they could, and the Government would take all they could produce. It had been said that the patterns for the arms had not been put into the hands of the gun-makers in proper time; but that could be a matter of comparatively small importance, provided the materials for those arms had been furnished in due course. Such had been the case, and the charge which the Government had brought against the gunmakers was, that materials having been placed in their hands in good time, they had not been sent out on the day appointed. But, passing over that subject, he should remind the Committee, in conclusion, that we had now; 26,000*l.* worth of machinery—17,000*l.* worth having been procured in America, and 9,000*l.* worth in this country. A contract had, in the month of December last, been made upon the part of the Government for a manufactory in which that machinery might be set up; and hon. Members did not hesitate to rise in that House to oppose a vote for such a manufactory, thus doing their utmost to render completely useless the large amount of machinery which had been purchased. For his own part, he was of opinion that the proposed factory, if established, would be of considerable advantage to the artisans of Birmingham, inasmuch as it would furnish them with models of the various descriptions of machines which in the making of arms it was desirable to employ. He should, therefore, beg the Committee, by agreeing to the Vote, to enable the Government to place in the hands of our troops, in sufficient numbers, such weapons as those by which the victories of Alma and of Inkerman had been achieved.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had, in the course of his speech, stated that Mr. Westley Richards had entirely approved of every part of the present musket.

MR. MONSELL: What I said was, that the musket now being manufactured was being made in accordance with the pattern which Mr. Westley Richards recommended.

MR. NEWDEGATE: He wished to know if the sight, as at present arranged, had been recommended by Mr. Richards? He happened to know that such was not the case; and while upon that subject he would read to the Committee a paragraph which appeared in the Times newspaper of the 27th ultimo. The correspondent of that paper at the seat of war wrote as follows—

"It may be remembered that some time ago I called attention to the curious arrangement of sending down each sick man with his rifle and pouch filled with cartridges. The rifles are put into store, and the notion was that the sick man might return to use them. Alas, the expectation has been too often unfounded; and the muskets have been left to lie in damp till they are covered with thick rust. The rifles and muskets gathered up from the battle-field have been left frequently in the same condition. Just see the result. When the last battalion of the 71st regiment came here they were provided with 400 of these Minié Rifles from store; 400 of the men were left with the old firelock. On the morning of the first day after they landed the regiment was marched out to support the Rifles against the expected attack of the enemy on the heights. Their rifles were thick with rust, but they loaded them as usual. Yesterday, when they tried to fire off the charges, not one-half of the rifles went off. That would have been the case had the enemy come on, but it would not be so again, for now the arms are cleaned and fit for use. Surely they ought to be kept clean and fit for use in store? The men are not provided with apparatus for drawing the Minié ball; in order to clean the piece it must be discharged."

Now he should put it to the hon. Member

whether Mr. Westley Richards, a gentleman who deserved well of the country, had not gone to the Ordnance and told the heads of that department that the wrenches for drawing the balls of the Minié musket would not answer the purpose; and whether they had not assured that Gentleman that those wrenches were perfectly efficient? "He should also wish to know whether the Ordnance Department had not now in their possession wrenches which Mr. Westley Richards had proposed, and by which the great inconveniences to which our army before Sebastopol was in that particular subjected, might be obviated?" He knew it to be the fact that the Ordnance Department had in these two and in other instances departed from the recommendation of Mr. Richards; and they, therefore, had no right to lay to the charge of that gentleman difficulties for which they alone must be held responsible. The hon. Gentleman had stated that the circumstance of the patterns not having been furnished to the gun-makers had nothing to do with the delay to be attributed to the setters-up in completing the arms. But the materials had not been furnished in proper time, and hence was it possible that that delay should not have taken place. "The supply of arms from Birmingham had diminished to 1,500 per month, in consequence of there being no materials for the setters-up to put together." The Government were, however, at present in receipt of that number of muskets; and if the trade were not impeded that number would increase to 2,600; but if the Government were to establish a great factory they would destroy the confidence of the traders and diminish the supplies. No trader would work except he expected to make a reasonable return, and if the Committee were to sanction the proposal of the Government they would be supporting their determination to supersede trade.

LORD SEYMOUR said, the hon. Gentleman the Clerk of the Board of Ordnance had undertaken to defend his department, which both that House and the Government had condemned. But he did not wish to say anything more on that subject, for the Board was now done away with. The hon. Gentleman had said that he did not wish to deprive the makers of the rifle which had won the battle of the Alma and of Inkerman of the advantage of still making them. But who did make them? Why, they were made at Birmingham. And yet the Government wished to have a factory of their own, and asked a Vote of the large sum of 80,000*l.* that they might establish one. Therefore, so far as the fact went, all that the hon. Gentleman had said about the battle of the Alma and of Inkerman was a mere poetical notion. The hon. Gentleman had stated some reason why a pattern of the guns was not delivered. But it appeared that the Ordnance did not absolutely know when the pattern was delivered, and on that point the whole question turned. Was that the way to transact the business of so important a department? The Ordnance had treated the matter with neglect. What the Committee wanted to know was the price, and Committee upstairs suggested that 30,000*l.* should be expended to make the trial; that the best machinery should be got and the rifles produced. That was promised should be done in eighteen months; but after ten months, and when the money had been spent in machinery, they came before the House, and asked for more money to erect buildings. Such treatment was not fair, and to be told that unless 80,000*l.* were granted the whole matter must be stopped was nothing less than the violation of an engagement. He did not look to the interests of Birmingham, but to the important question, whether it was desirable for Government to manufacture these arms. He doubted whether it was at the time, but had no objection to the trial. At present that trial remained to be made, and, although the hon. Gentleman stated the Ordnance could make them at less price, he thought, before large sums were voted for that purpose, the assertion ought to be proved.

MR. JOHN MACGREGOR said, that while he was willing to vote with the most lavish generosity every sum of money actually necessary for bringing to a conclusion the present war, he thought a strict scrutiny should be made of the various items proposed. He had the greatest faith in the noble Lord at the head of the Ministry, but thought a most unfortunate selection of men had been made in the formation of the Ministry.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he had heard with great surprise and astonishment the opposition which had been made to this Vote. We were engaged in a war which, by universal consent, it required the greatest exertion to conduct with success. It was well known that owing to various circumstances we had for some years past suffered from a great deficiency in the supply of small arms for the army. A proposal was made for the establishment of a factory which would not probably at any early period enable the Ordnance to furnish the number required, but which would contribute to furnish our army with an excellent weapon, and which might probably in course of time render them independent of other sources of supply, or, at all events, enable them to command those sources on moderate and reasonable terms. Yet, at this very moment, when we required every exertion possible to furnish our army and militia with arms, when it was well known that in Ireland some regiments of militia were, he might almost say, doing duty with broomsticks for want of muskets to put into their hands—hon. Gentlemen got up, and, upon various pretences, endeavoured to prevent the country from having the advantage of the establishment which this Vote was intended to afford. Of all reasons on earth, the reason of his noble Friend behind him (Lord Seymour) seemed to him the weakest he could possibly imagine. He forsooth opposed the Vote because the Government was going to reorganise the Ordnance Department, to improve its organisation, and to make arrangements by which errors and delays which had occurred at former periods might be prevented. For that very reason, because the department was going to be made more efficient, and more capable of performing the public service with promptitude and accuracy, his noble Friend objected to the Vote which was now proposed. What would he have said if the contrary had been the case; if the Government had said that that department of which he complained was perfect and wanted no improvement; if they had announced to the Committee that they were not going to make any alteration or any improvement in the arrangement of the civil department? His noble Friend would, doubtless, then have turned upon them and said, "Then I refuse you the Vote. You won't improve your system; you won't make a better organisation of the executive departments which are to carry this service into practice, and therefore I refuse." Now, because they were going to do the very things which he had urged them to do, he made that a reason for refusing to the public the advantage of the establishment which they now asked the Committee to give them the means of providing. He (Lord Palmerston) did trust that the Committee would rise superior to these miserable quibbles. He trusted it would not allow itself to be made the victim of local interests, or of interests connected with particular places and particular branches of trade. We wanted to make use of all the sources of supply which we could possibly obtain. We wanted all that Birmingham could afford us. We had been obliged to have recourse to Liege to assist us in obtaining what we required. We had been compelled to go to the United States of America to procure an additional supply, and he did think that that House would not be performing the duty which it owed to the nation if it refused that which his hon. Friend the Clerk of the Ordnance now asked for the purpose of establishing that which would be only a very partial and experimental establishment for the supply of arms. Did his noble Friend (Lord Seymour) imagine that the 25,000*l.* which was voted last year was enough to establish a manufactory of arms? It was only a sum upon account. No man could imagine that for 25,000*l.* you could have erected an establishment which would have afforded you the means of ascertaining whether you could make arms at a cheaper rate than was charged by the private trade. He did hope that the statement of his hon. Friend would be sufficient to induce the Committee to accede to this Vote, and that the Government would not, at a time when it required every exertion to furnish our army, our militia, and our colonies with arms, be turned round and deprived of the means of supply which the establishment now proposed would afford.

MR. BAILLIE said, he wished to ask the hon. Gentleman the Clerk of the Ordnance whether the contracts for forage for the horses in the East were made by the Ordnance or the Treasury? This would not be a question to be asked on ordinary occasions, but during the war things had not been done in the ordinary manner, and the Committee would not be surprised to hear that the horses were sent without forage, or the forage without horses. After the way in which the horses of the cavalry, artillery, and commissariat had been starved in the Crimea, and knowing that between 15,000 and 16,000 horses were to be sent out for the Commissariat, he thought he was justified in asking which department made the contracts for forage.

MR. MONSELL said, that the Ordnance did not, and he could not say which department did. The Treasury had made use of the Ordnance to furnish some oats.

Viscount Palmerston

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, the Commissariat Department was responsible for the supply of forage.

MR. MUNTZ said, he was astonished that the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) should say that he was influenced by local interest at the country's expense. No man was more anxious than he (Mr. Muntz) was to avoid being so influenced, and whenever the question was between local interests and that he always flung the former to the winds. He should move the reduction of the present Vote, because he was convinced that, by so doing, he would be serving the interests of the country. As a specimen of the way in which the Ordnance conducted itself in its relations with manufacturers at Birmingham, he would read to the Committee the following letters—

"Office of Ordnance, August 4, 1854.

"Gentlemen.—A report having been made to the Board of Ordnance that you have failed to make the deliveries of the undermentioned articles, due from you within the time specified on your contract—

"Date of Contract.      "Articles,
"October 6, 1853, 0—411.      "Bayonets.

"I am commanded to acquaint you therewith, and to desire you will immediately state why you have not fulfilled your contract; and I am further to inform you that the penalties attached thereto will be levied upon all the articles not delivered by the time limited.

"J. Wood.

"Messrs. W. Deakin and Sons."

"Hazelwell Mills, near Birmingham,

"August 7, 1854.

"Sir,—We beg respectfully to inform you that our order for bayonets, dated the 6th of October, 1853, 0—411, was completed the 4th day of July last being within the time specified in our contract.

"Wm. Deakin and Sons."

"J. Wood, Esq."

Here then was a case in which parties were written to and reprimanded, although they had completed their contract a month before the time specified. The hon. Member concluded by moving, as an Amendment, that the Vote before the Committee should be reduced by 15,000*l.*

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 34; Noes 170: Majority 136.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Vote agreed to.

(2) 22,346, Number of Men (Ordnance).

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he must complain of the large expense to be incurred in the erection of barracks.

COLONEL KNOX said, he would suggest to the hon. Member for Lambeth that this Vote had nothing to do with barracks.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, there was one very material point to which he would wish to call the attention of the Committee. He was very happy to hear that the Ordnance Department was to be transferred hereafter to that of the Secretary for War, as was also the Commissariat. By this arrangement an enormous saving might be effected. He observed there were ninety-one storekeepers' establishments, and fifty-four barrack establishments at home and abroad, making altogether 145 such establishments in connection with the Ordnance Department; and there were besides, in nearly all the same places, other establishments connected with the Army, with the Commissariat, and also with the Navy. Now, if the noble Lord would grant an inquiry he (Mr. Williams) would undertake to show that by uniting all those establishments a great saving might be made, and these departments more efficiently conducted. There was another remark he had to make: why had they voted 400,000*l.* for a foreign force, and were now required to vote 90,000*l.* more for clothing it, and another sum of 50,000*l.* on behalf of it, when the noble Lord had stated that the raising of that foreign force had proved a failure? He observed an amount of upwards of 500,000*l.* for fortifications, and he thought much of the immense sum—nearly 2,000,000*l.*—which was charged for fortifications and barracks might be saved to the country, and should be saved at this time of pressure.

COLONEL GILPIN said, he did not join in the hon. Member's objection to the cost of barracks, for if we had a large number of troops in the country they were better in barracks than anywhere else; but he would ask whether any arrangements had been made, since last year, for the better accommodation of married men in barracks? He called attention to this subject last year, and was then told it should receive full consideration, but he was sorry to see that the same disgraceful system still existed. He saw no reason why rooms should not be set apart for married people, and a provision made for enclosing such a space for each couple as was necessary for convenience and decency. He did hope that this subject would be attended to; he was sure the public would not object to any reasonable expense to remedy so great a grievance. We were attempting now to model cottages and lodging houses, and it should not be said that the barracks were the only dwellings in which common decency could not be observed.

CAPTAIN SCOBELL said that, in referring to the charge for hospitals, he had read that day in a newspaper some excellent suggestions about having floating hospitals. We knew that at Scutari and Balaklava the hospitals were crowded; and we had many large old ships, which might be sent out under jury masts, and conveyed by steamers, to become floating hospitals, with only men enough on board to keep them clean, and with a staff of nurses and surgeons. A ship could easily be ventilated when at anchor, and might be towed to another place when the patients became convalescent, to give them change of air.

MR. MASTERS SMITH said, he strongly advised that care should be taken for the better ventilation of hospitals; and recommended that the museum of anatomy and natural history at Fort Pitt should be better supported than it had been.

MR. OTWAY said, he thought it extraordinary that, when the Government were forming a new camp at Aldershot, they did not take advantage of it to instruct 10,000 soldiers in the building of their own huts—an art in which our men appeared to be very deficient.

COLONEL KNOX said, he would like to know where the hon. Member would get his 10,000 soldiers? Why, they were not in existence.

MR. MONSELL said, he thought the name of "huts" had rather misled the hon. Gentleman; those huts were in fact wooden barracks, which were so constructed that if they were taken proper care of they would last twenty years; and there was great want of larger accommodation for the army and militia, especially in Ireland, and also in this country; and unless it were provided, there was no possibility of getting rid of those inconveniences to which the hon. Member for Bedfordshire (Colonel Gilpin) had alluded, and which he agreed in considering most objectionable.

MR. OTWAY said, he did not see any reason why, although these huts were intended as permanent barracks, the 10,000 soldiers who would be encamped there should not have learned how to construct them. Were any hired carpenters or labourers of any other class employed for the purpose?

MR. MONSELL replied, that labourers were so employed. As for the soldiers, most of them, being fresh recruits, were so much occupied in learning the goose step that they could not be employed in building their huts at present.

Vote agreed to; as was also the next Vote.

(3) 1,117,833*l.* Ordnance Military Corps. Allowances and contingencies of ordnance corps.

(4) 1,406,883*l.* Commissariat and Barrack Supplies.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that the sum specified for warm and waterproof clothing, in addition to the money already voted for that purpose, made up a very large amount.

COLONEL KNOX said, he did not approve of voting 90,000*l.* for clothing the foreign legion, which existed only in the air at present, or in the imaginations of the Government. As for the great coats supplied to the army, there never was anything more infamous than their quality; nor was it to be surprised at, with the price paid for them, that they fell to pieces so soon. The cloth was the very worst kind of baize, and they were quite useless to the men. He wished to know if they had been surveyed before they were taken into store? If any gentleman in the Ordnance department had surveyed them, he ought to be dismissed; if not, the Ordnance had committed a great neglect. It was a most disgraceful fraud.

MR. MONSELL said, he took very much the same view of the unfitness of the great coats as the hon. and gallant Member for Marlow; they were not at all what they ought to have been. But the fact was, that it was thought desirable to get the lightest possible article, that the soldier should have the less weight to carry. He believed they had been properly surveyed, and were according to pattern; and there was, consequently, no ground to charge any one with fraud.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, what he had to complain of was, that the shell jackets served out to the militia in Scotland were without lining, to save a shilling a jacket; and wore out very soon, so that the militia recruits had the expense of lining them.

LORD ELCHO said, he wished to know if the great coats were waterproof? The very lightest material might now be made waterproof. He also wished to know if any provision was made for great coats similar to those hung up in the sentry-boxes in other countries. He had noticed that during the late severe weather the sentries appeared in their red coats, and put on their great coats when the weather changed for the better. He believed that the great coats were reserved for night duty, but he thought the better plan would be to have a great coat hung up in the sentry-box so that the sentinel might wear it when necessary.

MR. PERCY said, he hoped the attention of the Government would be directed not only to the quality of the clothing, but also to the manner in which it was made up. He believed that the sum paid for making a great coat was from 6d. to 10d. only. He also regretted to see that the soldiers who had returned from the Crimea, wounded and sick, had not been supplied with new clothing.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, if it were intended to furnish great coats to the militia, he thought it would be better that Government should furnish them, as they did to the regular army, rather than the colonels of the regiment. He wished to know, also, whether the Master General of the Ordnance (Lord Raglan) was still receiving the salary attached to the office?

MR. E. BALL said, he was not a military man, but he thought it was a shame that British soldiers should be clothed in coats which cost only 6½d. to make, and which had been described as resembling a sieve through which the water could run. It was an abominable thing to vote such enormous sums of money for clothing our brave fellows in such a scandalous way.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he could bear testimony to the fact that, until recently, the cloth supplied to all the regiments, except a few favoured ones, was of the very worst description.

LORD ELCHO said, that it had been stated that the boots sent out to the Crimea were generally too small for the men. Some time ago on visiting a contractor's shop, he saw some boots, which he was told was going to the Crimea. On his remarking that they appeared to him too small, the answer given was that there were three sizes, and that those which he saw were the smallest. He observed, too, that these boots had no nails in them; and Gentlemen who were in the habit of walking much in the country would bear him out in the statement, that without nails in the boots or shoes it was impossible to walk comfortably. On his remarking in the shop that the boots in question had no nails, the contractor said to him, "The subject has been maturely considered. I can assure you that these boots have been sat upon by a Committee of general officers who have declared that when they served in Canada, the climate of which resembled that of the Crimea, they never wore nails in their boots." Probably it was so long since these gentlemen were in active service that they had forgotten whether their boots had nails or not.

MR. MILES said, there was another defect in the boots supplied besides the want of nails; namely, that they were so badly stitched and put together, that in a very short time the sole came away from the body of the boot. What he (Mr. Miles) rose for, however, was to seek for some information with regard to the clothing of foreign regiments. There were items in the Estimates which had special reference to a foreign legion, and as he was informed that not a man had been enrolled under the Bill on that subject, he wished to know whether the Turkish contingent was to be regarded as the foreign legion. At present the foreign legion was purely imaginary, which he trusted that the Turkish contingent was not. The Committee could not be expected to vote 90,000*l.* for the clothing of a force which did not exist.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, the Vote was proposed in the expectation that the imaginary force would become a real one. Of course if it did not become so, no money would be spent. The Turkish contingent was a different matter altogether.

MR. MONSELL said, for the circumstance of the boots being without nails he was not at all responsible, as that article was not supplied by the Ordnance, but by the army clothier.

(5) 303,149*l.*, Establishments at Home and Abroad.

SIR JAMES ANDERSON said, he wished to know why the barrack establishments at home were not made more available for the lodging of the militia. A few days ago the Stirlingshire militia were billeted on the inhabitants, although there were very few troops in Stirling Castle; and much dissatisfaction was felt on the subject in the neighbourhood.

MR. COWAN said, the feeling described by the hon Member for Stirling prevailed among his own constituents; the evil being increased by the fact that, in Scotland, the militia were billeted on the inhabitants generally.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he concurred with his hon. Friends, that it was highly desirable that, wherever it was possible, the militia should be in barracks. When they were called out, it was intended that they should be so quartered; and that was one reason why they were not called out earlier. At first the Government called out only such a proportion of the militia as they thought could be lodged in barracks.

Vote agreed to; as was also the next Vote.

(6) 368,872*l.* Wages.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

"That a sum, not exceeding 2,792,348*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of Ordnance Stores for Land and Sea Service, which will come in course of payment during the year ending the 31st day of March, 1866."

MR. MUNTZ said, he should move an amendment that the vote be reduced by 40,000*l.*, being the item for the small-arm factory at Enfield.

LORD SEYMOUR said, he would recommend the hon. Gentleman, after the expression of opinion upon the 15,000*l.* Vote, not to divide the Committee; but he must complain that the Government had not had the courtesy to state what progress had been made with the building, and when it was likely that some arms would be produced.

MR. MONSELL said, that he hoped to be able to commence the manufacture about the beginning of July. A great portion of the American machinery had already arrived, and the building would soon be completed.

MR. H. HERBERT said, he wished to call attention to the fact that the Irish Militia were without arms, and in corroboration of the fact he would state a circumstance which had occurred in his own county. Not having received any printed forms, his regiment had sent a requisition for arms to the Quarter Master General in Dublin, in manuscript. That officer sent it back to the general of the district, stating that the requisition ought to have gone through him (the general of the district), and that he could take no notice of any that was not printed. The general of the district, therefore, transmitted it to him (Mr. Herbert). He had to send to London for a printed requisition to apply for arms; and the consequence was that two months had passed by, and the regiment had not got a single musket. In the mean time the general of the district had ordered his regiment to supply men for sentry duty, and they were actually keeping sentry with sticks in their hands. Though a shillalah might be a national weapon, and might be very effectively employed at times, yet he thought that a limited supply of "Old Brown Bess" would be desirable.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he objected to the Vote, and should move that the Chairman report progress.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he hoped, if the Vote were passed, that the noble Lord at the head of the Government would take immediate steps to assure the gunmaking trade that he did not intend to supersede them; otherwise the Vote would do more to shake their confidence than anything that could be done.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he wished to put a question relative to the hammered-iron ordnance. Experiments had been directed to be made, and he, as a soldier, interested in the question, wished to know whether any report had been made on the subject? He wished also to know, whether any report of the experiments under the superintendence of Colonel Simmons had been made?

MR. MONSELL replied, he should have no objection to lay the Report on the table when it was received, but at present it had not yet been made.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he hoped the hon. Member (Mr. Maguire) would not insist upon reporting progress, but take the discussion on the Report.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he was only anxious to have the subject discussed, and, on the understanding that another opportunity would be given for that purpose, would withdraw his amendment.

MR. SCHOFIELD said, he must contend that this was not a mere Birmingham question, but one affecting the country at large. The gun trade formed a very small fraction of the trade of Birmingham, and it was not on account of the supposed interests of Birmingham, but because he believed the Government could not provide themselves so well with arms as private manufacturers could do, that he was opposed to the Vote.

MR. WALPOLE said, there existed a misapprehension that an account of the Resolution come to by the Small Arms Committee last year, the Government had been prevented from obtaining as large a supply of arms as otherwise they would have done, but he believed that, had the Vote been carried last year, it would have been impossible to establish the manufactory in time to provide the necessary supply of arms.

MR. MONSELL said, the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly right in his conclusion. It would have been impossible for Government to manufacture the arms required in any circumstances.

Motion made, and Question put—

The Committee divided:—Ayes 24; Noes 110: Majority 86.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Vote agreed to; House resumed.

The House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, March 6, 1855.

ARMY IN THE CRIMEA—THE CAVALRY CHARGE AT BALAKLAVA.

THE EARL OF LUCAN: My Lords, I must trouble your Lordships by presenting myself before you on a personal matter.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, if the subject is the one on which I suppose the noble Earl is going to speak, may I request him to defer his observations until my noble Friend the Secretary of War and the Commander in Chief have taken their places?

THE EARL OF LUCAN: My Lords, I find myself compelled to present myself before your Lordships on a case personal to myself. As I informed your Lordships, that immediately on my arrival in England I applied to the General Commanding in Chief to have my conduct subjected to an investigation by a court-martial—

EARL GREY: I beg the noble Earl's pardon, but I rise to order. I feel that this is a very inconvenient course of proceeding. The noble Earl wishes to read a document without any question being before the House. If the noble Earl wishes to place the document before your Lordships, the regular course will be to move for its production; and the noble Earl can then raise any question upon it he thinks proper. The course the noble Earl now proposes to pursue is quite contrary to the rules of both Houses of Parliament.

THE EARL OF LUCAN: I believe the course which I am about to pursue is perfectly regular, inasmuch as I intend to move that the letters which I am about to read should be printed.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: If the noble Earl means to move for papers without any discussion, there is no objection; but if the noble Earl intends to comment on them before they are laid upon the table, it is irregular. I am sure that the noble Earl's discretion will suggest to him that the present is not the proper course to pursue.

LODR PANMURE: I have these papers with me ready to lay upon the table, and they will be in your Lordships' hands to-morrow morning; but the noble Earl can, if he thinks fit, read them now. I had the honour of seeing the noble Earl on Friday afternoon last, but did not receive from him any intimation of his intention to read any further letters to your Lordships.

THE EARL OF LUCAN: It is undoubtedly true that I was with the noble Lord on Friday afternoon, but the papers I am now going to read I did not then know the existence of, and therefore should have found some difficulty in referring to them. I suppose the noble Lord will have no objection to my reading a note I received from him yesterday. I desire to do so, because it charges me with producing an incomplete correspondence. The noble Lord says—

"My dear Lord,—As I perceive that you read an incomplete correspondence on Friday in the House of Lords, I think it right to forward you a copy of Lord Raglan's despatch of the 16th of December, 1854, addressed to the Duke of Newcastle. Yours faithfully, "PANMURE.

And why was the correspondence incomplete? Because I did not know of the existence of such a letter as the one forwarded to me, and because, for reasons best known to the Government—or, more properly speaking, to the late Government and the noble Lord—papers which should have been made public long ago, were kept back until yesterday afternoon. Now, my Lords, I hold the letter in my hand, and as I do not intend to offer a single word of comment upon it, I shall certainly read it, unless I am stopped by your Lordships' House, and for this reason, because I think that I should not be acting fairly by the Government, or by Lord Raglan, if I did not take the earliest opportunity of putting your Lordships and the public in possession of the whole of the facts of the case. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne), to whom there is no Peer more ready than I am to yield deference, says that so long as "I refrain from any comments I am justified in reading this letter." I shall take advantage of this admission.—

"My Lord Duke,—I regret to be under the Necessity of forwarding to your Grace the Copy of a Letter which has been addressed to me by Lieutenant General the Earl of Lucan.

"When I received it I placed it in the Hands of Brigadier General Airey, the Quartermaster General, and requested him to suggest to his Lordship to withdraw the Communication, considering that it would not lead to his Advantage in the slightest Degree; but Lord Lucan having declined to take the Step recommended, I have but One Course to pursue, that of laying the Letter before your Grace, and submitting to you such Observations upon it as I am bound in Justice to myself to put you in possession of.

"Lieutenant General the Earl of Lucan complains, that in my Despatch to your Grace of the 28th of October I stated that 'from some Misconception of the Instruction to advance the Lieutenant General considered that he was bound to attack at all Hazards.' His Lordship conceives this Statement to be a grave Charge, and an Imputation reflecting seriously on his professional Character, and he deems it incumbent upon him to state those Facts which he cannot doubt must clear him from what he respectfully submits is altogether unmerited.

"I have referred to my Despatch, and far from being willing to recall one Word of it, I am prepared to declare, that not only did the Lieutenant General misconceive the written Instruction that was sent him, but that there was nothing in that Instruction which called upon him to attack at all Hazards, or to undertake the Operation which led to such brilliant Display of Gallantry on the Part of the Light Brigade, and unhappily at the same Time occasioned such lamentable Casualties in every Regiment composing it.

"In his Lordship's Letter he is wholly silent with respect to a previous Order which had been sent him. He merely says that the Cavalry was formed to support an intended Movement of the Infantry.

"This previous Order was in the following Words: 'The Cavalry to advance, and take advantage of any Opportunity to recover the Heights. They will be supported by Infantry, which has been ordered to advance on Two Fronts.'

"This Order did not seem to me to have been attended to, and therefore it was that the Instruction by Captain Nolan was forwarded to him. Lord Lucan must have read the First Order with very little Attention, for he now states that the Cavalry was formed to support the Infantry; whereas he was told by Brigadier General Airey, that the Cavalry was to advance, and take advantage of any Opportunity to recover the Heights, and that they would be supported by Infantry; not that they were to support the Infantry; and so little had he sought to do as he had been directed, that he had no Men in advance of his main Body, made no Attempt to regain the Heights, and was so little informed of the Position of the Enemy, that he asked Captain Nolan 'where and what he was to attack, as neither Enemy nor Guns were in sight.'

"This, your Grace will observe, is the Lieutenant General's own Admission. The Result of his Inattention to the First Order was, that it never occurred to him that the Second was connected with a Repetition of the First. He viewed it only as a positive Order to attack at all Hazards—the Word 'attack,' be it observed, was not made use of in General Airey's Note—an unseen Enemy, whose Position, Numbers, and Composition he was wholly unacquainted with, and whom, in consequence of a previous Order, he had taken no step whatever to watch.

"I undoubtedly had no Intention that he should make such an Attack; there was nothing in the Instruction to require it; and therefore I conceive I was fully justified in stating to your Grace what was the exact Truth, that the Charge arose from the Misconception of an Order for the Advance which Lord Lucan considered obliged him to attack at all Hazards.

"I wish I could say with his Lordship, that, having decided, against his Conviction, to make the Movement, he did all he could to render it as little perilous as possible. This indeed is far from being the Case, in my Judgment.

"He was told that the Horse Artillery might accompany the Cavalry. He did not bring it up. He was informed that the French Cavalry was on the Left. He did not invite their Co-operation. He had the whole of the Heavy Cavalry at his Disposal. He mentions having brought up only Two Regiments in support; and he omits all other Precautions, either from Want of due Consideration, or from the Supposition that the unseen Enemy was not in such great Force as he apprehended, notwithstanding that he was warned of it by Lord Cardigan, after the latter had received the Order to attack.

"I am much concerned, my Lord Duke, to have to submit these Observations to your Grace. I entertain no Wish to disparage the Earl of Lucan in your Opinion, or to cast a Slur upon his professional Reputation; but, having been accused by his Lordship of having stated of him what was unmerited in my Despatch, I have felt obliged to enter into the Subject, and trouble your Grace at more Length than I could have wished in vindication of a Report to your Grace in which I strictly confined myself to that which I knew to be true, and had indulged in no Observations whatever or in any Expression which could be viewed either as harsh or in any way grating to the Feelings of his Lordship.—I have, &c.

(Signed) "RAGLAN."

Now, my Lords, nearly at the same moment at which I received this letter, I received another letter from the General Commanding in Chief, in answer to an application which I had made to the noble Lord to allow my conduct to be investigated by a court-martial.

"Horse Guards, March 5, 1855.

"My Lord—I have had the honour to submit to the General Commanding in Chief your letter of the 2nd of March instant, reporting your arrival in London, and requesting that your conduct in ordering the charge of the Light Cavalry Brigade at the action of Balaklava, on the 25th of October last, and writing the letter you addressed to Field Marshal Lord Raglan on the 30th of November, may be submitted to and investigated by a court-martial.

"I am directed by the General Commanding in Chief to state in reply that, after a careful review of the whole correspondence which has passed, he cannot recommend to Her Majesty that your Lordship's conduct in those transactions should be investigated by a court-martial. I have the honour to be, my Lord, your Lordship's most obedient servant,

G. A. WETHERALL, A.G.
"Lieutenant General the Earl of Lucan."

My Lords, on seeing this letter of Lord Raglan's—with the existence of which I was uninformed until yesterday afternoon—my case appeared to be so entirely altered that I felt myself obliged to write to the General Commanding in Chief this letter, which has this day been delivered to the Adjutant General—

"Hanover Square, 5th March, 1855.
"Sir—I have the Honour to acknowledge the Receipt of your Letter informing me that the Commander in Chief cannot recommend that my Conduct should be investigated by a Court-martial.

"Until this day I have been kept uninformed of the Letter from Lord Raglan, which appears to have been addressed by his Lordship to the Minister of War when forwarding mine of the 30th November last.

"This Letter contains entirely new Matter, and is replete with new Charges, reflecting more seriously than before on my professional Judgment and Character.

"There is now imputed to me, and for the First Time, not only the Misconception of one Order, but Inattention to and Neglect of another Order; and, again, a total Incapacity to carry out any Instructions and to avail myself of the Means placed by his Lordship at my Disposal.

"Charges so grave and of a Character so exclusively professional cannot, I submit, be properly disposed of without a Military Investigation. I find myself, therefore, compelled to express my anxious Wish that the Commander in Chief will be induced kindly to reconsider his Decision, and consent to my whole Conduct on the Day of the Action of Balaklava, 25th October, 1854, being investigated by a Court-martial. I have, &c.

"(Signed) LUCAN, Lieutenant General.
"The Adjutant General, &c. &c. &c."

Now, my Lords, I do not intend on this occasion, any more than I did the other night, to depart from the undertaking into which I entered; and therefore I shall now content myself with merely thanking your Lordships for the kind attention you have accorded to me.

Moved—

"That there be laid before this House Copies of any Letters or Papers relating to the Conduct of Lieutenant General the Earl of Lucan, commanding the Cavalry Division of the Army in the Crimea."

LORD PANMURE: My Lords, it is not my intention to make many remarks upon the painful position in which your Lordships' House is at present placed in having a matter which is entirely one of military discipline thus brought before you; and I trust that your Lordships will not make this an occasion on which points of discipline are to be discussed in this House. I wish merely to explain one point. The noble Earl says that this correspondence ought to have been laid upon your Lordships' table long ago. Now, when I was appealed to on a former occasion to produce this correspondence, I stated my reason for withholding it, which was, that the noble Earl was then on his passage home to this country, and would soon arrive here, and that if, after he reached England, he should desire that it should be produced before the House and the country, no man would be more unwilling to stand in the way of its being laid on the table than I should. That was my only reason for then objecting to the production of the correspondence; but I have brought it down to the House with me to-night, and now hold it in my hand, for the purpose of laying it on your Lordships' table.

Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

CONTRABAND OF WAR.

LORD BERNERS said, he had given notice of a Motion for Returns of Lead and other articles contraband of War exported from the different Ports of Great Britain and Ireland to Foreign Ports since the declaration of War; and of the Imports into Great Britain and Ireland of Russian Produce in Neutral Vessels during the last year. The noble Lord said that he thought it his duty to move for these returns in consequence of representations made in the public prints, to the effect that not only munitions of war were sent from this country to Russia, but that they are so sent by authority of the Custom-house in London. He hoped, for the credit of the Government and honour of the country, that those statements might be authoritatively contradicted. He had traced a paragraph to one of the Hull papers, of the 2nd November last, headed "Shipment of Lead to St. Petersburg." It stated that fifty tons of lead had been entered for shipment from London, vid

Hull, to Memel, to be taken thence to St. Petersburg; the paragraph went on to say, that the Custom-house authorities at Hull having refused to pass it, as being an important munition of war, a telegraphic message was sent from London authorising them to forward it, and it was accordingly done. He understood that any articles detained at any of Her Majesty's Custom-houses could not be forwarded without a Treasury warrant. Now, if any officer in the Custom-house or Treasury had given authority for such a transaction as this, it was proper that he should be known and called to account, whether his position was high or low, because it was contrary to the interests of the country, if not to the laws of the land, to proceed as we had been doing, and to send not only an immense amount of gold to the enemy, but even actual munitions of war. It had been stated to him by the editor of the Hull paper to which he alluded, that similar shipments had been going on through the summer months and up to the 30th of November, when the Order in Council appeared, and that in substance the paragraph in question was correct. From a return which he had received from the head of a large house in Liverpool, it appeared that shipments of lead to Memel went on to a great extent. The returns of Trade and Navigation proved that that was the case. Another return showed that the exports of iron and steel to foreign ports had considerably increased, as compared with 1853. The exportation of these articles to foreign countries involved very important national considerations, and the Government ought explicitly to avow the policy they intended to adopt towards nations with which we were at war, and likewise towards nations which regarded themselves as neutrals. Distinct information upon this head should be afforded to the commercial classes of this country, the precise instructions given to our admirals respecting the blockade of foreign ports should also be made known to them, and every officer commanding our cruisers should be fully apprised of the duty they were required to perform. Official returns showed that the importation of a variety of articles of foreign produce had considerably increased of late years; and this remark applied especially to the four great articles of Russian production. In 1854, a large increase in tallow took place. In hemp, flax, and hides, also, a considerable increase would be perceived in the six months ending July, 1854, over the corresponding period of 1852. The following was the detail—

SIX MONTHS ENDING 5TH JULY.

Hemp ....., cwt.	280,607	250,073	332,421
Hides, untanned cwt.	202,464	330,603	273,821
" tanned, lbs.	1,075,207	3,604,769	2,041,580
Flax.....cwt.	410,876	627,173	643,835
Tallow.....cwt.	242,469	205,349	256,875

This showed a considerable increase on the first six months, but on the whole twelve months a decrease in tallow and flax, but increase of the import hemp and hides. The former being in twelve months ending 1852, 1,081,220 cwts.; 1854, 1,227,964 cwts.: of the latter, 1852, 550,365 cwts.; 1854, 601,199 cwts.: ditto, dressed, 1852, 2,090,077 lbs.; 1854, 4,180,315 lbs. Then, with respect to corn, it would be seen there was an increase in the year ending January, 1854, over 1853, in wheat alone, of about 1,900,000 quarters. In 1855, the quantity was 3,431,227 quarters, which was less than in the year 1854, but more by 400,000 quarters than 1853. A good deal had been said about the quantity which had been shipped from Odessa. All must recollect Admiral Dundas's despatch apologising for having attacked Odessa, and speaking in a tone of congratulation of having spared the buildings and the stores of corn and wine, stores which had afterwards served to feed the Russian troops in Odessa—an anti-national proceeding. From returns that had been rendered it appeared that the Russian produce taken by this country amounted to 9,600,000£., being 38 per cent of the total exports of that country; that France took 8 per cent and Turkey 5 per cent;—so that we and our Allies took one-half of the whole Russian exports. This, he thought, was a sufficient argument for inducing our Government to resort to every means in their power for crippling the commercial traffic of Russia. He believed that there would be no objection to produce the returns relating to the exports from neutral ports; but, as he was informed that it would be impossible to furnish correct information with regard to the quantities of Russian produce imported into this country, he should not press that part of his Motion.

EARL GRANVILLE said, there would be no difficulty in acceding to the first part of the return moved for, and, with regard to the second part, if the noble Lord would communicate with the President of the Board of Trade, it could be put into a different form, which would furnish all the information required. With regard to the export of lead from this country to Russia, he had to state that at the commencement of last year, when it seemed probable that a war would break out, a Royal proclamation was issued prohibiting the exportation from this country of arms, ammunition, naval and military stores, and machinery; at the same time the Treasury were empowered to grant licences for the export of those articles under certain circumstances. When war was declared, the subject was referred to a Committee of the Privy Council, by whom it was resolved to limit the prohibition to three classes of articles—namely arms, gunpowder (including brimstone and saltpetre), and marine boilers, engines, or the component parts thereof. East of Malta or north of London was at the same time fixed as the geographical limitation. In the month of October, in consequence of information received, additional restrictions were imposed, and the export of blue lias and cement was prohibited; and in the month of November the exportation of lead was also forbidden. It was with very great doubt that this last article was included in the prohibition, because, after all, it was probably of no great importance, for it was not likely that it could reach the Emperor of Russia from this country in quantities large enough to be of any particular service to him—and, indeed, it appeared that he had drawn the greater part of the lead which he had required from Spain, and that it passed through Prussia and other neutral States. Very early in the war application was made to the Court of Prussia to prohibit the transmission of articles contraband of war through that country to Russia, and an assurance was given that the Prussian Government would do their best to comply with the request—an assurance which he was afraid had not been very perfectly complied with. Lord John Russell, however, had lately informed Her Majesty's Government that the Prussian Government had renewed their assurance, on the subject of trade in the contraband of war passing through their dominions, and had expressed an intention of rendering more effectual the means in her power of preventing such traffic. With regard to the larger question as to the intentions of the Government in reference to the trade of neutrals, all he had to state was that Her Majesty's Government had no intention of making any change in the Orders in Council passed last year. He believed that if there were any two points on which the Emperor of Russia reckoned for assistance in the war more than others, they were that there could be no cordial maritime co-operation between England and France, and also, that by insisting strictly on our former belligerent tactics we should very soon be involved in quarrels with the chief maritime neutral States of the world; and indeed, had we not made some very considerable concessions in our old interpretation of the rights of belligerents, there was very little doubt that the Emperor's expectations would have been realised on both points. He looked upon the Orders in Council of last year as a wise measure, both in point of policy and principle. Not a single observation against the course Her Majesty's Government had taken had been made in their Lordships' House; and only one in another place, where the hon. and learned Gentleman who made it was totally unsupported, and he hoped that no attempt would be made to revert to our ancient practice. In order to keep Russian produce altogether out of this country, it would be necessary to go much further back than our tactics of the last war, for even then the very simple process of selling it to a neutral would have put it entirely out of the reach of our cruisers either in neutral or in our own vessels. In fact, to meet the noble Lord's views we must revert to the Berlin and Milan decrees, which not even Napoleon's absolute power could carry completely into effect. He had not been able exactly to follow the noble Lord's statistics with regard to the alleged increase in the importation of Russian produce, but he could safely say that so far from the noble Lord's conclusions being correct, the Board of Trade returns for the last year showed that there had been a considerable decrease in the average amount of the importation of articles of Russian produce: in fact there had been a very marked decrease in every one of the articles. The noble Lord had mentioned hides as an article in the importation of which there had been a considerable increase; but he was informed that, in fact, the importation of hides from Russia and Prussia had completely ceased. He was not aware of any chief article of Russian produce so conveyed the import of which had not declined 40 per cent, and with respect to some articles the import had decreased 60 per cent. No doubt, in the Black Sea, the Baltic, and the White Sea the blockade, from various causes, had not been so effectually and continually carried out as it might be. For this there were obvious reasons in the Baltic and the White Sea, the Russian goods having been previously almost entirely paid for by merchants in this country or in France. With respect to the blockade in the Black Sea, it was contrary to the wish of the Government that the blockade should not be effectual ; but it turned out to be impossible to establish such a blockade, and that was the reason why the imports from Russia to this country had been so great. However, the blockades, such as they were, had certainly effected serious damage to Russian commerce. It had been the opinion of an eminent French statesman, in reference to the Russian cotton goods exhibited in this country at the Great Exhibition, that they were so excellent that they threatened very seriously the preponderance which this country had obtained in respect to the manufacture of that article. He was not convinced as to the truth of that opinion ; but he might add that the result of the blockade had been that the cotton manufacture in Russia had been stopped from the difficulty of getting fuel, owing to the blockade. If he wanted another proof of the injury inflicted on the foreign trade of Russia by the blockades, he would refer to an article recently published in the Révue des Deux Mondes, in which a French ex-Minister of Finance, Léon Faucher, described the disastrous effects upon the finances of Russia which the war must produce, and the dangerous expedients to which the Russian Government had already been forced, in order to meet the difficulties likely to be produced upon Russian credit in other parts of the world. This article was so severe that it had brought forth a semi-official reply in the St. Petersburg Gazette, in which, while some of the positions of the French writer were combated, an admission was made that it was incontestable that the Russian foreign trade was in a state of suffering. If the proposition to prohibit the introduction into this country of Russian produce were adopted in preference to a blockade, it would only have the effect of inflicting the maximum of injury on England and the minimum on the Russian Empire, because, while England refused the goods, the rest of the world would receive them ; the real effect of a blockade was, that though we deprived ourselves of Russian produce, we at the same time prevented the rest of the world from obtaining it, and destroyed almost the whole of the Russian foreign trade.

In answer to some further observations made by Lord BERNERS.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that certainly the importation of Russian articles was increased last year ; but the amount of those articles coming from Russia and Prussia was very much decreased.

Lord COLCHESTER did not clearly understand whether or not the export of lead was now prohibited. The noble Earl said it was, but he thought the noble Earl had not explained why, when the export of nitre was prohibited by the Orders in Council, the export of the material for making balls was not prohibited at the same time. He thought that if the present policy of England with regard to neutrals were carried out under all circumstances it would not be found to answer. In countries like France, Spain, or the United States of America, where there was a vast extent of seaboard, there could be no effectual blockade if trade were allowed in neutral vessels.

EARL GRANVILLE made some observations, which were totally inaudible in the gallery.

In reply, LORD BERNERS again pressed the Ministers as to the authority given for the exports of the lead before alluded to, and was informed by Lord Granville that lead was not then contraband of war, the articles restricted only being sulphur, brimstone, and gunpowder, as well as boilers.

The EARL OF HARDWICKE said, it was of great importance that the war should be conducted with the utmost vigour ; yet it appeared to him that at the commencement the action of our naval force had been completely neutralised. It always appeared inexplicable to him how it was that the fleet of England in the Black Sea was conducted as it had been since the commencement of the war ; and when the vote of thanks was given to Admiral Dundas he, feeling this matter deeply, took the liberty of observing sarcastically that after that we should hear no more of the ports in the Black Sea not being blockaded. He did not know whether or not the fault lay with the Admiral, but there was a mystery with respect to the ports in the Black Sea. His opinion was, that it was mainly owing to the severe contests in the Crimea and the investment of Sebastopol that the whole of the ports in the Black Sea were not blockaded. He was convinced that if the whole of the force had been applied in a proper manner, and if the battles in the Crimea had not prevented a fit disposition of the fleet for the purpose of blockade, their Lordships never would have heard the story attempted to be palmed off on the country last year as to the impossibility of the ships being kept in the Black Sea during winter. In answer to that statement, he remembered saying that he would undertake to keep any sea in all weathers and in all seasons, with the ships and sailors of England. He would not say any more on the present occasion, because there was a future notice on the paper with respect to the blockade; but he must add that, of the various errors committed by the Government in reference to the conduct of the present war, none more affected the interests of this country, and strengthened the power of the enemy, than the manner in which the blockade had been conducted.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL thought it extremely probable that the noble Earl was mistaken in a statement he had made. He (the Duke of Argyll) was not aware of any attempt to palm off on the country the story that the fleets of England could not keep in the Black Sea during the winter.

Motion amended as follows—

"Return of Lead and other Articles contraband of War exported from the United Kingdom to Foreign Countries since the Declaration of War; specifying to what Countries the same have been exported." And also—

"Return of the Quantities of Tallow, Hemp, Linseed, Flax, Tar, and Bristles, imported into the United Kingdom in Foreign Vessels during the Year 1854; specifying from what Countries the same were imported."

ROMAN CATHOLIC PROCESSIONS.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER rose to move for Copies of any Case and Questions proposed by Her Majesty's Government to the Irish Law Officers of the Crown in the Year 1852, relative to the Construction of the Statute 10th of George IV. chap. 7, section 26; with the Answers to the same by the said Irish Law Officers; Also, Copy of any Case and Questions proposed by Her Majesty's Government to the Irish Law Officers in the last and present Years on the Construction of the said Section of the said Statute; with the Answers thereto given by the said Irish Law Officers; And also, Copy of a Proclamation by Her Majesty, bearing Date the 15th of June, 1852, warning Roman Catholic Ecclesiastics of the Unlawfulness of wearing their Ecclesiastical Habiliments, saving in the usual Places of Religious Worship or in private Houses. The right rev. Prelate said, their Lordships would see that in the notice which he had given he had made certain prepositions for returns which it was not unusual to move for in either House of Parliament—he meant returns of questions which had been put to the law officers of the Crown, and the answers which had been given to those questions. He should certainly not have departed from the usual practice if it had not appeared to him that there were extraordinary anomalies in this case that required to be explained, and which he could not conceive capable of explanation without direct reference to the opinions given by the law officers of the Crown. Before proceeding to the matter in hand, however, it might be wise to state, though not at any tedious length, the history of this matter as already disclosed in the conversations that had taken place in that House. Last year he had collected from the statement of the noble Earl opposite, who was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in 1852 (the Earl of Eglinton) that at the time he filled that office he received accounts from the south-west of Ireland to the effect that the Roman Catholic Bishop in one portion of the county of Galway had given notice to his clergy to attend in their robes, in their sacerdotal habiliments, for the purpose of joining in a procession. On this the noble Earl, as he (the Bishop of Exeter) understood him, took the opinion of the law officer of the Crown who was immediately his adviser, who told him that such procession was illegal. But the noble Earl was not satisfied with that. He also sought the opinion of the Attorney General and Solicitor General of Ireland, and from them received the similar assurances that there could be no doubt that such a procession was of an illegal character. On that the noble Earl directed a letter to be written to the Roman Catholic Bishop, pointing out the illegality of the measure; stating at the same time that he believed the notice was given without his having adverted to that illegality, that he was willing to regard the matter in that view, and that he trusted no procession would take place. As he understood the noble Earl, the Bishop returned a reply intimating that he had no intention of pursuing that illegal course. This took place in Ireland in 1852. In the same year, in England, there seemed to be grounds for inducing Her Majesty's Government of that day to issue a proclamation, declaring the danger incurred by those individuals who offended against the particular clause of the statute of 1829 which prohibited ecclesiastics to appear in their sacerdotal habiliments, except in their usual places of worship or in private houses. That proclamation pointed out that it was of great importance to the peace of the country that the law should be strictly observed; and in the most conciliatory, but at the same time in the most peremptory terms, announced the determination of the Government. After reciting the statute and the violation of it, the proclamation proceeded—

"We have therefore thought it our bounden duty, by, and with the advice of our Privy Council, to issue this our Royal Proclamation, solemnly warning all those whom it may concern, that, whilst we are resolved to protect our Roman Catholic subjects in the undisturbed enjoyment of their legal rights and religious freedom, we are determined to prevent and repress the commission of all such offences as aforesaid, whereby the offenders may draw upon themselves the punishments attending the violation of the laws, and the peace and security of our dominions may be endangered."

That proclamation was issued in June, 1852. Of the wisdom of the course then taken there could not be two opinions; and of the necessity for it an unhappy example soon after occurred: he meant those riots at Stockport which created such extreme disgust. It must not be supposed that he charged the Roman Catholic clergymen of that town with provoking the riots by appearing in their robes of office in public to the disturbance of the peace. That was not so. He believed the riots at Stockport proceeded from religious animosities on both sides, and that the fault was more to be ascribed to the Protestants than to the Roman Catholics. But these riots afforded an illustration of the necessity of enforcing the law. At Stockport that law had been proclaimed; and though the Roman Catholic clergy of the town abstained from appearing in procession in their robes, yet such was the soreness of Protestant feeling in relation to these processions that an unhappy outbreak occurred which terminated in loss of life, to the shame of this Christian country. Now, he would say that if an outbreak like that of Stockport take place without the provocation of a direct violation of law, what might we expect would be the consequence if, unfortunately, the Roman Catholic clergy should be taught to feel that they were guilty of no offence if they did appear in the streets in the habiliments of their order in such processions, or even if they daily went about their duties publicly in their dress? In 1854, after this proclamation of 1852 had been found effectual, and been faithfully observed by the Roman Catholic clergy in this country, it happened that a change took place in Her Majesty's councils. Then it appeared that a Roman Catholic Bishop in the south of Ireland—he meant the Irish Archbishop at Tuam (he used the term "at Tuam" advisedly, as he regarded the title "of Tuam" to be illegal)—put forth a manifesto, in which he called on his suffragans and clergy to meet him in their robes of office, in the habiliments of their order, to hold a provincial synod at Tuam. His bishops obeyed this command. The proclamation of John of Tuam was held to be more powerful than Her Majesty's proclamation of 1852. The question, therefore, came to be, whether this Archbishop at Tuam, or Her Majesty's proclamation, was to be held as announcing the law of the land? This took place in the autumn of last year; and since the meeting of the present Session of Parliament a noble Baron (Lord Berners) took occasion to bring the case to the knowledge of Her Majesty's Government, and to ask if any steps were intended to be taken with regard to it. In consequence of that, it appeared that questions were put to the Irish law officers, and that to these questions answers were returned. To these answers he would now take occasion to refer. The noble President of the Council had made a statement on this subject on Tuesday, the 27th of February, and he (the Bishop of Exeter) would not trust to his own recollection, but would quote the noble Earl's words from what were called in that House "the usual sources of information."

EARL GRANVILLE said, "the usual sources of information" had not represented with perfect accuracy the observations he had made on the occasion to which the right rev. Prelate referred.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER must take the liberty of saying that his own recollection agreed with the statements contained in "the usual sources of information."

EARL GRANVILLE was understood to say that what he had stated was, that the law officers of the Crown in Ireland not being agreed upon the subject, the question had subsequently been referred to the English law officers of the Crown, and that, in their opinion, the law did not apply to the secular or working clergy, although it did apply to the regular clergy.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER had no doubt that the noble Earl's statement of what he had said on the occasion in question was correct; but he (the Bishop of Exeter) had no recollection of any statement on the part of the noble Earl that the Irish law officers of the Crown differed in opinion on the subject, and his own recollection was fully borne out by the newspaper reports. He thought, after the issue of the proclamation of 1852, which had not been recalled, that it would have been but fair to the country if the present Government, if they had formed an opinion as to the state of the law different from that entertained only two years ago by all the then law officers of the Crown, and after they had been formally warned that if they continued to do certain acts they would render themselves liable to any penalties as well as violate the peace and security of the country, had sent forth a new Proclamation, declaring their intention of acting upon the novel and somewhat extraordinary opinion expressed by their law officers. If, as the noble Earl the President of the Council now stated, there had been any difference of opinion on this subject among the law officers of the Crown in Ireland, he thought it was very important that they should ascertain on what ground those differences had arisen. The Act 10 Geo. IV. c. 7, commonly called the Roman Catholic Relief Act, left the recovery of penalties for the commission of such offences in the hands of the Attorney General for Ireland. He considered that if the Attorney General for Ireland was of opinion that the Acts to which he (the Bishop of Exeter) had referred were legal, it would have been quite fair to say to that functionary, "We cannot expect you to prosecute in a case where you believe that the law does not entitle you to do so." He thought that the House should be placed in possession of the opinion of the first law officer of the Crown in Ireland—the Attorney General—and that if other legal officers had differed from him they should know what were the grounds upon which it was considered that the appearance of Roman Catholic ecclesiastics in the habits of their orders, in the streets of Tuam, was not a violation of the law. On Friday last, the 2nd of March, the noble Earl (Earl Granville) was reported to have said—and here he (the Bishop of Exeter) quoted from the ordinary sources of information, whose representation was borne out by his own recollection—"Not that there was any doubt on the subject, but that an opinion had been given to the effect that the prohibitions of the Act applied not to the secular, but to the regular clergy." It was now intimated, however, that there had been a doubt; and he thought the best mode of clearing up that doubt would be by the production of the opinions of the law officers of the Crown. But the noble Earl did not stop here, for he afterwards said—"It did not seem to him that the words prohibiting ecclesiastics from appearing in the habitments of their order could apply to ecclesiastics who belonged to no order." That brought him to another point of the case. It appeared that in 1852 the law officers of the Crown were clearly of opinion that offences against the law had been committed; but it seemed that in 1854 the law officers of Ireland did not agree in their opinion on the point, and the course was taken—with which he did not mean to find fault—of appealing to the law officers of England. They had had the advantage of hearing, on this subject, the opinion of the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack—an opinion to which he had listened with great respect and deference—but he must frankly say that his confidence in that noble and learned Lord had only increased the surprise with which he had heard the opinions he had expressed. The Lord Chancellor was represented to have said—and his (the Bishop of Exeter's) recollection bore out the statement—that "There appeared to be good reason for believing that there was no prohibition against a Roman Catholic priest wearing his ecclesiastical habitments in going through the streets. He took it that the habitments of a priest were not the same as the habitments of any one of the orders referred to; and as this was a highly penal statute, the rule of the law was that it be construed very strictly."

It was true, as the noble and learned Lord said, that, this being a penal statute, the rule of law was that it be construed very strictly; but he (the Bishop of Exeter) held that the interpretation to be put upon the words "construed very strictly" was, that the terms of the statute should be construed strictly according to the plain, literal, and grammatical meaning of the words. He found that, in the case of "the Attorney General v. Lockwood," reported in 9, Meesom and Welsby, page 398, Baron Alderson expressed his opinion on the construction of statutes in these words—

"The rule of law, I take it, upon the construction of all statutes, and therefore applicable to this, is, whether they be penal or remedial, to construe them according to the plain, literal, and grammatical meaning of the words in which they are expressed, unless that construction leads to a plain and clear contradiction of the apparent purpose of the Act, or to some palpable and evident absurdity."

The 26th section of the Act was this—

"And be it further enacted that if any Roman Catholic ecclesiastic, or any member of any of the orders, communities, or societies hereinafter mentioned, shall, after the commencement of this Act, exercise any of the rites or ceremonies of the Roman Catholic religion, or wear the habits of his order, save within the usual places of worship of the Roman Catholic religion, or in private houses, such ecclesiastic or other person shall, being thereof convicted by due course of law, forfeit for every such offence the sum of 50*l.*"

The 28th section related to the particular orders. He now came to the plain, literal, and grammatical meaning of the words used in the Act. This was no longer a legal question, but a question of grammar. He admitted that in one sense it was a question of law, but it was a question of law that the highest legal authorities acknowledged was only to be construed according to the plain, literal, grammatical sense of the words employed; and he therefore contended that every man who knew what the English language was had a right to put his construction upon the matter. The words of the clause were these—so that in this instance there were two classes of persons mentioned—any individual belonging to either of which might incur the penalties of the law—first, "any Roman Catholic ecclesiastic," and next, "any member of any of the orders, communities, or societies." If any one of these parties were guilty of any one of the matters held to be an offence, he came within the meaning of the Act, which provided that a penalty of 50*l.* should be inflicted upon any person exercising the rites or ceremonies of the Roman Catholic religion, or wearing the habits of his order, save within the usual places of worship of the Roman Catholic religion, or in private houses. There were thus, also, two distinct offences, and it was contended that they were to be taken separately, namely, that the offence of exercising any of the rites or ceremonies of the Roman Catholic religion applied only to the Roman Catholic ecclesiastic who had no habits of an order, and that the words "wearing the habits of his order, save within the usual places of worship," applied only to the member of an order. Now, he contended that this construction was a violation of the plain grammatical sense of the words contained in the Act, which asserted that, if either one of two parties did either one of two things, be it what it might, he was guilty of an offence under the Act, and was liable to forfeit a penalty of 50*l.* upon conviction. He must be permitted to declare that, if the English language was to be taken as it was usually construed, it was in direct defiance of the construction now attempted to be placed upon the words of the statute. The plain literal construction of the clause would certainly not relieve the Roman Catholic ecclesiastic from the prohibition and penalties of the statute if he wore the habits of his order in the streets, or in any other place, except the usual places of public worship or private houses. For the sake of the peace of the country, he hoped that the construction which he placed upon the words of the Act would be held to be the plain, literal, and grammatical meaning of the clause. If it were not so, he could hardly say what consequences might ensue. In every town in England and Ireland in which there was a numerous body of Roman Catholics they would find their Roman Catholic fellow-subjects disposed to vaunt their strength and defy the Government, particularly if they were to be told that the Government could inflict no punishment upon them. Throughout the towns of Ireland, throughout the largest cities of this country—London, Manchester, and Liverpool—and, above all, in Glasgow—there would be processions of Roman Catholics, headed by Roman Catholic priests in the habiliments of their order; and could their Lordships look upon such a state of affairs without dismay, without believing that the same spirit which had recently manifested itself at Stockport would be greatly increased, and that the indignation

of the Protestants of other places would be excited to the utmost when they saw such proceedings taking place in direct defiance of the Proclamation of the Queen, and, therefore, unless Her Majesty's Proclamation should have been withdrawn, in defiance of what they would believe to be the law of the land? It was impossible to doubt, when they saw the Protestants of Glasgow, of London, or of Liverpool, insulted by processions headed by Roman Catholic bishops and priests, in the habiliments of their order, that the worst scenes of violence would take place. He did not think any of their Lordships would be able to say how long such a course could be pursued without entailing the most sanguinary, as well as the most violent scenes. And upon whose head would be the guilt of the blood so shed? In his opinion the guilt of that blood would attach, in the first place, to any Government that should tell the Roman Catholics they were not offending any law by engaging in exhibitions so insulting to the feelings of Protestants that they would be sure to bring down the vengeance of the Protestants upon their heads; and, in the next place, to those law officers, and in particular to the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack, who should have the discredit of misleading the Government by means of an erroneous opinion. If the Government did that without being absolutely certain that the law of the land was such as had been represented to them by the Attorney General and Solicitor General, any blood which might be shed in consequence would rest upon the heads of the Government. He was not desirous of indelicately making a comparison between the noble and learned Lord who now sat upon the woolsack and any other noble and learned Lord who had sat there in former years; but he could not avoid asking other noble and learned Lords who had filled the office of Lord High Chancellor whether they agreed in the construction which had been placed upon this clause of the Act? He appealed more especially to his noble and learned Friend opposite (Lord Lyndhurst), who sat upon the woolsack as Lord Chancellor when the statute was framed. They all knew that the statute was framed in order to preserve the religious freedom of the Roman Catholics, and at the same time to assert the legal rights of the Crown; and he ventured to ask his noble and learned Friend to read the clause, and favour their Lordships with his opinion upon it. It was very remarkable that soon after the Royal Proclamation was issued, in 1852, the present Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Keogh, said, in a speech in the House of Commons—

"I have seen in this morning's papers a Royal Proclamation which is addressed to the clauses in the Roman Catholic Relief Act, which were introduced into that Act from some very old Acts. Those clauses were directed against the habit of Roman Catholic ecclesiastics wearing the dress of their order in public. These clauses have been dormant ever since the passing of the Roman Catholic Relief Bill."

Now, the words of one of these clauses—that taken from the 8th clause of the 21st and 22nd of George III. (Irish)—were—

"Provided always, that no benefit of this Act shall extend to any Popish ecclesiastic who shall officiate in any church or chapel with a steeple or bell, or at any funeral in any church or churchyard, or who shall exercise any of the rites or ceremonies of the Popish religion, or wear the habits of their order, save within their usual places of worship," &c.

He believed he was correct in saying that was the first statute passed for the relief of Roman Catholics in Ireland. It so happened that in England a similar statute for the relief of the Roman Catholics was passed in the 31st year of the reign of George III., and that Act was a direct transcript of the 21st and 22nd of George III. (Irish) so far as regarded this question. There was in neither of those statutes a single syllable about the members of monastic orders being the only persons who could violate the law, and it must be remembered those Acts were prepared, after long and close consideration, in a spirit of liberality towards the Roman Catholics, but, at the same time, with a firm resolution to assert the rights of the Protestant Church and Government. The Legislature intrusted to one of the law officers in Ireland the duty of enforcing the law, and it was absolutely necessary, if the law was to be regarded as worth anything, that they should know clearly what were the authorities on which they were to rely. Therefore it was that he had introduced the first two subjects of his Motion. If these reasons were not such as to overcome the serious evil of establishing a precedent for making known to the world the grounds of an opinion given by the law officers of the Crown, he would not press for these papers; but he should feel it his duty, at all events, to move for a copy of the Proclamation, unless he should be given to understand Her Majesty's Government would rather he did not. [Earl GRANVILLE: It is contrary to precedent.] Although contrary to precedent, unless it was said to be hurtful to Her Majesty's Government or contrary to public policy, such was his opinion that he must press for it. He therefore would move that a humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to order to be laid before this House copies of the papers of which he had given notice.

LORD LYNDHURST: I stand, my Lords, in a situation of some difficulty after the appeal which has been made to me by the right rev. Prelate. I entertain the greatest respect for the law officers of the Crown, for their learning and talents, and certainly I shall not, by any voluntary act of my own, put myself in opposition to them nor controvert their opinion, unless called upon to do so in consequence of some legal proceeding. I feel, also, another difficulty. It is possible the construction of this Act may come judicially before your Lordships, and I think a law Lord ought to be careful not to prejudge a question, when he may hereafter have to pronounce an opinion upon it sitting here as in a court of law. The course which I shall pursue in consequence of the appeal of my right rev. Friend is this: I will state the case shortly and plainly to your Lordships, and leave your Lordships to draw your own conclusions. First, with respect to the authorities to which my right rev. Friend has referred, I was not here when this question was discussed on a former night; but I understand it was said that the law officers of the Crown had given a unanimous opinion adverse to the opinion stated by my right rev. Friend. That statement I know on the highest authority to be incorrect. The law officers have not given a unanimous opinion on this subject. They were divided in their opinions. I state this on the very best authority. How the parts were cast I am not enabled to say, and therefore I cannot apply the ordinary rule of pondere non numero. The law officers of the Crown having differed, it is natural to inquire what opinion the law officers of the Crown, on a former occasion, expressed on this question. In the year 1852 the opinion of the Irish law officers was taken on the construction of the statute, and I understand Mr. Napier and Mr. Whiteside, Gentlemen of great learning, great intelligence, and great acquirements, gave an opinion entirely opposite to what has been stated to be the opinion of the present law officers of the Crown. In addition to this, my noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) issued a proclamation directed against such proceedings as we are now considering. That proclamation would not have been issued without taking the opinion of the English law officers on the subject; nor would it have been issued if there had been the slightest difference of opinion between them. We have, therefore, the opinion of the Irish law officers of the Crown and the English law officers in the year 1852 opposed to the divided opinion of the law officers of the Crown in the year 1855. I cannot interpose in such a conflict—Non meum est tantas compondere lites. I dare not come "within the wind of such commotion." I understand that my noble and learned Friend on the woolsack on a former evening stated that this, being a penal statute, must be strictly construed. That maxim of law no man will attempt to controvert. But there is another maxim, equally cogent, that every statute is to be construed according to its grammatical construction, unless there be some very strong reason to the contrary. The right rev. Prelate quoted on this subject the opinion of a Judge of great eminence—Mr. Baron Alderson—that an Act of Parliament, whether of a beneficial or penal character, must be construed according to its grammatical construction, unless that construction would lead to some inconsistency, or be directly and obviously at variance with the object to which the statute is directed. That is an authority above all exception. Let us consider, then, what is the grammatical construction of this clause. The words of the clause are these: "If any ecclesiastical person professing the Catholic religion, or any member of a religious order"—shall do what?—"shall exercise any rite or ceremony of the Roman Catholic religion, or wear the habits of his order, except in certain places, he shall be subject to a penalty." What is the grammatical construction of this clause? We must consider the operation of the word "or," and I submit the construction is this: If any ecclesiastic of the Roman Catholic religion shall perform any rite or ceremony of that religion, or wear the habits of his order, except in certain places, he shall be subject to a penalty; or if any member of a religious order shall perform any rite or ceremony of the Roman Catholic religion, or wear the habits of his order, except in certain places, he shall also be subject to a penalty. That is the grammatical construction of the clause; and where, then, is the difficulty? Does not every man know that the ecclesiastics both of this country and of the Romish religion are divided into certain orders, distinguished from each other by their peculiar habits? Are these not words sufficient to satisfy the grammatical construction I have pointed out? If they are, there can be no inconsistency in enforcing it. No proposition can be more simple. Why, my Lords, different orders have been established in the Church from the time of the Apostles. If you look into the Book of Common Prayer you will find that in the preface to the ordination service it is expressly stated that from the time of the Apostles different orders have existed in the Church. These orders, as mentioned in the document to which I refer, are the orders of deacons, of priests, and of bishops, all of them distinguished by different habitments. If you look at the service for the ordination of deacons, you will find it expressly stated in one of the documents read on those occasions that these orders were instituted by the Apostles, in consequence of Divine inspiration; and it is stated, with respect to the order of deacons, that so distinguished an individual as the martyr, St. Stephen, belonged to that order. We therefore find that these orders existed from the earliest period—from the time of the Apostles—and that they were established by Divine inspiration. There is a similar document in the service for the ordination of priests, and the same thing is repeated in the service for the consecration of bishops. These orders are mentioned over and over again in the canons, and they have been sanctioned and confirmed by Act of Parliament. The statute of Elizabeth expressly states that no person shall belong to the order of deacons or priests unless he shall subscribe to the Articles of the Church of England. What reason is there, then, for not adhering to the grammatical construction of the clause, no one being able to doubt for a moment what that construction is? The only ground for overruling the grammatical construction of a clause is, that it contains something inconsistent with, that it leads to some conclusion different from, the scope and object of the Act. Passing, then, from this point, I come to the other statute adverted to by my right rev. Friend—the Irish Act. It is obvious that the English Act was taken from it. The word "orders" in that Act can only mean ecclesiastical orders, for there is no mention in that Act of religious or monastic orders. The Acts are in pari materia, and must be construed in the same way. This appears conclusive. Another rule for the construction of statutes is to consider the evil they are intended to obviate—the object against which they are directed—for an Act must be passed in order to cure some evil and to give some remedy. What is the case in this instance? I have some recollection of the Act, and I had something to do with preparing it. It was thought to be important when it was introduced, in consequence of the excitement—I may say, the irritation—which prevailed in Ireland, to prevent, as far as possible, the occurrence of any circumstance which would increase that irritation. The object, therefore, of the Act was to prevent all public displays which might have that effect. How imperfectly that object would be attained if you were to confine its application to the mere appearance of a few monks walking about the streets in the vestments of the order—how little feeling their appearance would create! whereas the ceremony which gave rise to this question was one of the most exciting and irritating that can possibly be conceived. It is described as a most gorgeous ceremony, the bishops being present in their pontifical habits of the most splendid kind, with their mitres and crosiers, and various other accompaniments; and yet you say that such a case does not come within the Act, and that it is confined solely to the monks. Is this the mode in which the Act ought to be construed? Consider what is the evil intended to be remedied, and what is the remedy provided? Having made this statement, I wish to clear myself from any impression which may have been created as to the opinion I may be supposed to entertain with regard to the policy of enforcing the Act. I say nothing upon that subject; an Act of Parliament may have been very prudent at the time when it was passed for the purpose of correcting a certain evil, and it may be extremely imprudent to act upon it after a long interval during which it may never have been enforced. I hope your Lordships will not consider, from my having stated the case in this way, that I have given an opinion as to the propriety of enforcing the Act. I do not know enough of the state of Ireland to form a sound opinion on the subject, and I therefore say nothing one way or the other respecting it. I am not called upon to give any such opinion, and I therefore decline to do so.

EARL GRANVILLE : My Lords, I do not rise to answer my noble and learned Friend, for I am entirely wanting in the qualifications necessary for a contest with him in a legal argument ; and, although he commenced and ended his remarks with an assurance that he did not intend to pronounce any legal opinion, I am so utterly destitute of the knowledge of what constitutes such an opinion, that it appears to me that my noble and learned Friend did in the most clear and expressive manner give the strongest possible opinion upon the construction of the law. I regret that a question of recollection should ever arise between two Members of this House, but I certainly feel perfectly confident that the explanation I have given of what I stated upon a previous occasion is correct. I am aware that I am not always able clearly to express what I mean ; but, being so confident as to what I meant on the occasion, I believe that I did then say what I intended. I certainly remarked to a friend soon afterwards that I saw I was represented in the papers to have given an opinion of the Irish law officers, when the opinion I had really given was that of the English law officers ; upon which my friend observed—I am not in the least surprised at it, because I was below the bar at the time, and I could not understand a single word that you said. I think the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) has, on a previous occasion, remarked that it is unusual to give an opinion of the law officers of the Crown which is of a confidential nature, and I must therefore appeal to the right rev. Prelate to withdraw his Motion, except as regards the Proclamation, to the production of which, as it has been already published in the Gazette, there can be no objection. There is no doubt that the Irish law officers of the Crown were divided in their opinion upon the point of whether the prohibition to appear in ecclesiastical habiliments applied both to the regular and to the secular clergy. The question was referred to the English law officers, who gave their opinion that a distinction did exist between them, and that the words of the statute only referred to the regular orders. The Irish law officers were divided in their opinion, but not the English. I believe that the noble Earl opposite, before issuing the proclamation which has been referred to, consulted the law officers in this country, who gave an opinion contrary in some respects to that which has now been given ; but, I believe, they also said, that this being a penal statute it must be strictly construed, and that the opposite view to that which they had themselves taken might be argued ; and they also added another doubt to which he need not refer. I cannot sit down without protesting against the allegation that any guilt is incurred by a Government in declining, upon any isolated occasion, to act upon the opinion which the law officers of the Crown may have pronounced.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR : My Lords, I felt the great force of the observation with which my noble and learned Friend commenced his address, as to the extreme difficulty there was in any of your Lordships—and more particularly those who were called law Lords—giving a construction of the penal clauses of an Act which may be hereafter brought judicially before them for their decision. I trust, in the few observations I am about to make, I shall follow the precept rather than the example of my noble and learned Friend ; for commencing as he did in saying that he would not commit himself by expressing any opinion upon the subject, I must appeal to all your Lordships whether it be possible for any defendant who may hereafter be convicted on the ground of having committed an act prohibited by this law, to appeal to your Lordships, and hope to receive an impartial judgment from my noble and learned Friend ? It is impossible ; for although he said he would not give an opinion, yet he has given an opinion, in the most powerful, most able, and most artistical manner, in what he called simply stating the facts, and leaving your Lordships to draw the inference. Well, I have said that I would follow the precept and not the example of my noble and learned Friend. In reference to that subject, let me call the attention of your Lordships to what has occurred. A question was put the other night by the right rev. Prelate as to the processions which had taken place in Ireland coming within the provisions of the law. I was then quite unaware that any such question would be put to me. I had not, at that time, had an opportunity of looking at the Act of Parliament ; but I then remarked that, according to the wording of the clause, there were grounds for arguing that Roman Catholic ecclesiastics, wearing their clerical habits in the streets, were not within the purview of the Act of Parliament. I did not mean to say that if the question came judicially before your Lordships that would be my opinion. I merely meant to say that there were good grounds for urging such an argument. The right rev. Prelate has said, that although that might be the legal construction of the Act, still we are bound to give it a plain grammatical construction. My noble and learned Friend, I think, in his construction of it, has perhaps misunderstood the clause. He has told us what the word "orders" means; but the question is not what "orders" in general means, but what is the meaning of the word in this particular clause of the Act. I am extremely averse to give my construction of the word, because I may hereafter be called upon in my judicial capacity to put a construction upon it. But I wish to point out that the word does not mean, or does not necessarily mean, the orders of priests and deacons; but, simply, monastic orders. What are the words of the Act?—

Now, my noble and learned Friend says that the words, "wear the habits of his order" apply equally to both nominative cases, which are separated by the disjunctive conjunction "or"—that is to say, to the words "any Roman Catholic ecclesiastic," as well as to the words "any member of any of the orders, communities, or societies therein mentioned;" but is that quite clear? Can a member of the monastic orders exercise any ceremony of the Church of Rome? Can they do it? That is a question of fact. If they cannot, then the first nominative case can only apply to the first verb, namely, "exercise," and the second nominative case will then naturally only apply to the other verb, "wear." There may, therefore, be ground for contending that the clause must be construed distributively, and that it refers to priests exercising the rites of their Church and to monks wearing the habits of their orders.

But I am very much afraid of being betrayed into giving an opinion upon the construction of an Act which I may have to construe in a different way on another occasion. All I said on the subject the other day was, that I thought that that may probably be the construction of the clause. Supposing it should be contended that a monk is an ecclesiastic, and that he may be punished, if not as a monk, yet as an ecclesiastic, is that the construction to be put upon the words of the Act? Supposing, instead of the penalty being a pecuniary one, it were enacted that those guilty of the offence should be punished with death, is it to be said that the clause should be construed so strictly that a priest not a member of any order wearing his habits of a priest not within the usual places of worship of the Roman Catholic religion, should be punished with death? It is a mode of construction which might be argued at your Lordships' bar, but do your Lordships think it could be done with success? But, whether it could or not, I wish to keep my mind perfectly unaffected by the arguments that may be urged upon it.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said that he would not shrink from giving an opinion on this question, because when a member of the Administration of the Earl of Derby he had found himself in the position of being compelled to come to a positive conclusion with respect to what was the correct construction of this statute, and to stake his reputation as a lawyer and a statesman upon the soundness of his interpretation. Nay, more. As Lord Chancellor, he had been obliged to give effect to his opinion by issuing the Proclamation which informed the people of England and Ireland that a thing which was said to have been lawful was in fact unlawful, and that the penalty under the Act of Parliament would undoubtedly be enforced. But if the opinion which had been given the other way was right, he, of course, was entirely wrong. The Proclamation was sent forth upon the clear understanding, right or wrong, that that which had to-night been stated by his noble and learned friend (Lord Lyndhurst) was the law. Upon that point no doubt whatever was entertained either in the mind of the Government or in his own mind. He felt no difficulty in stating, that if he saw that he had fallen into an error, he would have judicially corrected that error; but on the contrary he did not believe that he was in error, and he had no hesitation in expressing before their Lordships a clear, confident opinion that that which he proclaimed to be the law in June, 1852, was the law, according to the clear meaning of the 26th clause of the Catholic Relief Bill, of 1829. With regard to the grammatical construction of the clause, and the argument respecting "orders," let them see what that amounted to. After having very properly repealed many penalties, and required ecclesiastics to make certain declarations, he found a proviso in section 11 to the effect that no penalty in the Act contained should extend or be construed to extend to any Roman Catholic ecclesiastic who should officiate in any place of religious worship, or exercise any of the rites or ceremonies of his religion, or wear the habits of his order, in any place of religious worship or in private houses. Here there was every single word that they found used in the other clause, and the words "of his order," applied exclusively and simply to the Roman Catholic ecclesiastics, and not to the monastic orders only. How then could there be a doubt as to the proper understanding and construction of the Act in the mind of any human being who was capable of reasoning. And, while they were thus talking of the Act of Parliament, they must not lose sight of what was the real intent of the Legislature in enacting it. They were not bound even by the grammatical construction of the Act; on the contrary, there might be strong reasons for setting themselves against that construction; but, if they found that the intention of the Legislature and the grammatical construction concurred, there was nothing to find fault with. It was intended, and it ought to have been intended. It was policy, and it was the true policy. The policy of the law before this Act was passed was to prevent any public displays that were likely to give rise to irritation, and the purpose of this Act was to continue that prohibition, to enforce it, and even to carry it still further than before. And why was it in the Act? Because, although the country was resolved to have no more Jesuits—in which it acted wisely—within its dominions, and not to allow these monkish orders to come into the country, it did tolerate them so far as to allow those who were already here, who belonged to the country, or who came here within a short period, to remain under certain restrictions, and this Act was intended to apply to them while they remained. The intention of the Legislature was not to put an end to Roman Catholic establishments, but it was desired to exclude the monkish orders. Could it then be maintained that this Act was only to apply to that body whom it was intended for the time to come wholly to exclude from the kingdom, but was not to extend to those who were allowed to remain, and form a permanent part of the community? It was impossible, in his opinion, to do so; and he could only say, in conclusion, that, having read the clauses over frequently, he had been unable to bring himself to entertain the slightest doubt that the words so often quoted referred both to the secular and the regular priests of the Roman Catholic Church.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER, in reply, appealed to the House whether it was fair for the Government to obtain the opinions of the law officers of the Crown, and to keep their Lordships altogether in the dark respecting them. He must say that that was not equal justice. After the speeches they had heard to-night the case had really become ridiculous, and he should not think it worth his while to disturb the practice by moving for any other papers than the Proclamation.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, Tuesday, March 6, 1855.

MINUTES.] NEW WARS for Portsmouth v. Viscount Monck, Commissioner of the Treasury.
NEW MEMBER SWEORN for Halifax—Right Hon. Sir Charles Wood, bt.; for Northampton Borough, Right Hon. Robert Vernon Smith; for New Radnor, Right Hon. Sir George Cornwall Lewis, bt.

PAUPER CHILDREN—QUESTION.

MR. MILES said he begged to ask the right hon. gentlemen the President of the Poor Law Board whether any communication had taken place between the President of the Privy Council and himself relative to the education of children receiving outdoor relief; and if so, whether there was any objection to lay such correspondence before the House?

MR. BAINES said he had no objection to lay the correspondence on the table.

MR. MILES said he could now ask the right hon. gentleman whether any communication had taken place between himself and the Emigration Commissioners relative to the Act passed by the New

Lord St. Leonards

South Wales Legislature (16 Vic., cap. 42, sec. 7 & 8), whereby the Emigration Commissioners are declared competent to engage any boy or girl of and above the age of thirteen, from any parish or board of guardians, the parents or guardians of whom shall be willing to contribute towards their passage to the colony, the colony paying a sum not exceeding 8*l.* sterling towards the passage money; such children, upon their arrival at the colony, to be apprenticed to proper employers under certain conditions.

MR. BAINES said that a correspondence had taken place on the subject referred to, and he had no objection to its production.

THE CRIMEAN MEDAL—QUESTION.

MR. OWEN STANLEY said he begged to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, or the hon. gentleman the Under Secretary for War, if it was intended that the Crimean medal shall confer two years' additional service, or any peculiar advantages similar to those conferred by the Waterloo medal in 1815?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said that, undoubtedly, the actions in the Crimea were actions in which the brave troops of this country displayed as much valour as ever was evinced on any former occasion; but, although a medal had been conferred, it was not intended to accompany it with the privilege of counting these actions as two years' service. The hon. Member must be aware that battles were fought in the Peninsula, in which the success was as great and complete as that obtained at Alma and Inkerman, but in respect to which no such privileges were conferred. The battle of Waterloo was an event of a totally different character. It put an end to a long war; it decided the fate of Europe; and was not a precedent for anything connected with the actions which have been fought in the Crimea.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE ARMY—QUESTION.

MR. HUTT said, that seeing, by official correspondence, that when the Duke of Newcastle found it necessary to recall Lord Lucan from the command of the British cavalry in the Crimea, he was compelled to obtain the interposition of Lord Hardinge for that purpose, he wished to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, among the improvements in the administration of the army which he promised to the House on his accession to office, he proposed to empower the Secretary for War to effect such changes without the intervention of the Horse Guards?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that no change was intended to be effected in the military subordination of the army, and therefore the Commander in Chief would be the authority whose orders and directions would either appoint or withdraw officers from the staff; but the actions of the Commander in Chief would necessarily be subjected to the decision of the Government on matters of sufficient importance to require that decision, and their decision would be communicated to the Commander in Chief by the Secretary of State for the War Department.

THE CITY OF LONDON CORPORATION COMMISSION—QUESTION.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, the report of the Royal Commission on the subject of the corporation of the city of London had now been for some time in possession of the House and the country. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department, whether he had had an opportunity of considering the report; and, if so, whether it was the intention of the Government to propose any measure during the present Session?

SIR GEORGE GREY replied, that a Bill was in preparation founded on the recommendations contained in the Report of the Commissioners for the reform of the Corporation of London; but it was desirable that the House should, in the first place, consider the Bills relating to the metropolis generally, which had been introduced by his right hon. Friend (Sir B. Hall). He hoped, however, to be able to bring in a Bill for the reform of the corporation in the course of the present Session.

THE CAPE—THE KAFIRS—QUESTION.

MR. LIDDELL asked whether the Government had received any official information from British Kaffraria which was likely to cause the apprehension of another Kafir war?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that at the date of the last despatches from the Governor of the Cape of Good Hope, no act of hostility had taken place. Considerable uneasiness and alarm existed on the eastern frontier on account of the supposed hostile intentions of the Kafirs and the Fingoos, who had combined together with no friendly intention towards the settlers. In the last dispatch, dated the 30th December, the Governor said, the latest accounts he had received were of a more satisfactory and cheering character, and he was on the point of going to the frontier to hold communication with the chiefs of the Kafirs and Fingoos, from which he hoped beneficial results would follow.

THE RECORDERSHIP OF BRIGHTON.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he rose to move for the appointment of a Select Committee to take into consideration the case of the appointment of Edwin James, Q.C., to the office of Recorder of Brighton, the said Edwin James having been refused admittance to the Bench of the Inner Temple on account of his conduct in respect of certain transactions connected with the election for the borough of Horsham in 1847. He felt that, in undertaking to bring forward this question, he had entered upon a task of serious moment and of a very painful nature. It was not the less painful that Mr. James was a member of the same profession as himself, of the same inn, and of the same circuit. He was not actuated, however, by any personal motives. He had no acquaintance with Mr. James beyond the casual intercourse incidental to their meeting on circuit. He could bear testimony to that gentleman's eminent abilities, high legal attainments, and forensic talent, having often witnessed the ingenuity and skill with which he conducted the cases of his clients. But this appointment was of a judicial character, the holder of which should be above the slightest breath of suspicion. The question which he was about to bring under the notice of the House was one which ought not to be introduced on light grounds, but he felt satisfied, from the information in his possession, that if the House would grant him a Committee he should be able fully to prove his case. About a fortnight ago he asked the noble Lord at the head of the Government whether the new recordership of Brighton had been conferred upon a Queen's counsel who had been refused admittance to the bench of his inn? The noble Lord said it was not true that a gentleman had been appointed to the office referred to who had been refused admittance in the way stated. The learned person whom he had appointed had not been so refused. He had selected presented to him the individual who, according to the testimony of high legal authorities, appeared to him to be the best qualified. He had no personal knowledge of any of the candidates, but selected the one who brought the highest testimony from legal authorities of professional competency, and he had no reason to think he had erred in making the appointment. The noble Lord qualified his answer, and said that Mr. James had not been refused in the manner he (Mr. Craufurd) had stated, that he had not been "so" refused. It might, perhaps, be argued, in the strict sense of the word, that the learned gentleman was not refused, inasmuch as he was not proposed; but that amounted to a mere quibble, for in point of practice he had been refused admittance. Complaints were made to the benchers against him; he was called upon to explain, and, after explaining, was not admitted to the bench of his inn, as was usual in the case of counsel receiving a silk gown. The case he had to submit to the House had reference to the Horsham election in 1847. The successful candidate at that election was the son of the then Attorney General (Mr. Jervis). Mr. James, having property in the neighbourhood, took a very active part in the election. A petition was presented against the return of Mr. John Jervis, on the grounds of treating and bribery. When the Committee appointed to try the petition assembled, the counsel for Mr. Jervis admitted the treating, and at the same time submitted to a Resolution declaring the election void, and suggested that the petitioner ought to be satisfied and withdraw the charge of bribery. Perhaps the Committee shrank from going into evidence which would have proved a distinguished Whig Attorney General to have been guilty of gross bribery. The Committee, however, required some proof of the treating—some explanation to satisfy their consciences that they might abstain from reporting on the extraordinary conduct of withdrawing the charges of bribery when they were so notorious. If the Committee had gone a step further, they would have ascertained that by some collusion the charges had been withdrawn on condition that the election should be void. One gentleman who was examined stated his readiness to give the names of certain parties, but the Committee decided that they would not call upon him to do so, and they reported that the circumstances did not call for a special Report. If the Committee had examined into the matter, they would have found that one of the parties engaged in the compromise had rendered himself liable to the payment of £1,500*L.*, and Mr. James undertook to pay that sum if the other party failed to do so, towards the costs of the petition if the bribery charges were withdrawn. Those charges were withdrawn, but the money had never been paid. It was an illegal contract, and consequently could not be enforced, but it was, nevertheless, an honourable engagement which Mr. James had never fulfilled. A complaint to the benchers against Mr. James for having failed to pay that money was not entertained, because Mr. James had not acted in his professional capacity, either for the member or the petitioner. Actions were, however, tried at the assizes at Lewes, both against Mr. James and the Attorney General, Sir John Jervis. The action against Mr. James resulted in a verdict for the defendant, owing to the exclusion of some evidence by a ruling of the Judge, to which a bill of exceptions was tendered. That bill of exceptions was never argued. As to the reasons of that, hon. Members could form their own surmises. The other action was, after the examination of some witnesses, abandoned. When the House was professing to be in earnest in suppressing bribery, and when Her Majesty's Government were bringing forward Bills to effect that suppression, and to punish those who were guilty of bribery, it behoved the House to be particularly careful in seeing that the offence was not connived at when committed by persons holding high stations in society. He thought the House was not in earnest, or they would not object to the assertions he made, and which were capable of proof. He believed it could be shown that there had been gross bribery on the one hand, and protection of bribery on the other. Subsequently to those transactions, Mr. James was promoted by being called within the bar, and the then Attorney General—Sir John Jervis—was advanced to the bench. When Mr. James applied to be made a bencher, he was called upon to explain the circumstances as to his having contracted the obligation to pay the sum of £1,500*L.* provided the charge of bribery were withdrawn, and why, having entered into that arrangement, he had not performed it? But up to this moment he had not explained it. He (Mr. Craufurd) had precedents in favour of the course he was now pursuing. There was the case of Mr. Stonor, in which unparalleled cruelty was practised upon a professional man. That gentleman, after having left this country, on being appointed to a Judgeship in one of our colonies, was abandoned by the Government who had appointed him, although he had produced the highest possible testimonies in answer to the charges that were made against him. He admitted that that was a case of extreme hardship, but he could not understand in what way the Government could defend the appointment of Mr. James after having treated Mr. Stonor in the way they had done, and which, he believed, had been his complete ruin for life. Well, Mr. James applied to be admitted a bencher of the Inner Temple. Now, he had always understood that the benchers were the custodes of the character of the bar. If, therefore, those hon. Members who were benchers wished to uphold that doctrine, they would support the principle for which he was contending. In the case of Mr. Whittle Harvey, the question was raised whether the benchers had the power of refusing admission to the bar; and it was, in that case, stated that the question rested wholly with them, and that they had the right to refuse admission to the bar to whomsoever they might think unworthy. If this were so, then still more ought they to exercise that right in regard to the admission of a member of their own body. He had himself frequently complained, both in writing and in public, that the benchers had not acted fairly towards the public in neglecting to exercise their powers of rejection. If they were justly open to that charge, it made his argument the stronger when a case occurred in which they did exercise their jurisdiction, and it afforded a greater reason for supporting them in their decision. This was not the first case in which he had tried the experiment as to whether there was any sincerity on the part of the Government to put down bribery and corruption at elections. In 1853 he moved for the production of papers in the case of the Canterbury election, when an attorney was accused of having been guilty of subordination of perjury, and those papers were refused upon the usual excuse that, as the Commissioners of inquiry into that case had not chosen to take notice of the fact, the House was not called upon to interfere. In bringing forward this Motion he had not sought to attack any one individual, but he felt it his duty, in a case involving bribery and a breach of the privileges of the House, not to suffer it to pass unnoticed. However painful and distressing it might be to have even the suspicion of personal motives entertained against him, still the duty he owed to the public interest was paramount to all other considerations; and if there existed any sincere desire to put down bribery, the case of the appointment to a newly-created recordership of a gentleman who was believed to have participated in a gross instance of bribery ought to command the deliberation of the House. It was most important to bring matters of this nature before the House, so as to ascertain whether judicial appointments were to be the reward of honourable and straightforward conduct in the profession, or whether mere ability and forensic talent, combined with a political connection with the Government, were to carry the day. One would suppose that a newly-appointed recorder would have been most anxious to study the convenience of the public and of the court over which he presided; but what was the case in this instance? The Brighton sessions, which commenced last week, were exceedingly heavy, lasting beyond the first day—but on the assembling of the court on the second morning, much to the astonishment of every one, a Deputy appeared in place of the Recorder, who had returned to town to attend the Cambridge Election Committee. Now, although recorders were undoubtedly empowered to appoint a Deputy in the case of illness or unavoidable absence, he put it to the House whether this was such a case of unavoidable absence as would justify the proceeding? The noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) in answering his (Mr. Craufurd's) question on this subject the other day, left the impression that he had made a wanton attack, and that he was not correct in stating that Mr. James had been refused admittance as a bencher. But the noble Lord inserted a qualification in his reply, which made it incumbent that he (Mr. Craufurd) should proceed with the case; and, if the House thought proper to grant a Committee, he should be prepared to prove statements involving the bona fides of the Government in reference to questions of bribery, and with regard to appointments to judicial offices.

SIR JOSHUA WALMSLEY seconded the Motion.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said,
I trusted the House would not require many observations from him to satisfy it that this Motion ought to be rejected. He was bound to assume, and did assume, that the hon. and learned Gentleman who had made it, had brought forward this proposition from the purest and loftiest motives; but he could not help noticing what he considered the want of taste shown in the manner in which the hon. and learned Gentleman had brought forward his proposition. He had thought right to travel out of the record, and, not content with attacking Mr. James, he had seized the opportunity while alluding to transactions which took place some time since, to direct his attack also against another. He had told the House that if certain proceedings had been carried to the extent they ought to have been, the effect might have been to criminate a Gentleman whom he termed "a distinguished Whig Attorney General." That distinguished individual was now a Member of the judicial bench in one of its highest positions, and was not there to answer for himself. Eight years had passed since the transactions in question, and the hon. and learned Gentleman had thought fit to attack that eminent and distinguished individual at the time when he perfectly well knew that he could not defend himself. Not only this, but besides attempting to make out a case against Mr. James, he went further, and referred to the accidental absence of that Gentleman last week from Brighton, as if that, except to create a prejudice, had anything to do with the matter before the House. He would ask any hon. Gentleman who had heard this statement whether the case against Mr. James was worthy of a moment's consideration. Now, what were the real facts of the case. It appeared that in 1847 Mr. James, being a resident in the neighbourhood of Horsham, took an interest in an election for that place, and having been active on behalf of an hon. Gentleman who was returned, he was a party to some compromise in an Election Committee. In that, of course, the House would at once perceive, he acted in his private, not in his professional, capacity. If in doing so he did anything which made him amenable to the House, there were abundant means of investigating the matter long ago, and he (the Attorney General) did not know why the hon. and learned Gentleman, who had for some time been a Member of that House, waited until Mr. James was appointed Recorder of Brighton, and then raked up this stale story for the purpose of prejudicing him. It appeared that Mr. James entered into some arrangement, which the party principally interested did not think proper to ratify, alleging that Mr. James had gone beyond the limits of the discretion vested in him, Mr. James having acted, as he had always alleged, bona fide in the belief that he was only carrying out that which he was authorised to do. There was a third party, who alleged that he had a grievance against Mr. James, and called upon him to fulfil the conditions. Mr. James replied, " You knew all the time that I was acting only on the part of another person, and you have no right to look to me personally for the fulfilment of the agreement." This person, it was, who brought the matter before the benchers of the Inner Temple. The benchers were of opinion that it was not a case in which they were called upon to adjudicate, and they let the matter remain where it was. Afterwards Mr. James was made a Queen's Counsel, and it was said that he was rejected by the benchers on account of what took place with reference to the election at Horsham. Now, he never was rejected at all, and if he had been it would have been nothing to the present purpose. When a Gentleman, having become one of Her Majesty's Counsel, offered himself for election as a member of the bench, it was not a matter in which his personal conduct was made a subject of question, or upon which a division took place in which the majority bound the minority. The benchers of the Inner Temple maintained their indisputable right to exercise a power of selection without being accountable to any one, and in this the Judges had held them to be right. Instead of being a question of the majority binding the minority they proceeded on the principle of a club, and, there being about forty benchers, four black balls excluded. Was he to be told that, because a gentleman found that he was objected to by three or four individuals, and chose to withdraw, that was to be a bar to his professional advancement under any circumstances? The proposition was monstrous. He thought it was in point of fairness and honour incumbent upon the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Craufurd) to have informed the House how the benchers of the Inner Temple proceeded in cases like the present. Now, he would ask was it either fair or just that a man's character and chance of professional advancement were to be blasted by a Motion of this description, and that the House should not be told under what circumstances the election really took place? If the hon. and learned Gentleman thought it necessary, under his deep sense of public duty, to make an attack upon an individual, which, to say the least, did not savour much of liberality and generosity, he was at least bound to state all the circumstances, and keep nothing back. Under these circumstances, the fact of Mr. James not having been elected a bencher might be a subject of regret to himself and to his friends, but it afforded no reason why he should be excluded from his fair chance of advancement in his profession. He (the Attorney General) knew at that moment two or three gentlemen who had been raised to the dignity of Queen's counsel, but had not been elected benchers of the Inner Temple, although no charge whatever could be adduced against their personal characters. It would merely appear that they did not happen to be popular men, and it was perhaps considered that they might be obnoxious to other gentlemen who were already benchers. Every Queen's counsel took his chance of the ballot on those occasions, just as gentlemen did when they sought admission to a club. That was the case with Mr. James, and let the House remember that there had been no adjudication and no decision affecting him. When the hon. Gentleman said that the benchers of the Inner Temple were the custodes morum of the profession, he failed to distinguish between cases in which they acted in that capacity, and when they acted as members of a society, admitting or excluding whom they pleased. The charge was made, but the benchers decided that it was not a proper one for them to decide. If there had been a public decision, excluding Mr. James upon the ground that there was anything affecting his personal honour, that would have been a serious objection to his appointment. But these proceedings were no more made known to the world and to the Government than were the elections and decisions of private clubs, and it was utterly unknown to the Government that Mr. James had been rejected by the benchers of the Inner Temple, still less that he had been rejected for a particular reason now specified. How the hon. and learned Gentleman had obtained that information, he (the Attorney General) did not know; but he now made it a charge against the Government that they had appointed Mr.
. Craufurd

James after he had been rejected by the bench of the Inner Temple because he was mixed up in this election case, and he then called upon the House to assist him in a personal attack upon Mr. James, which, if carried, would be fatal to that Gentleman's professional prospects, on the ground that the House was anxious to put down bribery. Was that fair, or was it honourable? The hon. and learned Gentleman did not prefer it as a charge, but, feeling how rotten was his case, he introduced this matter of bribery. Then he told the House that certain actions were tried, that one failed because certain evidence was rejected by the Judge, and that a Bill of exceptions was tendered but was not gone on with. Then said the hon. and learned Gentleman, "We can form our own private surmises how the Bill of exceptions came not to be proceeded with." He (the Attorney General) could form a surmise, and, he trusted, a more charitable one than that of the hon. and learned Gentleman. His surmise was that it was not gone on with because it was found not to be tenable. Then there was the other action, in which one of our highest judicial functionaries was concerned. The hon. and learned Gentleman did not care for a person being absent. He scattered imputations broadcast, and then told the House that he was actuated by the highest and purest motives. He (the Attorney General) was perfectly satisfied that the House would feel that this was a matter which ought not to be further entertained. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Craufurd) did not appear to be anxious to do justice to absent men; but he (the Attorney General) was. One of the competitors for this office, and one whose claims were well worthy to be taken into consideration, was Mr. Clarkson. As soon as Mr. Clarkson heard of this proceeding of the hon. and learned Member for Ayr, he came to him (the Attorney General) and said:—"You have known me a great many years, and were good enough to give me a testimonial for this office. You know me too well to suppose I have anything to do with this Motion." He (the Attorney General) was afraid that it would not be cautious in him to mention the reply which he made. He hoped the House, however, would mark its sense of this proposition by unanimously rejecting it; and he even trusted the hon. Gentleman who seconded the Motion would not go into the lobby with the hon. and learned Gentleman.

The Attorney General

MR. I. BUTT said, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Ayr had thought fit to declare that the House had rejected his Motion for papers, which, if produced, would have established a charge of subornation of perjury against a respectable solicitor. The candidate for Canterbury, on behalf of whom that solicitor had acted, was his (Mr. Butt's) intimate friend, and, when the hon. and learned Gentleman made that charge on a former occasion, he (Mr. Butt) replied to it, and he was now surprised that the imputation should be repeated after the House had decided that an ample vindication of the accused party had been given.

MR. ATHERTON said, he thought that it was only justice to Mr. James that some other member of the profession, and one upon the bench of the Inner Temple, should confirm the statement of the hon. and learned Attorney General as to the qualifications and character of Mr. James, and also as to the practice of the bench of the Inner Temple. Although the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Crawfurd) referred in his Motion to the transactions at Horsham, it was not, either by its terms or upon any fair construction, a Motion asking the House to grant a Committee, on the ground of Mr. James having been concerned in those proceedings. On the contrary, the only meaning which any one could arrive at from the speech of the hon. and learned Member was, that the hon. and learned Member asked for the Committee on the ground that certain transactions occurred some years ago at Horsham, upon which a competent tribunal of forensic morals—the bench of the Inner Temple—had pronounced a judgment adverse to and condemnatory of Mr. James. The hon. and learned Gentleman (the Attorney General) had stated most correctly that it was no imputation at all—that it was not the slightest censure, by implication the most remote and shadowy, upon any gentleman, a member of the Inner Temple, who might receive a silk gown, that he was not forthwith elected a member of the bench. Of late years there had been many instances of gentlemen upon whose character, private and professional, not the slightest imputation could be cast, who had become Queen's counsel, but whom, for some reason, the benchers, exercising their absolute discretion, had declined to take into the bench. Upon this matter the bench, though a complaint was made, had pronounced no decision. If this Motion were entertained, the House would, in addition to the enormous amount of public and private business they had to despatch, be setting themselves up by their Select Committees as inquisitors and censors into the substance or shadow of every supposition which might result either from the idleness or malice of any individual.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he wished to repeat what he had stated on a former occasion that, when he was called upon to fill up the appointment in question, a great many applications were made, and he felt it his duty to ascertain which of the candidates, from professional standing and legal attainments, was best qualified for the office. He accordingly made inquiries, the result of which was that he arrived at the conclusion that Mr. James was, on the whole, from his position at the bar, and from the testimonials of his legal acquirements, the most competent person for the position. That gentleman had further in his favour the fact that a large number of the town-council of Brighton had signed a paper expressing a desire that Mr. James should be appointed the Recorder of that town. He (Lord Palmerston) had no personal knowledge of any of the candidates—had never seen any of them, and had no other motive in selecting Mr. James than to perform his duty to the best of his ability. As to the particular circumstances connected with the admission or non-admission of the learned Gentleman to the bench of the Inner Temple, he (Lord Palmerston) never heard of it until the hon. and learned Member gave notice of his question. Upon seeing that notice, he inquired and found what he stated in reply to the question, that Mr. James had not been rejected as a bENCHER because he had never been proposed.

SIR JAMES DUKE said, he willingly bore testimony, as a friend of Mr. James, to that gentleman's high character.

MR. CRAUFURD in reply, said he could not reconcile the sneers of the hon. and learned Gentleman (the Attorney General) with his professed defence of Mr. James. The hon. and learned Gentleman had sneered at his having felt it to be a public duty to bring forward this Motion, and insinuated that he was actuated by private motives, and more, that he was the mouth-piece of some disappointed candidate.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL : I never insinuated any such thing ; on the contrary, I attributed to the hon. and learned Gentleman none but the highest and purest motives, and I also stated that there was not one of the candidates who did not repudiate the Motion.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he had understood the hon. and learned Attorney General to maintain that the bENCHERS of the Inner Temple, who acted upon some occasions as custodes morum, had an arbitrary power of electing whom they pleased, as a mere private club ; and that was very different from his notion of their position. But if the charges which he (Mr. Craufurd) had brought forward were unfounded, he trusted the House would at least believe that he had acted from a conscientious conviction ; and, at any rate, the objectionable circumstances having been explained away, and the charges not being sustained, the result would be all that the friends of Mr. James could desire. But the Attorney General had not denied that the Recorder of Brighton was called upon to explain the charges against him, and it was notorious in the profession that such an inquiry did take place before the bENCHERS. He (Mr. Craufurd) considered that the case he had made out was not yet answered, except by the sneers of the hon. and learned Attorney General.

SIR JOSHUA WALMSLEY said, he wished to explain, at the same time, the reason why he had seconded this Motion. He had reason to think that the House, and especially the person who had been accused of improper practices, would rejoice that he had done so, because it had given the Attorney General and other persons an opportunity of vindicating that gentleman, whom he (Sir J. Walmsley) believed to have been injured by the statements which had been made. He had seconded the Motion upon the impulse of the moment, and at the request of the hon. and learned Member for Ayr ; but, after the statements which he had heard, he certainly could not feel it consistent with his duty to vote for the Motion.

Motion negatived.

MR. I. BUTT said, that no division having taken place, he should move that everything connected with this matter be expunged from the Journals of the House. There was a precedent for doing so in 1832, when the late Mr. Cobett brought certain charges against Sir Robert Peel. Immediately after they had been negatived by the House, the House passed such a Resolution as he (Mr. Butt) now proposed; and if ever there was an occasion on which favour of the establishment of councils of arbitration. There was one club in London alone, consisting of, he believed, 16,000 members, and there were other clubs in various parts of the country which had been established for the purpose of advocating the establishment of equitable tribunals, by means of which disputes might be adjusted without incurring legal expenses. It might be said that the principle of such tribunals was not recognised by the law, but he could not admit such assertion, for by the 39 & 40 Geo. III. power was given to settle certain cases by arbitration, and to make the decision thus arrived at legal. About thirty years back a Committee, consisting of some of the most influential Members of that House, had agreed to a Resolution, that "the principle of settling disputes by arbitration was not against the law of the land, and that it was attended with good results to the parties concerned." It appeared, therefore, that there was nothing in the establishment of councils of arbitration opposed to any principle of law, and, in his opinion, such tribunals would be highly beneficial generally, and more particularly so in two instances. They would, in the first place, be of the greatest benefit in settling disputes concerning patents and designs, but, what was of still more importance, they might conduce to the prevention of such strikes as had lately occurred at Preston, Leeds, and other manufacturing districts, and which might at some period be productive of great danger. He would adduce one instance in the case of a disputed patent which would explain to the House the advantage of these councils of arbitration. He would take the case of a person in poor circumstances who, by his industry and ingenuity, had succeeded in perfecting a valuable invention. To secure the advantages of his own skill he was obliged to take out a patent, and the expense of so doing might, perhaps, consume all his means. When, however, he was beginning to reap the reward of his ingenuity, another person might make some slight alteration in the invention, take out a new patent, and the original inventor, not having the means of defraying law expenses, might be deprived of the just reward of his skill. He should wish to see established councils of arbitration, consisting of masters and workpeople, the masters to be elected by the workpeople, and the workpeople to be elected by the masters, for he thought that a body so

MN. CRAUFURD said, he objected to the Motion. What he had stated was, that if a Committee were granted he should be prepared to prove the statements he had made; but when he found that even the hon. Gentleman left him who had seconded his Motion, he could not put the House to the trouble of dividing. The House having refused to grant an inquiry—a refusal equally unjust to himself and to the learned Gentleman whose name was involved in it—he (Mr. Craufurd) must still object to any such Motion as that his Resolution should not be placed on the Journals.

MASTERS AND OPERATIVES.

MN. MACKINNON said, he wished to call the attention of the House to the inconvenience now felt in this country from the want of equitable tribunals by means of which any differences between masters and operatives might be satisfactorily adjusted, and from which other advantages might be gained in disputed claims. He begged to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the necessary information as to the Conseil des Prud'hommes in France, might be obtained by a Commission or otherwise. The subject was one which, in his opinion, was of the utmost importance, and a very strong feeling existed throughout the country in constituted would be better adapted to settle disputes concerning patents than the ordinary courts of law, and it would at the same time be of great advantage in settling disputes which might occur between masters and workpeople, which, if not settled, might lead to strikes similar to those which had lately taken place. He had had the opportunity of observing in France the working of the Conseils des Prud'hommes, and he was satisfied in his own mind, that those tribunals had greatly conduced to the prosperity of that country. Those tribunals were first established in the year 1806. At that period the Emperor Napoleon, on his way to Milan, passed through Lyons, and the manufacturing population of that town waited upon him, and requested him to establish a tribunal of that description for the adjustment of disputes between masters and workmen. Napoleon took the matter into consideration, and issued a decree establishing a Conseil des Prud'hommes. This tribunal worked perfectly well in France; it had kept up a good feeling between the master and the workmen, and had fully answered the object for which it was established. Now, there might be objections to the establishment of such a tribunal in this country, though he did not think there were; but what he would ask the Government to agree to was, the appointment of a Committee of the House to investigate the subject. As it was worded upon the notice paper, his Motion was for the appointment of a Commission, but he thought the best course would be for him to conclude by moving for a Select Committee to see how far the establishment in this country of Conseils des Prud'hommes, or councils of arbitration, would be attended with benefit to the people of this country.

“ That a Select Committee be appointed, to inquire into the operations of the ‘Conseils des Prud'hommes’ in France.”

SIR GEORGE GREY said, there could be no doubt as to the importance of any measures which could be adopted by which differences between masters and men could be satisfactorily arranged. He did not, however, think that there was any necessity for the appointment of a Committee or Commission to inquire into the subject referred to by the hon. Member, as the fullest and most complete information existed with reference to these institutions in an official edition of the French laws, which he should be happy to place at the disposal of the hon. Member, if he had not already seen it. With respect to any further information which might be required, it could be easily obtained through his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who would make application to the French Government, if such a course were considered necessary. Looking to the jurisdiction exercised by these bodies, he thought that they would be ill suited to the manufacturing and trading population of this country. He was perfectly willing to lay before the House all the information the Government possessed upon the subject, and he trusted that that would satisfy the hon. Member.

MR. INGHAM said, he wished to refer to a court of arbitration of this kind which had been established in Sunderland and had worked very satisfactorily. He thought it would be very desirable if the Secretary of State for the Home Department would endeavour to give something like a legal constitution to those courts which had been voluntarily established in various places, so as to give authority to their judgments.

MR. WILKINSON said, he had no objection to voluntary arbitration, but he objected to giving such tribunals any legal power to arbitrate on the rate of wages, or anything of that sort. Unless a court of arbitration had legal jurisdiction it would be inoperative, and if such powers were given it, there might be injurious interference in matters that should find their level in the market.

MR. ROBERT GROSVENOR said, that, at a very large meeting held last year in the manufacturing districts, the establishment of some court of this nature was approved of almost unanimously. He did not believe the courts in France, which had been alluded to, had any arbitrary power to settle the wages of any particular trade in any given district; they had only power over such things as were specially referred to them. He hoped the subject would not be lost sight of. They must not suppose, because a strike commenced in November, and was over in December, that it was all done with. It was put an end to then only to be renewed on a more favourable occasion, and left much ill-feeling. He thought the subject well deserved the attention of the Government, and he hoped that at all events the hon. Member (Mr MacKinnon) would not let it rest, but when he got the information would bring in a Bill on the subject.

MR. MACKINNON said, he wished to understand the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department aright, and to know what he was to expect if he withdrew his Motion. He understood the right hon. Gentleman to ask him to wait until he could procure the information he had stated, and that then the Government would grant him a Committee if he (Mr. Mackinnon) thought it necessary. There would be no great probability of the House passing a Bill unless the matter were first referred to a Select Committee.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he had not made any promise that a Committee would be granted. The object of this Motion was to ascertain the state of the law of France, and the operation of that law. He doubted whether a Committee would afford the best means of obtaining information, which must all come from France. When the hon. Member obtained the information he desired he would be competent to move for the appointment of a Committee if he thought it necessary, but he (Sir G. Grey) could not at present pledge himself to support the appointment of a Select Committee.

BURIAL GROUNDS.

MR. APSLEY PELLATT said, he rose to move for a Select Committee, to inquire into the operation of the Acts regulating interments in parochial burial-grounds and proprietary and other cemeteries. The operation of recent legislation on this subject, in the metropolis, had been to compel the poorer classes to pay advanced burial fees, so that they were obliged to go to parochial boards for assistance.

Notice taken that forty Members were not present; House counted; and forty Members not being present,

The House adjourned at seven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, March 7, 1855.

MINUTES.] NEW MEMBER SWEORN for Stroud, Edward Horsman, esq.
3<sup>o</sup> Exchequer Bills (£17,183,000).

PUBLIC LIBRARIES AND MUSEUMS BILL.

Order for Committee read;
House in Committee.
Clauses 1, 2, and 3 agreed to.

Clause 4—

MR. BUCK said, that taxation was already very oppressive, and this Bill would impose a monstrous burden not only on the towns, but the landed interest connected with the towns. He would move therefore that, instead of reducing the limit of the population from 10,000 to 5,000 as proposed by the Bill, the limit should remain at 10,000, as at present.

MR. EWART said, that this was only a permissive Bill, and he knew many places containing not more than 5,000 inhabitants where this Bill would be regarded as a great boon. He saw no reason to deny to small agricultural towns the privileges of enlightenment which the House of Commons had already given to larger places.

MR. HENLEY said, he observed that there were several inequalities in the Bill, but if the taxation could be made uniform, he should not object to the application of the Bill to parishes with populations amounting to 10,000. There were three classes of persons on whom the Bill would operate—those in parishes, those in places under the Towns Improvement Act, and those in municipal boroughs. Now those persons who held land under the Towns Improvement Act were rated in different proportion from those who held houses, and the Bill would in that respect operate unequally. The occupiers of land would have to pay a different amount of rate from that paid by the occupiers of houses, whilst the latter would enjoy greater advantages than the former in consequence of their facility of access to the libraries.

MR. MICHELL said, he could not agree with the hon. Member for North Devonshire (Mr. Buck), that this Bill would be a hardship upon small agricultural towns, for he considered that they were the places which most wanted public libraries. There were towns in Cornwall, the inhabitants of which had requested him to move that the limit of population should be 4,000 instead of 5,000, so that they might establish libraries under this Bill. He thought it would be much better to place no restriction upon the amount of population of places which might wish to avail themselves of this Bill.

MR. SPOONER said, that in Birmingham the people had not acted upon the powers which they already possessed. The Bill would be a hardship to those persons living within the boundaries of boroughs who lived at a distance too great to avail themselves of the public libraries, but who, from having a large garden, would be rated more heavily than the occupier of a House in the town, who might enjoy the privileges of the libraries every hour in the day. The Bill might be said to be permissive, but it would give a certain portion of the inhabitants the power to compel others to pay these rates against their will, and with little or no advantage to them.

MR. BROTHERTON said, he could state that these libraries in Salford and the surrounding boroughs were most popular. The working people were the most earnest in encouraging them, and regarded them as a boon. They were not so much libraries for the rich as the poor, and those who were the most taxed for the support of these public institutions were most favourable to them.

Lord STANLEY said, he thought the complaint not unreasonable that parties might in certain boroughs live at such a distance from these libraries as to derive little or no advantage from them. But in the free libraries of large Towns the power was given, not only of enabling persons to use the books in the library, but also to take them out and read them at their own homes. It was quite within the competence of those who managed these libraries to adopt such a regulation.

MR. CARDWELL said, it was desirable that the Committee should not lose the opportunity of extending the benefits of education by every means in its power. The objections to the present Bill did not proceed from those who had availed themselves of the opportunities afforded by the previous measure. In the town of Oxford a public library had been established for nine months with the best results, having been attended by 90,000 persons, without a single complaint of impropriety or indecorum. Upwards of 3,000 volumes had been presented to the library. A greater moral benefit to the community, or one more popular to those who paid the taxes, it was impossible to conceive. By this Bill the town council or other bodies could assemble, and if two-thirds of the rate-payers did not approve the Bill it would not be called into operation. If they approved the Bill the community would, by levying a moderate rate, not exceeding a penny in the pound, provide the means of educating themselves, of assembling every evening for innocent recreation, and of availing themselves of those educational advantages which the liberality of the more wealthy members of society might place at their disposal. The whole country was greatly indebted to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Dumfries (Mr. Ewart) for the pains he had taken with this subject, and he should not be doing his duty if he neglected to state the result of experience in the community which he had the honour to represent. With regard to the suggestion of the right hon. Member for the county of Oxford (Mr. Henley) it was of great importance in levying new rates that the incidence of those rates and the mode of levying them should be considered; and if the hon. Member for Dumfries would communicate with those who were anxious to suggest any practical amendment, he should be happy to join with him in making the Bill more efficient.

MR. SPOONER said, he did not doubt that the measure succeeded very well in large towns, where the number of distant occupiers was small, but he protested against the Bill in its present shape, as it would be the means of taxing persons living at a considerable distance for objects in which they could have no interest, and from which they could receive no benefit.

SIR SAMUEL BIGNOLD said, that in the city of Norwich, where there was a considerable agricultural population, that class concurred with the inhabitants generally in a desire to have a free library established.

MR. BAINES said, he was glad to hear the testimony of the hon. Member of Norwich in favour of the importance of institutions of this kind, and it entirely confirmed all that he had heard in the north of England with regard to the results of such institutions. He believed that, in every case, they had been found most beneficial, and his constituents were extremely anxious for the extension of the principle. Whilst from his official position he was naturally jealous of any unjust charge being thrown upon the poor rates, he was anxious to promote any measure which had a direct tendency to diminish the burden of pauperism, and he knew no means more calculated to effect that object than the provision, in large towns, of the means of giving useful knowledge and rational recreation to the working classes. The experience of the working of these institutions in Manchester, Salford, and other large places, was most satisfactory. He was glad to find that the Bill was permissive, for he could not have supported a compulsory measure for the rating of the inhabitants of different districts. He objected to one of the Amendments proposed by the hon. Member for Dumfries, who wished to strike out the provision which required notices to be affixed in certain public places, and to substitute the insertion of a notice in one or more newspapers circulated in the district. In his opinion, it would be much better to publish the notices in both ways.

MR. HENLEY said, he had no doubt that public libraries had been productive of unmixed good. There were libraries of some description in almost every parish. But whilst endeavouring to carry out the advantages of such a system, care ought to be taken that the occupier of 150 acres of land, on which there was only one house, should not be rated at something like 40*l.* or 50*l.*, whilst the occupier of a house in the town was not rated at more than 15*l.* or 20*l.* He would suggest that the question of rating should stand over till the Report was brought up.

MR. LOWE said, he did not know what might be the case with regard to Birmingham, but he could give some evidence of a neighbouring borough, which he thought would be satisfactory to the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner). The town of Kidderminster, which he had the honour to represent, comprehended a considerable agricultural district within the limits of the borough. The population were in the deepest distress—such distress as was unknown before to any person now living. Just at the time it was proposed to levy a half-penny rate for the establishment of a free library, cards were issued, calling upon the people not to throw away their money, or to tax themselves at a moment when so many of the inhabitants were without work. He was happy to say that in the depth of their misery the proposition was carried by an enormous majority. Only about twenty persons voted against it, and those persons (he said it with every respect) were persons whose calling in life pointed to the supposition that they thought there was a better way of spending an evening than in reading rooms and libraries.

MR. WARNER said, he must beg to express his approval of the Bill. He observed that as every system of popular education which had been introduced into Parliament failed, they should not, when they found 5,000 people willing to educate themselves, prohibit them from doing so.

MR. BAINES said that, in reference to it had fallen from the noble Lord the

Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley), he thought the 22nd clause of the Bill gave to the persons managing these libraries power to lend books if they pleased. If not, a clause might easily be framed to meet the difficulty.

SIR ERSKINE PERRY said, that, as for the out-voters of a township or borough not having the same use of the library, as those who lived in the town, it was the fact that most of the public libraries so established were lending libraries, from which they could obtain books and take them home; and he suggested that a provision for making these lending libraries should be embodied in the Bill. The public libraries on the Continent were, he believed, without exception, lending libraries. In London, the British Museum and the London Institution, and many other boasted libraries, were nearly useless to the scholar, because he had to go three or four miles to read the books.

MR. EWART said, that if any clause could be framed to meet the difficulty suggested by the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), and draw a more distinct line for taxation, he should be happy to adopt it. It was impossible, however, to provide in legislation for every exceptional case, and there could be no good without some mixture of inconvenience.

MR. HENLEY said, he would suggest that there were clauses in some of the Town Improvement Acts and the old Watching and Lighting Acts, from which example might be taken in making a distinction between land and houses, and there would be no difficulty in drawing up such a clause. As for the principle of this measure, he was favourable to it.

MR. WATSON said, he thought there might easily be a clause distinguishing the rural part of these districts from the town part; for he quite agreed that it would be unfair to tax them equally. He could bear testimony to the popularity of these institutions in the north of England, and would appeal also to the gentlemen connected with the agricultural districts to give their poor hardworking people the same opportunities of mental recreation in the evenings.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that as he believed this Bill would apply to Ireland, he should not object to it, subject to the limitations which had been suggested.

MR. EWART said, he apprehended there would be no difficulty in establishing lending libraries under this Bill; but, if more enlarged terms were proposed with that view, he should have no objection to their insertion. He was quite ready to adopt the suggestion of the right hon. President of the Poor Law Board, and require notice of meeting to be advertised in the local papers, as well as affixed to the church and chapel doors. The only question therefore before the Committee was, whether the number should be 5,000 or 10,000.

MR. PERCY said, he considered that towns of less population than 5,000 should have the benefit of the measure.

MR. MICHELL said, he hoped the hon. Member for Dumfries would consider the claims of smaller towns. If this measure would be beneficial to 10,000 people, he did not see why 4,000 should not have the benefit of it. It would be very acceptable to Bodmin and Launceston, which had corporate funds larger than they required for corporate purposes.

MR. EWART said, that on a former occasion, he did himself propose to extend this measure to towns of 4,000 inhabitants, but he found that it occasioned some difficulties, and he was obliged to alter it. Having adopted the limit of 5,000 as a sort of compromise, he should not be justified now in altering it.

MR. BROTHERTON said, Clause 15 provided that two neighbouring townships, of less than 5,000 inhabitants each, might unite, if they pleased, for the purposes of this Bill.

MR. BUCK said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. BAINES said, he wished to take every practical means of informing the public when these meetings were called. There might be some persons who did not go to churches or chapels, and others who were not in the habit of reading newspapers. As the clause was drawn, notice was to be affixed to the doors of the churches and chapels; and he would move the addition of the words "and also by advertising the same in one or more of the newspapers published or circulated in the borough seven days at least before the day of meeting."

MR. CHILD said, he did not think seven days' notice sufficient, and would beg to propose ten days.

MR. BAINES said, he would adopt the suggestion.

Clauses agreed to, as were also Clauses 5, 6 and 7.

Clause 8—

MR. BAINES said, that the churchwardens were empowered to call these meetings, and if they were merely dealing with parishes it would be all very well; but the Bill also applied to townships, where there were no churchwardens, and, as the matter was not at all of an ecclesiastical character, he thought it would be a great deal better that the overseers of the poor should be the persons to convene these meetings.

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON said, that in some districts in Ireland there were no overseers of the poor, although it was proposed that the Bill should be extended to that country.

MR. BAINES said, he would undertake to introduce, on a future occasion, an interpretation clause which would meet any such exceptional case as that to which the noble Lord had referred.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he wished to know whether more than one vote was to be given to the larger class of ratepayers?

MR. EWART said, he intended that each ratepayer should have only one vote.

Clause, as amended, to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 15 to 18 agreed to.

Clause 19—

MR. HADFIELD said, he begged to move the omission from the clause of the words "with the approval of Her Majesty's Treasury." He did not wish to give to the Treasury the proposed right of interference in that matter.

MR. EWART said, that the words in question had been copied from a similar provision in the Model Lodging-Houses Act, and in other measures. He was no friend to centralisation, but he did not wish to depart in that instance from the beaten path.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 64; Noes 25: Majority 39.

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON said, he had voted in favour of requiring the sanction of the Treasury with regard to the purchase of land by the council and commissioners, because it did not seem to him right that the representatives of the present parishioners should alone have the power of imposing a permanent charge upon future parishioners; but in the case of the payment of rent from year to year, he did not see the necessity of any interference on the part of the Treasury, and thought the matter might be left to the inhabitants themselves.

MR. WILSON said, he apprehended the Committee was unaware of the importance of a clause of this kind. Supposing the town council to pass a vote for the purchase of land or for the payment of rent, and the law required the assent of the Treasury to give validity to that vote, the course taken would be for the Treasury, on any objection being taken to the vote, to return it to the town council for reconsideration. It might happen that in the meanwhile a new town council would have to be elected; this would afford an opportunity to the whole of the ratepayers at the election to express their opinion upon the subject. He thought this observation applied with as much force to the case of rent as to that of purchase.

LORD STANLEY said, that to the greater part of this clause he had no objection, but there was one part in it which required explanation. The clause enacted that the council and commissioners might, with the approval of the Treasury, appropriate any lands purchased for the purposes of the Act, "for the general benefit of the parish." Those words gave very large powers, and he should like to know to what extent those powers were intended to go.

MR. EWART said, he must admit that the words did give very extensive powers, and that only showed the importance of requiring the approval of the Treasury in those cases.

MR. WHITESIDE said, it also showed the impossibility of proceeding with a Bill of this kind without the aid of the Law Officers of the Crown.

MR. NAPIER said, the bill as it now stood would apply to Ireland as well as England, and yet there was no one to superintend its passing through the House on the part of Ireland. Such a measure as this ought not to be introduced, except on the responsibility of the Crown. No doubt, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Baines) was endeavouring to make the best of the Bill, but in the end he (Mr. Napier) could plainly see that, at least as far as regarded Ireland, they would not be able to work it, and that the Bill would go out of the Committee a worse measure than when it was brought into it.

MR. BAINES said, he assuredly could not agree in the last observation of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. He had no doubt that with regard to England it would come out of the Committee a very good Bill. Although he was in no way responsible for the measure, still he was desirous of contributing his efforts to make it a good one. But should it ultimately be found inapplicable to the case of Ireland, then the proper course would be to move that the Bill should only apply to England, and it would then be for the right hon. and learned Gentleman to bring in some other measure for Ireland.

MR. EWART said, that his idea always had been that there ought to be separate Bills for England and Ireland, and he had only been induced to extend the Bill to Ireland at the suggestion of some hon. gentlemen, who wished to see a law of the kind in operation in that country.

SIR WILLIAM SOMERVILLE said, that the Bill might be made applicable to Ireland so far as concerned the town councils, but when they came to deal with parishes, then the Bill must fail, because in Ireland the parochial system was not the same as in England. The parishes in Ireland were not the area of taxation. The Bill proposed to employ overseers, vestries, and churchwardens; but no gentleman who knew anything about Ireland would say that by such machinery the Bill would work well in that country. He would therefore strongly recommend his hon. Friend to confine the Bill solely to England.

MR. EWART said, he had no objection to confine the measure to England.

LORD STANLEY said, he objected to the power given by this clause to divert certain land from the purposes of charity to which it was applicable at present. He wanted to know under what restrictions it was intended to make that diversion.

MR. EWART said, it should be made subject to the approval of the Lords of the Treasury.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, he thought the best plan would be to adopt the suggestion of the noble Lord opposite and strike out so much of the clause as related to the appropriation of parochial lands. Perhaps the noble Lord would allow the clause to pass, on the understanding that the words should be struck out on bringing up the Report.

LORD STANLEY said, he would agree to that course.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he wished to suggest that, as they were going to create public bodies in connection with these libraries, such bodies should not be liable for any debts except those incurred under the Act.

MR. EWART said, he would consent to insert such a limitation, which, might be done by altering the 23rd clause.

Clauses agreed to; as were also Clauses 20 and 21.

MR. EWART said, he wished to move to insert in the clause the word "newspaper" after "books."

MR. SPOONER said, he objected to the insertion of the proposed word. It was monstrous that poor people residing out of towns should be taxed to enable the townspeople to enjoy the luxury of reading newspapers. More than that, he doubted whether their introduction would be beneficial to the libraries themselves, as it might have a tendency to convert them into mere newspaper reading-rooms and sedition shops.

MR. HEYWOOD said, he did not see any objection to a reasonable supply of good newspapers. Whether the word were inserted or not, he believed the libraries would be sure to have newspapers, as many people would take an opportunity of sending them when they contained any matter supporting their particular views.

MR. SPOONER said, he would beg to ask Mr. Speaker whether the introduction of the word was consistent with the title of the Bill.

MR. SPEAKER said, he considered that it was.

MR. SPOONER: Then I shall divide the Committee on it.

MR. T. PARKER hoped the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Ewart) would persist in his Motion.

MR. EWART said, he thought that newspapers were the natural index of the public mind, and containing, as they did, information upon every topic concerning the country, they were sought after with great avidity. It would be impossible to exclude them altogether, and, if it were not, he doubted the policy of such a proceeding; for he believed that persons who read them were very often induced to seek for further information on particular subjects in books; he, therefore, thought it highly important to introduce a good class of newspapers into libraries.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he believed that nothing would be more likely to induce persons to go to the libraries than the introduction of first-class newspapers. He was surprised at the boldness of the assertion of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire that places where papers were taken in were sedition shops.

MR. SPOONER said, he must deny that he said they were sedition shops. He said it would have a tendency to render the libraries liable to be converted into sedition shops. He did not intend his observation to apply to the respectable portion of the newspaper press, but in almost all large provincial towns there existed a class of papers which ought to be prosecuted by the Attorney General. As he said before, he was sure it would end in giving the townspeople the luxury of newspapers at the expense of the labouring classes residing in the country.

MR. WILKINSON said, the question of the admission of the particular newspapers might very well be left to the managers of the libraries.

LORD STANLEY said, he was at first inclined to concur in the objection of his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire, though not on the same ground. He thought the introduction of newspapers might raise a question analogous to church rates, and there would be great risk of introducing party feeling; but what overruled that objection was the fact that newspapers were sure to be sent to these libraries by persons who had an object to serve or opinions to advocate, and, whether the word were inserted or not, the management would have to exercise their discretion in the choice of newspapers.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he thought the principal objection was that the greater proportion of the liability would fall on large outlying agricultural districts, whose inhabitants would be unable to avail themselves of the facilities given by the libraries for obtaining information. As to newspapers, in his opinion it would be most unfair that newspaper-rooms should be established at the expense of the agricultural districts. They could not be sent round like books, and if they could the result would be, that persons in the country would have the Times lent them when it was about a fortnight old. If the whole district was to be taxed, the money ought to be applied to those purposes only which would benefit the district as well as the town.

MR. EWART said, he did not see why newspapers could not be read by persons living in the districts as well as in the towns; neither, in his opinion, would the introduction of newspapers into libraries necessarily convert them into mere news-rooms.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that the hon. member for Dumfries had always asserted that the main object of the Bill was not the establishment of newspaper reading-rooms, and, although he (Mr. Whiteside) agreed in the opinion that some of the best things a man could read were to be found in the newspapers, he would remind the Committee that some of the very worst things, the most poisonous matter for contaminating the mind, had been disseminated through the same channel. The first-class newspapers of the metropolis undoubtedly contained a vast mass of the most useful information, but the Government were about to introduce a measure which might lead to the establishment of newspapers of quite a different stamp and quality, and he thought he was justified in expressing a doubt whether the real mental food would not be that furnished by the newspapers, to the exclusion of good food in well-selected books. He should vote against the Motion.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he did not consider the insertion of the word "newspaper" at all objectionable. The Bill sought to accomplish two great objects —first, to lead the labouring portion of the population from animal to intellectual pursuits, and, in the second place, to give them as much information as possible. However attractive general knowledge might be, nothing was so attractive as political knowledge, and if they shut out newspapers from libraries, they would deprive them of one of the principal attractions to be found in publichouses. Why should they deprive the labouring classes of the opportunity of acquiring political knowledge? It had been said that newspapers of an improper character might be admitted. That did not necessarily follow surely, for they might well trust the selection to the good sense of those who had the management of the libraries, and they ought not, because they anticipated a possible evil, to exclude a real good.

MR. BARROW said, he was of opinion that no answer had been given to the objections which had been raised. Political knowledge was contained in essays and magazines as well as in newspapers, and he was apprehensive their introduction into the proposed libraries would be a fruitful source of political dissension and disunion.

Mr. Ewart

Question put, "That the word 'news-papers' be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 64; Noes, 22; Majority, 42.

Word inserted.

SIR ERSKINE PERRY said, he wished to propose as an Amendment: "That all the Libraries to be established under this Act shall be Lending Libraries." He was strongly of opinion that the usefulness of the libraries would be greatly curtailed if they did not possess this quality.

MR. SPOONER said, he thought the only way of remedying the injustice proposed to be committed by the Bill, by taxing persons who could not avail themselves of the benefits of the libraries, would be by making all the institutions lending libraries.

LORD STANLEY said, he considered that it would be much better to leave the matter to the discretion of the managers; great inconvenience would result from lending out works of reference, and it would be exceedingly difficult to define by Act of Parliament what were works of reference, if it were thought desirable to except such works from the operation of the Act.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, he thought the best proof that the proposed libraries would be lending libraries was to be found in the fact that the words in the clause were precisely the same as in the existing Act, the libraries established under which had all become lending libraries.

MR. NAPIER said, that in most libraries there was a class of books which it would be most inconvenient to lend out.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 32; Noes, 49; Majority, 17.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 23—

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he wished to add the following words to the Clause:—"Provided always that no property so vested be liable for the repayment of any debt or encumbrance not incurred solely in the execution of the purposes of this Act."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he objected to the addition of the proposed words, which, he thought, would rather tend to defeat the object of the hon. Member. As the Bill now stood, the property vested would not be liable to be taken on account of any charge for which the general borough fund was liable.

Clause agreed to, as was also Clause 24.

Clause, "that the provisions of this Bill shall not extend to Ireland or Scotland," was brought up and agreed to.

MR. EWART moved the addition of the following Clause:—"No person shall be assessed or rated to any county, borough, parochial, or other local rates or cesses in respect of any land, houses, or buildings, or parts thereof respectively, belonging to any library or museum established under this Act, and occupied by it for the transaction of its business, and for carrying into effect its purposes."

MR. BAINES said, he thought it was an extremely objectionable practice to introduce exemptions of this kind. The proposed clause might also operate very unjustly. Taking as an instance the city of York, which contained twenty-four parishes, some of them of extremely small extent. If land for a library were taken in one of those small parishes, it would increase the burden cast upon the remaining landowners of that parish, while the benefit of the institution would be common to the whole twenty-four parishes.

MR. EWART said, he would not press his Motion.

MR. HENLEY said, he hoped the hon. Member for Dumfries would, on the Report being brought up, have no objection to a clause limiting the period wherein an unsuccessful application for the establishment of a library under this Act might be renewed, in order to prevent the continual agitation and perpetual bickerings upon this question.

MR. EWART said, if a clause were proposed providing that no new application should be made within a period of twelve months from a previous application, he should not object to it.

The House resumed.

JUDGMENTS EXECUTION, &c. BILL.

Order for Second Reading, read,
Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a Second Time."

MR. MACARTNEY said, he could not let the Bill be read a second time, without expressing his disapproval of hasty legislation of this kind by individuals. He thought that a measure of this kind should be introduced by the Government, and he would therefore move that the Bill should be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he considered that the Bill involved very important Amendments of the law, and it would be impossible in acceding to the second reading to do more than agree to the general principle of it. It was desirable that judgments obtained in one country of the United Kingdom should be enforced in another, and carried into effect in a prompt manner; but if the House, therefore, assented to the second reading of the Bill, they should assent only to it on the understanding that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee for examination. He approved of the general objects of the measure, and on the terms he had stated he was inclined to concur in the proposition for the second reading.

MR. NAPIER said, the hon. and learned Gentleman did not seem to be aware that a Bill similar to the present had been referred to a Select Committee last Session, and he had sat upon it, and now it was proposed to go through the same farce again—for farce it must be called—thus to have a Bill brought in Session after Session, to have the principle admitted, the details objected to, and the measure referred again and again to a Select Committee, without any result, the Government all the while attempting thus to usurp the character of law reformers, by approving of the principle of measures for the improvement of the law, the only objection being that they could not be or were not carried out. He did not believe that the principle of the present Bill could be carried out. It was proposed to make a judgment in England operate as a judgment in Ireland or Scotland, so that execution might be sued out upon it at once in all those countries. This was anomalous, and might prove most mischievous, unless means were taken to prevent it, which did not appear to be provided in the present Bill. The cases of practical inconvenience under the present law were rare, and hardly warranted so sweeping a change in the law. The Bill was in several respects repugnant to the late Irish Common Law Procedure Act, and these repeated changes in the law left it in a state of uncertainty, and consequently produced much discontent and dissatisfaction. It should be recollect that the law of judgments in Ireland was of peculiar importance with respect to their effect as charges on land, and the present Bill would introduce great confusion into the law on the subject. A Commission had lately been appointed to consolidate the Statute Law, which it had been proposed to extend to Ireland; and when he had been asked to become one of the Commissioners, he had said, what he now ventured to repeat, that it would be idle to attempt to consolidate the existing Statute Law and to continue to add to its confusion by passing new laws—increasing the anomalies which were already complained of. It was equally idle to allow private Members to introduce measures of such importance, which it was found impossible to pass; referring them to Select Committees, who discovered that they were impracticable, and then going through a repetition of the same proceedings in a subsequent Session. Bills on such important subjects should be prepared in a proper office, for the purpose of securing uniformity and consistency in our legislation, and ought, if approved of by the Government in principle, to be adopted by them and introduced and carried upon their responsibility. It was all very well to say that they approved of the principle, but not of the details. The whole value of such measures as the present lay in the details. The test of the principle was whether it was practicable, and could be carried out. And if the Government approved of the principle, and they deemed it practicable, they ought to undertake to carry it out. It was not very creditable to our legislation, and did not tend to elevate the character of that House, to go on in this way—approving of the principle of Bills, and never carrying them out. It tended to get the House a character for talking instead of doing; and looked like prating of law reform for the sake of trying to throw dust in the eyes of the people. As the Government did not appear disposed to adopt the Bill and carry it out, and as a Bill of a precisely similar character had been already referred to a Select Committee and found impracticable, he should oppose the repetition of the farce played last Session on the subject, and should, therefore, resist the second reading.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, as the Bill had been submitted to a Select Committee last Session and not adopted, he thought it best not to agree to the second reading.

Mr. Napier

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he felt the force of the objections that had been urged by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin, but when a Bill was proposed to be introduced by a private Member, the principle of which was admitted to be good, it was difficult to resist its introduction. If the Government did object to it, it would be said that, although they professed to be law reformers, they resisted a measure for the reform of the law. That they should enforce judgments in Ireland that were obtained in England no person could doubt, and that was the principle involved in the Bill before the House, but there were serious difficulties with regard to the details. The measure had already been before a Select Committee, and if sufficient labour had been bestowed on it he considered that many of the objections might have been removed; but as it had been submitted last year to a Select Committee, and, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin had said, they could not make anything more out of it, it would be useless to send it again to a Select Committee.

MR. WHITESIDE said, if the Government recognised the principle of the measure, it was their duty to introduce a measure that would be practicable. Great evils arose from crude legislation, even with the best intentions. The Incumbered Estates Court of Ireland Act had been passed, no doubt, with the best possible intentions; but the Court was worse than the Court of Chancery it had been intended to supersede. On the other hand, it was most bitterly to be complained of that a Government should allow useful and valuable measures—such, for instance, as the Landlord and Tenant Bill and Leasing Powers Bill of a previous Session—to drop, merely for want of any attention to them. It did not appear to him that the present Bill belonged to the former but to the latter class. There was no practical inconvenience in the law upon the subject; a judgment even in an inferior or foreign court was by the law of England and Ireland prima facie proof of a debt, and unless it was shown to have been irregularly obtained was conclusive as to the merits. Where, then, was the difficulty to be met? And if there was any, why did not the Government meet it?

MR. FRENCH said, he must complain that the Irish Members had to sit there till one o'clock every morning to prevent the hon. and learned Member for Ayr from running his Bill through Parliament in their absence.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that he had been requested by a great number of persons, his constituents and others, in Ireland, to oppose such a measure as the present, as likely to introduce great confusion into the law, and to prove very injurious to trade. When the Bill was brought in last Session the Lord Advocate of Scotland had vehemently objected to it on principle; and yet now the Attorney and Solicitor Generals for England approved of its principle.

MR. DUNLOP said, it was his conviction that the present state of the law should not be allowed to continue. The principle of a Bill which would enable a party, who had obtained a decree either in England, or Scotland, or Ireland, to enforce judgment out of the particular country where the decree was obtained, was of such practical value that all parties should endeavour to arrange the machinery by which effect would be given to such a valuable measure. He trusted the Government would allow the Bill to be read a second time.

MR. BAILLIE said, it might be that such a measure would be practicable with reference to England and Ireland, but it could hardly be so as to England or Ireland and Scotland, for the law of England and Ireland was substantially the same, whereas the law of England was essentially different from that of Scotland, and the carrying out of such a measure would really require an assimilation of the laws of the two countries.

MR. I. BUTT said, the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Dunlop) was mistaken in supposing that a judgment obtained in England could not be enforced in Ireland, or vice versa, without recommencing the original action. That was not so, for as his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Whiteside) had shown, there might be an action on the judgment, which would be prima facie conclusive, and in which the merits of the original suit could not be again inquired into; assuming that the judgment had been properly (that is regularly) obtained. He thought it might be possible to obtain the object of the Bill by establishing some Imperial Court analogous to the ancient Aula Regis, whose judgment should be of force anywhere in the Empire, but in no other way. There did not appear to be any real inconvenience in the present state of this law. At all events, if there were, a measure of such vital importance ought to be undertaken by the Government, more especially as upon this subject an impression existed in Ireland that there was in contemplation a plan for destroying her independent courts, and consolidating them with the English courts, and that this was the first step in the execution of that project. To show the practical evil of any such system, let him remind the House that by the law of England and of Ireland, if a trial would be inconvenient in one county, by reason of the witnesses being at a distance, the venue could be changed into another county; but under the system towards the establishment of which this Bill tended, a trial in an Irish cause might take place in England, to the great injury of the suitors. Any measure tending towards such a result was to be deprecated, and when he recollects that the late Lord Plunket, who had once entertained an idea of such a measure as the present, abandoned it from a conviction of its perilous and impracticable character, the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Craufurd) would excuse him if he recommended him not to attempt what Lord Plunket had failed to achieve.

VOL. CXXXVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. CRAUFURD, in reply, said, he was prepared to stand by the Bill in the shape in which it stood, subject to such emendations as might be made upon it by the better judgment of the House. He trusted that the course of proposing to shelve the Bill by referring it to a Select Committee would not be pursued, and that the House would consent to the second reading.

The House divided:—Ayes 18; Noes 89: Majority 71.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

THE CAVALRY IN THE EAST.

MR. BOUVERIE having brought up the Report on the Committee of Supply, on the question that it be received,

MR. PALK said, he rose to call the attention of the Government to the state of the cavalry in the East, and also to the nature of the reinforcements about to be sent there. In his opinion, no calamity had ever befallen the British army more serious than that which was experienced in the loss of the light cavalry at Balaklava. No doubt, an opportunity would be given to the public of forming an opinion as to the cause of that calamity; whether it arose from misconception of an order, or from inability, or from the order which was given being of such a nature that it was impossible to understand it, would, no doubt, be brought to light; but in the meantime he could not but lament that a force originally too small to be of any great assistance to the army to which it was attached had been, from various causes, reduced practically to almost a perfect nonentity. He found from a statement which he had in his possession that one cavalry regiment on the heights of Sebastopol, to complete its effective force, required no less than 283 privates and 403 horses, and he wished to urge upon the Government the inefficient nature of the reinforcements to be sent out. Those reinforcements consisted of young men who had not completed the usual drill which was considered necessary to enable them to perform their regimental duties, far less to engage the enemy in a foreign country. The horses required by the regiment to which he had referred were, he understood, to be sent out under the care of recruits; but in a long voyage like that which they would have to make, the care of old, experienced soldiers was peculiarly requisite. This regiment wanted twenty sergeants and forty corporals, and consequently from this want of non-commissioned officers it appeared that it would become necessary to raise men to that position who had not perfected their drill, and who had no experience in those various duties which a non-commissioned officer was called upon to perform, and he could state, from having served in the cavalry himself, that those duties were of great importance. That course must either be adopted, or non-commissioned officers must be taken from other regiments, the effect of which would be to weaken the reserve, and to destroy all esprit de corps. These were subjects well worthy of the attention of the Government, and it ought at the same time to be considered how long it took to make a cavalry soldier. The best authorities were agreed, that to make a cavalry soldier required at least eighteen months, although in a few cases—such as those of men who were accustomed to horses—he might perhaps be thoroughly drilled in one year. In his opinion, the whole system of recruiting for the cavalry was most injurious. It was well known that there was nothing old and well-drilled soldiers disliked so much as the riding-school and constant drilling and riding lessons; but at present the old soldiers were occupied in breaking horses for those regiments on service, and well-broken horses were placed in the hands of raw recruits. He knew nothing more irritating to an old trooper than to know that the animal which he had broken in was placed in the hands of a young recruit, who knew nothing of the management of a horse, and who perhaps would soon ruin it. As to the state of the cavalry force at home, he ventured to say, from the pressure upon it, that it was less fitted to go into action now than it was twelve months ago. These things must sooner or later force themselves on the ear of the Government, and there was a power to which they must succumb again, as they had succumbed before—the national voice. When the Government at home neglected the common means of ensuring success, then he thought it was fairly reasonable to censure them for neglect, and bring their conduct under the consideration of the House of Commons.

Order for Third Reading read.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to know whether the House had any assurance that none of these Exchequer bills in the course of the year would be converted into funded debt. He mentioned this, because in 1853 a portion of the Exchequer bill debt was turned from unfunded into funded debt, to the extent of about 1,500,000*l.* He asked, therefore, for an assurance that that process would not be resorted to again without coming to Parliament for the requisite authority.

MR. WILSON said, that the Motion now before the House had reference to the Exchequer bills at present floating, and the customary Bill for renewing those bills was that to which the assent of the House was now required. As the law now stood, it was impossible, without an Act of Parliament, to convert unfunded into funded debt, and he had therefore no difficulty in giving the hon. Baronet the assurance he required.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said,

that the process he referred to might be carried on without an Act of Parliament through the medium of the savings bank stock.

Bill read 3rd, and passed.

JUNIOR OFFICERS OF THE ARMY IN THE CRIMEA.

THE EARL OF ORKNEY rose to call the Attention of the House to the reported want of Aptitude for their Situations in the Junior Officers of Her Majesty's Service now on Duty in the Crimea. The noble Earl said that it was generally supposed that this country was at war with Russia; but every military person with whom he had the honour of conversing thought that the term was entirely misapplied, and that it should rather be stated that Russia was at war with this country. He conceived that to be at war with a country meant to carry on against it every species of destruction short of reverting to the practices of savages. The Government had not so carried on the war with Russia;—had they done so, it would not, as it had up to this moment, have been attended with such serious disasters. He had heard the memorable and prophetic warning of the late Duke of Wellington, who had said that this country should engage in no such thing as a little war. He (the Earl of Orkney) was afraid that this had not been sufficiently borne in mind, and that a little and diminutive war was being carried on, wholly inadequate to cope with the resources of so mighty a nation as Russia. He thought it most unwise to underrate an enemy, and he believed that it was the opinion of all military men, that Russia was a magnificent military nation, and that its troops were in a state of subordination little inferior to those of this country or of France. He wished to draw the attention of the House to another term that was in general use, and to be met with in every publication. All talked of an army; but all his military friends—of whom he had a great many—had come to the conclusion that this country had no army in the Crimea; that it never had one; and, until it had, he was afraid that the same disasters which had hitherto attended our troops would still continue. An army was composed of infantry, cavalry, artillery, waggon train, hospital staff, and various other branches; and he believed that three, if not four, of those elements were altogether wanting in what was called the English army. The nation had also been led to suppose that the present war could be carried on at an annual expenditure of 3,000,000*l.* or 4,000,000*l.*; but if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had asked for 7,000,000*l.* or 8,000,000*l.*, and expended most of it previously to last September and October, the war, in his (the Earl of Orkney's) opinion, would have assumed a very different aspect to what it presented at present. He was led to this conclusion by an event that had taken place during the war—he alluded to the Battle of Alma. There the troops had shown their gallantry, but nothing had resulted from it, for the Commander in Chief was so crippled by the want of an army that he could not follow up that victory. He was the last person to wish that the war should be unnecessarily prolonged, for all his sons were in the army, and many of his friends; seventeen or eighteen of them had been killed already, and many more wounded. He had been last night in the society of an officer who was with the Duke of Wellington at the siege of Badajoz. That great commander did not wait to go through the regular operations of a siege, but stormed the place before they could be carried out, and his reason was, that by making a sacrifice at that time, he should not be called upon to make a further sacrifice afterwards. He (the Earl of Orkney) believed that, in certain cases, sacrifices made at first proved humanity in the end. In addition to this delay before Sebastopol, certain places had been spared—Odessa, Anapa, and other towns had not been reduced, but were as flourishing as ever;—and this was another reason which induced him to say that the war had not been carried on efficiently. He believed that he was correct in stating that, in December, 1853, when it was found that the war could be no longer delayed, a meeting took place, which was attended by all the officers of the different departments; and, when the Commander in Chief was called upon to give an account of the number of troops he could furnish, he stated that his hands were so tied by want of material, that the requisite amount of troops could not be sent out. And that this was so was proved by the fact that the requisite number of troops had not been sent out. He thought also that the Government were to blame for not having sufficiently considered that the climate to which the troops were first sent was one of the most pestilential in the world, and every precaution ought to have been taken to guard the men against its effects. That this had not been done was seen in the fearful mortality that had taken place both among the officers and men. He now came to another subject, and that was the pay of the officers, which was miserably inadequate. There was no mercantile establishment in the City of London requiring confidential service, and the real work done by regimental officers in which those officers would not receive three or five times as much remuneration as they did in the army. They received, in fact, no pay, the British nation entirely forgot the services these officers rendered to their country, and the real state of the case was, that they served principally for honour and the society of the gentlemen with whom they associated. They had heard a great deal of the vast amount of talent required in Her Majesty's service; but he could show their Lordships that this was not to be attained in the present state of the service. He would merely instance the Sappers and Miners. All knew the scientific attainments required in that corps; but what took place at Chobham? Why, these men knew so little of actual service, that they staved off their wells with green wood. Surely, then, it was very hard to complain of the inaptitude of the subalterns of the British army, when the best men, from want of practical experience, did not know how to carry out these matters. He had been told by a friend who served in the campaigns in the Peninsula, that it was the practice for every soldier who was detached to perform a particular kind of duty, to carry away with him a small bit of wood from the camp, in order that next night, when he and his comrade were about to encamp, they might have some fuel to begin a fire with. It was by means such as this and the like expedients that troops were enabled to provide for their own comfort and well-being. The noble Earl then referred to certain defects in the arrangements of the camp, and in the state of the tents of the army in the East, which, he said, had produced great unhealthiness among the men, and caused a fearful mortality, one-half of which might, in his opinion, have been avoided. Alluding to the want of means of transport in the Crimea, he stated that our officers had had to wear the same clothing as they landed in until they were literally covered with vermin. These were some of the hardships to which English gentlemen were subjected, and to which they submitted without a grumble or a murmur; and yet they were now held forth to the public and the world as men who were wholly unfit for the duties assigned to them. While these officers cheerfully submitted to every sacrifice and denied themselves many a comfort for the good of their men, it was certainly very hard that such imputations should be cast upon them. He knew of officers, who, having been enabled to procure horses for themselves, allowed them to be employed, not for the benefit of their masters, but in slaving to draw necessaries for the use of the men belonging to their regiments. He was happy to say, that the officers of the British service looked first to the welfare of the men under them, and to their own interests afterwards. The discipline of our troops was as complete as it could well be; but if the men were to be told that their officers were unfit to command them, was that course calculated to maintain or to strengthen that discipline? During the political excitement which prevailed in 1833, attempts were made to seduce certain men of the Artillery corps from their duty by holding out to them offers of money and drink. One of the men having told the commanding officer of what was going on, that officer, being a judicious man, instead of making a noise about the matter, very coolly replied, "Oh, very well; take the money and whatever you can get, and make yourselves happy and comfortable." This had its proper effect upon the men, and these noble privates maintained their fidelity unshaken in spite of the temptations to which they were exposed. Those who were acquainted with the army knew that the most irksome and painful duty which the officers had to discharge was to inflict punishment upon their men, and the men themselves freely acknowledged that they were never punished by their officers excepting when they had richly deserved it. This, then, was the excellent feeling which now existed between the British soldier and his officer, and it was to be hoped that that feeling would long continue. The noble Earl was understood to conclude, by asking whether Her Majesty's Government had any objection to produce a return, showing the relative number of officers and men that had been admitted into the military and naval hospitals at Scutari and other places.

LORD PANMURE was not aware that the noble Earl had at all improved his address by asking for this return. That return might be difficult of preparation, and might not, therefore, be possibly produced for some time, but he could see no objection to laying such a return on the table. As regarded the object with which the noble Earl had addressed their Lordships' House, it appeared that from some quarter or another some slur had been thrown upon the character as well as upon the conduct of several officers of the British army engaged in the Crimea. He had not gathered from the noble Earl's speech the sources to which he referred for those attacks which had been made on subaltern officers, and he could only say that no report whatever had come home from Lord Raglan reflecting in any way on the conduct of those gentlemen; and he could not conceive what circumstances there could be which had given rise to the slightest suspicion in any man's mind that those officers had failed in any respect to discharge their duty to their Queen and to their country in the manner in which a British officer had ever been known to discharge that duty. He knew of no body of men who were more deserving of, and more entitled to, the thanks of their country than that body of officers to which the noble Earl had referred; and he had no hesitation, although he considered it to be most unnecessary, to bear his testimony, in his place in their Lordships' House, to the high character those officers had ever borne. He would not follow the noble Earl in his speech with reference to the origin, conduct, and issue of the British expedition. He did not think the discussion of the details of that subject either would advance the interests of the public service, or that it would be convenient for the operations of the army now making war in the East. He had never heard it doubted by anybody but the noble Earl that the junior officers in Her Majesty's service were qualified for the situations they held. He believed that the war would be prosecuted with as much vigour as could be shown in the prosecution of any war, and no endeavours would be spared to carry it to the conclusion which Her Majesty's Government had always had in view—namely, to the establishment of a satisfactory and honourable peace. Upon the present occasion he could only say again, that the charge which had been brought against the officers of the army of the East, to the effect that they had not shared in the hardships of the soldiers under their command, was totally unfounded; and if he were called upon to produce evidence in support of that assertion, he was sure he could not do better than refer to the lists of officers who fell sick, and who had been received into hospital. He should endeavour to procure for the noble Earl the return he had asked for, and he had no doubt that it would show that the officers had taken their full share of the dangers and hardships of the Crimean campaign.

House adjourned till To-morrow.

LONDON AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CHAPLIN, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that the opposition raised to the measure on a former occasion was based on the fact that a pledge formerly given by the shareholders, through the chairman of the company, had not been carried out. That pledge was, that the company would make the line between Yeovil and Exeter. An understanding was come to when the Bill was formerly under discussion, that he should take the opinion of the shareholders on the subject, and he had now to report the result of the meeting which had been held. A general meeting of the shareholders had accordingly been held, at which the directors and shareholders regretted, in the first place, that the pledge had been given; and, secondly, that it was out of their power to fulfil it. He would not attempt to justify what had taken place, but would endeavour to urge some circumstances in mitigation. When that pledge was given the company's stock stood at 90*l.*, but in November of the same year it fell to 74*l.*, and there has since been great fluctuations both in the price of stock and the dividends which the company was able to declare. The directors at the time would have signed a subscription deed to raise the money required, so confident did they feel in being able to redeem the pledge they gave; and they had since done all they could, but the shareholders had decided, by a great majority, that it was out of their power to construct the line in question. There was only one shareholder present who was favourable to the construction of the line in question, and the directors were unanimously of opinion that it would be in vain to endeavour to stimulate the proprietors to do more at present than was proposed by this Bill. The number of shareholders was about 4,000, giving 60,000 votes, and there was no certainty as to the result of any measure brought before the meetings of the company; and they were decidedly adverse to carrying out the original scheme, seeing that so great a change had taken place in the value of the shares. Not being able to do so in the present depressed state of railway property, he trusted the House would consent to the second reading of the Bill, the object of which was to regulate the share capital, to improve their internal regulations, and to carry out improvements at Salisbury and at the Nine Elms station for the accommodation of the public. He hoped the House would allow the Bill to go into Committee, particularly as the parties opposing had not expressed any wish to throw it out altogether.

MR. HILDYARD said, that he had never heard a speech which had filled him with more astonishment than that which had just been delivered. What had the South-Western Company done? A large district which had been struggling for years to obtain the advantages of railway accommodation could have succeeded two years ago by means of the Great Western and the Bristol and Exeter Companies, but for the conduct of the South-Western Company, who pledged themselves to carry into effect a better project, and that pledge was afterwards sanctioned by the unanimous vote of the shareholders. About ten days afterwards a party agitation was got up to induce the company not to redeem that pledge, and that agitation was successful. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) had pleaded the poverty of the company. Now, poverty was a bad excuse for dishonesty; but the company was not entitled to plead that it was in a bad position, for at their last meeting the chairman congratulated the shareholders upon a dividend of 5 per cent, thus placing the company, as he then stated, amongst the first companies in the kingdom. That dividend was made out, in a great measure, by the traffic not having been subtracted by the line which they defeated. The company was therefore in a position to redeem the pledge which had been given. Now, what course did the hon. Gentleman take at the meeting to which he had alluded? Did he say, "You have solemnly pledged yourselves to construct the line, and it is our duty as honest men to do so." No such thing. On the contrary, when asked for his advice, the hon. Gentleman declined to give it, and the result was a determination on the part of the shareholders to leave the matter in the hands of the directors, who were now sustaining the proprietary in their breach of faith. The pledge which had been given was on the records of the House, and the course which he (Mr. Hildyard) recommended the House to take was, to send the Bill to the Committee before whom the pledge was given, and he trusted that Committee would insert a clause binding the company to complete the fifty miles between Yeovil and Exeter, within five years, or, failing to do so, stop their dividends. The fifty miles could be completed for 700,000*l.*, and supposing that amount to remain wholly unproductive, the only effect would be to reduce the dividend from 5 per cent to 4*l. 11s. 6d.*, or only 8*s. 6d.* per share. He was sorry to say that the introduction of a clause into an Act of Parliament, fining the South-Western Company while their pledge remained unfulfilled, was the only way, he apprehended, in which it was possible to bind them, and he had no doubt by that means this line of railway, which involved important national interests, would be obtained, while the House of Commons would, at the same time, show that they were determined these great companies should not come to Parliament with professions on their lips without the most distant thoughts of realising them.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he considered the arguments of the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Chaplin) on behalf of the South Western Company amounted to this—that what they thought an advantageous bargain when the pledge was given they thought disadvantageous now. He would not enter into the question of what the loss would be. They ought to have considered that before they entered into an engagement with Parliament to construct the line. The House accepted that pledge; the company derived all the benefit they expected from it, and he held it to be a mockery and an insult to be told that, because their dividend would be lowered a half per cent, they were to be absolved from the promise they had given to the House. The speech of the hon. Member was like the speech of a Governor of one of the repudiating States of America, who, addressing the local Legislature, laid down in the strongest manner the importance of adhering to the principles of public honour, but went on to say that no one would think of applying those principles if the result was to be an increase of taxes. He approved the course suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Whitehaven, and he hoped a clause would be inserted in Committee compelling this company to redeem its pledge.

MR. BANKES, after presenting a petition against the Bill, said that both the House and the public had been insultingly treated by the company. The line, respecting which the pledge had been given, had received the sanction of the First Lord of the Admiralty, the Commander in Chief, and all parties interested in the defence of the kingdom, and it was a matter of great regret that it had not been constructed.

MR. HUTCHINGS said, he had not hesitated to tell the shareholders at the last meeting what he thought of their conduct. The directors asked the shareholders what course they should take. The only response was a resolution disrespectful to the House, and to prevent its being passed they agreed to have the question referred back to the board; but no one could doubt that if the board had recommended the shareholders to fulfil the pledge it would have been almost unanimously rejected.

MR. DEEDES said, that it was his intention to move, that in referring the Bill to the Committee of Selection, that the Committee be instructed to refer it to the original Committee to whom the pledge was given, who would be able to deal with it in the fairest manner.

Bill read 2°.

THE ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT— EXPLANATION.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to correct a mis-statement into which he found he had been misled on a former evening. He had said that the wrenches at present in use in the army for drawing balls from Minie rifles were ineffective, and that Mr. Westley Richards had some months ago made a statement to that effect to the authorities at the Ordnance Office, and had at the same time submitted to them a pattern for an effective wrench, but that advice and that pattern had been rejected. He had since found that that statement was not altogether correct, for Mr. Westley Richards had since called upon him, and had told him that he (Mr. Richards) had warned the Ordnance authorities upon the matter, not some months ago, but in the month of January; that after that warning Sir Thomas Hastings had communicated with the inspector of small arms at Birmingham, who had replied that the wrenches at present in use were perfectly effectual, and Mr. Westley Richards, not satisfied with that reply, had since laid before the Ordnance officers a pattern of what he believed was an effective wrench. Those were the correct facts of the case, and he (Mr. Newdegate) wished to state that he had before been misled as to the time when Mr. Westley Richards had first warned the officers of the Ordnance that the wrenches in use by the army were ineffective, and as to the fact of Mr. Westley Richards not having, until subsequently, tendered the pattern of an effective wrench. He (Mr. Newdegate) had been mistaken as to the time of these occurrences; he thanked the House for having permitted him to correct this statement, for he should regret to do an injustice by leaving this mis-statement of dates uncorrected.

MR. MONSELL said, that after the statement of the hon. Gentleman it was not, he believed, necessary for him to enter into any explanation upon that subject. He would only recall the former allegation of the hon. Gentleman, that the Ordnance department had been made acquainted ten months ago with the fact that the wrenches used in the army were ineffective.

MR. NEWDEGATE denied that he had ever assigned the period of these occurrences as ten months ago.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS AND UNIVERSITIES.

MR. HEYWOOD said, he would now beg to move, in accordance with the notice he had given for a Select Committee, to inquire into the best means of affording to the nation a full and equal participation in all the advantages, which are not necessarily of an ecclesiastical or spiritual character, in the public schools and Universities of England and Ireland. Five years ago Royal Commissions were issued to inquire into the condition of the Universities; but it was made a special condition that they were not to go into the question of the admission of dissenters to those seats of learning. That question was, therefore, little attended to by the Commissioners, and when the Bill for the Reform of the University of Oxford was brought in last year, it contained no provision for the admission of Dissenters to the benefits of the University, and when the House passed a clause allowing their admission to the University, no provision was made for their due and proper admission into colleges, but they were only allowed to establish halls for themselves. Now, Dissenters did not intend to establish separate halls, and they would not be satisfied until they were admitted to the privileges of the University on the same footing as members of the Church of England. In wording his notice of Motion he had used the precise words of Sir Robert Peel, when he discussed this question in 1834. There was then a debate on the subject of opening the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge to Dissenters, so far as allowing them to take lay degrees; and Sir Robert Peel said that it was more rational to grant to the dissenters a full and equal participation in all the advantages of the Universities, which were not necessarily of an ecclesiastical or spiritual character. In 1818, Lord Brougham, then a Member of the House of Commons, moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the education of the lower orders; and as the great public schools of Eton or Winchester had been originally intended as charities for the poor, he extended his inquiry into those schools, and had their statutes published. The publication of the evidence then given had been of great advantage to the boys, who had been made more comfortable, and considerable improvements had been effected in the schools. But the inquiry did not go further than the material wants of the school; his (Mr. Heywood's) inquiry was, however, intended to go to the question of considering the religious scruples of a great portion of the kingdom, with reference to education. Public opinion was now much more favourable to the advantages of the two ancient seats of learning being extended to a larger class of the community than it was in former times, and it, therefore, behoved the House to turn its attention to the subject. No doubt a great deal had been done by opening the outer gates of the University of Oxford to Dissenters; but as matters now stood, if a young man went into a college he must go to chapel, and by the Act of Uniformity, the whole service of the Church must be performed in all colleges in the universities, and in the schools of Eton, Westminster, and Winchester. It was to that point he wished more particularly to direct attention. The Report of the Royal Commissioners for Oxford stated that it was desirable that the services in the colleges should be shorter. Now he (Mr. Heywood) thought that there could not be a better form of prayer for the use of the chapels than one similar to that which was used in that House. It occupied a short time, and no one was tired of it, and he thought that the students at the Universities should also have a short form of prayers. But to adopt such a service involved an alteration in the Act of Uniformity. Again, when a person in the University obtained a fellowship, he was obliged to sign a test under the Act of Uniformity, which was intended originally to keep the Puritans out of the fellowships, and which ought now to be abolished. With regard to the provisions of the Oxford University Reform Bill, and the powers of the Commissioners under it, although it might be supposed that they had powers to go into that question, yet as the subject was not discussed when the Bill was before the House, it was not likely that they would go into it. There were many oaths taken on entering colleges which were far from being strictly true, and which they could hardly expect colleges to undertake to reform. For instance, at Trinity College, Cambridge, the college of which he was a member, every fellow had to take an oath that he would make theology the end of his studies, and at the end of seven years, either take holy orders or leave the college, yet several right hon. Gentlemen in that House had taken this oath, and studied the law and other professions. One of the most distinguished of them, the right hon Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Macaulay) had for many years held a fellowship in that college. This was one of those religious matters which ought to come under the cognisance of a Committee of the House. The nature of the instruction afforded at the Universities would also require much consideration. He was much struck with the evidence given by the hon. Member for Kidderminster (Mr. Lowe) as to the practical result of an Oxford education in Australia. That hon. Gentleman expressed his regret at seeing in Australia young men who were totally unable to encounter the difficulties which presented themselves in that colony, and who had been educated at Oxford. Then, again, many serious mishaps which had occurred at Balaklava, London, and other places, connected with the war, would have been avoided if the education of young men in this country had been of a more practical and scientific nature. The result of the examination of candidates for commissions in the Indian army was exceedingly remarkable, and bore upon this point. From 1851 to 1854 both inclusive, 437 gentlemen were examined for commissions, and of these only sixty-six, or about one-sixth, were admitted. He did not see how the young men of the higher orders could be properly educated, unless the system of our public schools and Universities embraced a greater knowledge of science, as contra-distinguished to the present system of imparting mere classical knowledge. The Royal Commissioners of Oxford had recommended that a portion of the endowments of that University should be set apart for the promotion of scientific education. He did not think that we could take our proper position as a nation, until our education was of a more scientific character. He had heard that very few of Lord Raglan's staff were competent to write a French letter; and they were all, probably, educated at public schools where foreign languages were not properly or systematically taught. He thought that modern languages in the present day were of much more importance than the classics; whereas large prizes were given to students for excellence in writing Greek and Latin verses. There could hardly be a more useless manner of employing a young man's time in the nineteenth century, than in composing Greek or Latin verses, although the case was different when those languages were the common means of intercommunication between learned men of different nations. He believed that unless the House stirred itself, and took this matter into their consideration, nothing would be done in the way of improving this department of education; and he thought it was a question which might be referred to a Select Committee to consider what changes ought to be made in the system of education at our public schools. He believed it would be found of great use to the aristocracy and the higher classes, if our public schools were put on a better footing; and, believing that his Motion would promote that object, he left it with confidence in the hands of the House.

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the best means of affording to the Nation a full and equal participation in all the advantages, which are not necessarily of an ecclesiastical or spiritual character, in the Public Schools and Universities of England and Ireland, and of improving the educational system in those great seats of learning, with a view to enlarge their course of Instruction in conformity with the requirements of the public service."

MR. EWART, in seconding the Motion, said he had in view chiefly the improvement of the public schools in this country, which schools were in great need of an altered system. Dissenters ought to be no longer excluded. The time for abolishing all such exclusiveness had arrived, and surely if we had so far departed from the intentions of the founders as not to pray for the repose of the souls of the dead according to the Catholic religion, there could be no argument founded on consistency or principle for not admitting persons of all religious denominations. In supporting the Motion, he did so with a feeling of respect and goodwill towards our public schools, having passed many years in one of them himself. He believed that there was nothing in which greater alteration was required than in the system of our public schools; and to them in particular he would devote a few words, and especially to Eton, his hon. Friend having dealt principally with the Universities. There were two principles which he wished to see adopted—first, that our public schools should be open to persons of all religious denominations; and secondly, that the system of education pursued in them should be improved. The adoption of the first principle would not be more inconsistent with the wills of the founders than the making Protestants the recipients of the benefits of those foundations, whereas almost all the schools had been originally intended for the education of Roman Catholics. With regard to improving the intellectual education of public schools, all the authorities declared that some improvement was the one thing needful. Liebig, Sir Robert Kane, Sir James Stephen, and Dr. Lyon Playfair, all concurred in the opinion that it was necessary to extend the system of our schools in the direction of science and modern history and literature. There could be no doubt that modern languages ought to be systematically taught in our public schools, and till all these things were effected justice could never be done to the foundations, or to the education they were intended to promote. The education afforded at Eton had not varied in the last 150 years, and if you divided that period into three epochs, distinguished severally as those of Sir Robert Walpole, the Poet Gray, and Mr. Canning, it would be found that the same purely classical education prevailed in all of those epochs. He hoped that this Motion would be acceded to, or if it was not, that some course equivalent to what it proposed would be adopted, and that the foundations of Eton and other public schools would be thrown open to the whole community in the religious and educational sense. He was anxious to see the great schools of this country, such as Eton, really national establishments, or as the Dean of Ely had expressed it, not a magnificent cenotaph of learning, but a living monument for the cultivation of all the arts that adorn humanity.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that no one could deny that the subject to which his hon. Friend had drawn the attention of the House was one of the most interesting kind, and one which ought deeply to engage the attention of every Member of that Assembly. No one could overstate the value of the extension of education, or the expediency and desirableness of abolishing as far as possible all distinctions and differences of religious principle in the promotion of that object. But at the same time he must say, that the Motion of his hon. Friend did not hold out any prospect of any such result being obtained. Firstly, with regard to the Universities. His hon. Friend proposed the appointment of a Committee of that House to inquire into the condition of the Universities, and to suggest some method for equally diffusing the advantages of education amongst persons of different religious persuasions. Now, what was the present state of the Universities? There had been Commissions appointed to inquire into the condition of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge; the Commissioners had more ample powers than a Committee of that House would possess. Well, with regard to both those Universities, Reports had been made by these Commissions. With respect to Oxford, an Act of Parliament had been passed, after great discussion in both Houses, carrying into effect, to a certain extent, and so far as the conflicting opinions would permit, the recommendations of the Commissioners as to that University. Permanent Commissioners had been appointed who had full power to do many of the things which his hon. Friend had represented as still desirable to be done at Oxford. Then, with respect to Cambridge, a Report had also been made, and a Bill was in preparation which would be presented to the House, he trusted, this Session, for the purpose of applying mutatis mutandis to Cambridge, those improvements which had been carried into effect at Oxford. It seemed, under these circumstances, therefore, to him (Lord Palmerston) that to appoint a Committee of that House now to inquire into the condition of Oxford and Cambridge would be but a waste of time. The Commissioners, with simpler powers, had made those Reports, permanent Commissioners were appointed for Oxford, and will be for Cambridge, with powers, if the Universities should not make the alterations by themselves, to compel them to do so. He apprehended that, with regard to the points alluded to, as to the chapel service and so on, the authorities of the University themselves had power to carry out those recommendations. It therefore seemed to him, that the natural course for his hon. Friend, and those who agreed with him in thinking that neither the Commissioners nor the Legislature had gone far enough, or that their recommendations had not been sufficiently carried into execution, would be to see first, whether everything had been done which the Act passed last year for Oxford, and the Act now proposed for Cambridge, could accomplish; and then, if his hon. Friend should think that any further changes were necessary, the course would be for him to embody in a Bill the changes which he considered advisable for curing the defects he wishes to remove. The functions of a Select Committee would be to ascertain evils and propose remedies. Now, the hon. Gentleman did not want a Committee for the former purpose, since he himself had put his finger on the evils which he thought to exist; and he could propose the remedies, if he thought proper, in a Bill for that object. It was impossible to exaggerate the degree in which the national interest was involved in sweeping away, wherever that could be done with propriety, all restrictions on the diffusion of knowledge founded upon differences of religious opinion. How far it might be thought right to sweep away conditions which had been imposed by founders upon the bequests they made—how far that could be done consistently with justice and good faith—was a matter for Parliament to decide, and upon which he (Lord Palmerston) would pronounce no opinion, for it would depend on the particular circumstances of the case. But the hon. Gentleman must be aware that by the Act of last year, a hall might be established at Oxford, in which the subscriptions that were imposed in the colleges on persons dissenting from the Established Church would not apply; and if it were replied that no Dissenters had hitherto availed themselves of the power so bestowed on them, it was more, he considered, their own fault than the fault of the existing institutions—for the Dissenting interest was known to comprise a very wealthy as well as a very numerous class, and it would not be long, probably, before they found the means of availing themselves of the privileges which the Act of last Session conferred upon them. With regard to schools, there was no denying that the system which, for a great length of time, had prevailed in some of our schools was capable of very great improvement. It was perfectly true that until within a very recent period boys passed eight years of their life—a period during which, perhaps, the human mind is most susceptible of improvement—in learning two dead languages—languages which he (Lord Palmerston) would not attempt to disparage, as the instruments of studying the noblest compositions, perhaps, that ever emanated from the human mind. And, heaven forbid that the knowledge of those two languages should ever be left out of the education of men intended for a liberal position in life. That would be a great misfortune; it would narrow the minds of those men; it would deprive them of those high thoughts and noble sentiments which were derived from an acquaintance with the history and the literature of Greece and Rome; and nothing of practical knowledge would, in his opinion, be an equivalent for the loss they would sustain. But the boys who were so occupied in the exclusive study of those languages, were of two classes; those who had not a natural turn for it came away from school knowing very little, and their employment of six or eight years was very often thrown away entirely. Some boys, who do not like the study of the classics, have, perhaps, a turn for other things, and they ought not to be deprived of the opportunity of employing their time in those useful studies which are, perhaps, more congenial to the tempers of their minds. Let those who have a turn for Latin and Greek by all means avail themselves of the opportunity of making themselves the ornaments of society, by possessing those rich treasures to which the knowledge of the Greek and Latin languages is the key. But it should be remembered that it is impossible to crowd the mind with every kind of knowledge; and that if you attempt, during the six or eight years a boy is at school, to teach him not only Latin and Greek, but German, French, Italian, mathematics, natural philosophy, mechanics, chemistry, and such studies as fit men for different courses in life, you will only over-task the boy, and, in attempting to do too much, you will do next to nothing. It was a mistake also to suppose that the public schools had been quite indolent in that respect. His hon. Friend (Mr. Ewart) who seconded this Motion, having been educated at Eton, would, perhaps, not admit the school at which he (Lord Palmerston) was educated, namely, Harrow, to be entitled to the name of a public school; indeed, he remembered at one period there had been a rivalry between those two schools, which was once likely to prevent a cricket match between them. But he could assure the hon. Gentleman that at Harrow great improvements had taken place, that great attention was paid there to modern languages; and he (Lord Palmerston) happened to go there two or three years ago, and saw prizes awarded for compositions recited in German and in French. Now, undoubtedly, modern languages were what might be most usefully cultivated at school, and the acquisition of languages, as everybody knew, could be the more easily made, the younger the person was who endeavoured to attain them ; although with regard to more abstruse sciences, connected with mathematics and mechanics, it was different. He did not know how it might be at Eton and Westminster, but at Harrow, certainly the objects which his hon. Friend thought should be aimed at in public schools had been in a great degree accomplished ; and he apprehended that with regard to Eton, Winchester, and other public schools of that description, it rested entirely with the masters and the governors to determine that such improvements should be made ; and he hoped that the example of Harrow would be followed there, and that the success which had attended the great exertions of the present master of Harrow, in extending the range of information, would be attained at other schools. But he did not exactly see how a Committee of that House could have competence to deal with matters of this sort, or what authority they would have, supposing the members should settle in their own minds what improvements ought to be made, to enforce those improvements. It was quite true, as his hon. Friend said, that for all the general purposes of life, in the careers of men after they left school and college, the mere knowledge of Latin and Greek was infinitely below what was wanted to advance them to positions of honour and usefulness to the community and to render them useful members of society. But that instruction, which was to qualify them for their different professions, might be given at a later period than that when boys usually left school ; and there were all over the country a great number of schools, not public schools, but of a private and special character, in which everything of that kind might be taught. He believed that at Oxford and Cambridge, and certainly at Cambridge, a more extended and useful range of instruction had of late years been adopted. He (Lord Palmerston) happened to have passed three years of his own life in study at Edinburgh, and afterwards a few years at Cambridge ; and he was bound in frankness to say that any information which he might have acquired at Edinburgh was infinitely more useful and general than at Cambridge ; and that the two years which he spent at Cambridge he passed very much in forgetting what he had learned at Edinburgh. Since that time, he believed, the system at Cambridge had been very much improved, and that the range of information had been exceedingly enlarged. There could be no doubt, however, that the object which the hon. Gentleman had inculcated was one of very great importance, and that the instruction given in those great institutions, which professed to qualify a man for public life, should not be confined to attainments in one or two branches of study, but should afford the means of learning that which might be most useful to them, whatever career they should adopt. Agreeing fully, therefore, with the general principle of his hon. Friend's speech, he did not think the Motion was likely to tend to that practical result at which his hon. Friend was aiming. If the hon. Gentleman thought there was a good deal to be done which had not been done with regard to the Universities, he would do well to embody in a Bill those provisions which he thought requisite to amend the present system ; and with regard to the public schools, he (Lord Palmerston) did really think that a Committee would fall very far short of the objects intended, as it could not be invested with the powers that were necessary to enforce the improvement of these institutions.

MR. PACKE said, that the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Ewart) was himself an illustration of the good effects of a public school education. The most distinguished ornaments of either House of Parliament, and the principal Members of nearly every Government, had, with few exceptions, been educated at public schools, and that fact alone was, in his opinion, the best answer which could be given to the Motion before the House. With regard to modern languages, it was true that some years ago little or no attention was paid to them, but at the present day the study of them was encouraged, and at Eton a prize established by His Royal Highness Prince Albert was given annually for proficiency in French and German.

MR. MIALL said, that he did not know what the noble Lord at the head of the Government meant by the term of "sufficient liberality," but it was probable that what might be sufficient for him and for the Government would not be sufficient for that House and the country. The party with whom the noble Lord was connected had never been very liberal towards Dissenters, or on ecclesiastical questions, except in speech. After the determination of the noble Lord to resist this Committee, he (Mr. Miall) hardly knew upon which side of the House he ought to sit; indeed, a very moderate advance upon the concessions offered by the Ministerial side to the friends of religious liberty would be enough to tempt them over to the Opposition side in a body. If the Universities and public schools were national institutions, they ought to be productive of benefit to the whole nation, without any distinction or restrictions as to the different religious denominations. Last Session the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) said that if the Universities were national institutions, they were such in the sense in which parochial benefices might be regarded as national institutions. He (Mr. Miall) would accept that analogy; but parochial benefices were held to exist not for the advantage of one sect, but of all; and to make the analogy complete, the church doors on Sunday should be closed against all who were not in the communion of the Church of England, as the Universities were under very considerable restrictions in dispensing the advantages they had to confer. The State had a right to define what duties should be performed in cases where certain resources were set apart by the founders for specific purposes. He did not wish to argue the question as a Dissenters' question, but as a public question; and as those schools and Universities were known to labour under great restrictions, it was but fair and reasonable that there should be an inquiry, in order that their advantages might be extended to all, while the peculiar ecclesiastical constitutions of the corporations were not interfered with. He would vote for the Motion, and hoped that all those who had voted last year for abolishing religious distinctions in the Universities would follow his example on this occasion.

MR. HEYWOOD, in reply, said, that he did not see any likelihood of the objects that he sought being accomplished by any measure that had yet been passed, or that was yet announced to be brought forward. Certainly, the proposition which had been made by the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston), that he (Mr. Heywood) should bring in a Bill to amend the Act of Uniformity, and to provide some service in the college chapels instead of the present full service of the Church of England, was one which he should be happy to accede to, but that he felt it to be a serious responsibility for an individual Member, and he should much prefer to have had the assistance of some other Members who might have conferred with him as to the best course to be adopted, and as to whether it would not be preferable to move an Address to the Crown for a Commission. But as the suggestion had been made, he was willing to accept it, and bring in a Bill; he would, therefore, not put the House to the trouble of dividing.

WAGES (HOSEIERY).

SIR HENRY HALFORD said, he rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to restrain stoppages of wages in the hosiery manufacture. He had in the course of the evening presented six petitions against that grievance from the counties of Derby, Leicester, and Nottingham. A Bill upon the same subject was introduced last Session; it was read a second time, and referred to a Select Committee, with the consent of the noble Lord now the Head of the Government, who did not commit himself to the principle of the Bill, but who thought, as great numbers of people were under the impression that they suffered a grievance and an injustice, they were entitled to an inquiry. The inquiry was protracted during the Session, but the hosiery manufacture was not even approached by that Committee. He presumed, if he obtained leave to introduce the Bill, that the subject would be referred to a Select Committee, and all he desired was a Committee of unprejudiced men who would take the matter at once under their consideration. The inquiry need not consume any great length of time, for ample materials were before the House in the Report of the Commission appointed ten years ago to inquire into the subject. The petitions that had been presented were signed by between 37,000 and 38,000 persons, a great majority of whom supported the Bill which he now desired to introduce, which was literally the same Bill as the one of last Session. The people complained of their low earnings and extremely depressed condition, occasioned by the extravagant stoppages made from their wages by their employers, and by the middlemen between their employers and themselves. They stated that these stoppages were arbitrary, uncertain, and excessive—that they were governed by no rule, that they differed in amount at different times and in different places; and that they were entirely irrespective of the material delivered, since the full stoppage, for rent of the frame, sometimes had to be paid when materials were delivered, perhaps, for half work, or for a small proportion only; that the powers of stopping wages were unlimited, and were used as means of competition among the masters, having the effect of depressing wages throughout the trade, the least scrupulous of the employers underselling others, and compelling a general reduction of wages. They stated that the amount of these reductions was from 40 to 100 per cent on the value of the frames upon which they were levied; and that, by opening a source of gain not proportioned to the work required, but to the number of frames employed, it became the interest of the employers to collect the greatest possible number of workmen without reference to what they wanted; that the employers thus took advantage of the distress of parents and of the helplessness of young persons, to collect numbers together, not in well-regulated factories under proper control and superintendence, but in the shops of the middlemen, with no discipline and no care of morals or health. In some parts of the manufacture, this opportunity of making unfair profits prevented the most economical mode of working in large establishments under due superintendence from being adopted, whilst in other branches of the manufacture, which were suited to the domestic condition, it substituted the middlemen's shops for the wholesome mode of working in the house. They stated the good effects that would result from the Bill of last year, in relieving the framework knitters from the dependant condition in which they were, and in placing the instruments of their trade within their reach, wherever they could be obtained by hire or purchase, at the fair market price. These representations were not made only by the workmen, but last Session some petitions were presented, setting forth the same view, from some of the principal masters. The case had been pleaded at the provincial Courts on different occasions, and, at the suggestion of the Commissioners, they made an appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench, to decide whether this practice, being in fact a payment of wages otherwise than in money, did not come within the prohibitions of the Truck Act. The case was argued before Lord Denman, whose judgment, unfortunately, was not favourable to the workmen. It appeared that the facts were very imperfectly laid before his Lordship, so that he was under a mistake as to the nature of the practice. The simple object of this Bill was to bring these stoppages of wages within the provisions of the Truck Act, and he was at a loss to understand the objections which could be made to it. He was aware that there were those who advocated non-interference between workmen and masters, but he hoped the House would not countenance this doctrine of laissez faire, laissez aller, in the present instance. He maintained that this was a proper case for legislation, and he trusted the House would allow the full inquiry he wished for, in order that, after the long period of misery to which those workmen had been subjected, they might, at least, have the satisfaction of knowing that their grievances were attended to, and would, if practicable, be redressed. He begged, therefore, to move for leave to bring in a Bill to restrain stoppages from wages in the hosiery manufacture.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that having opposed the Bill of last Session, he felt bound to offer his opposition to the present Motion. The object of the hon. Baronet appeared to be to obtain an inquiry into this subject, in order to ascertain whether any legislation upon it was necessary, and, if necessary, what that legislation should be. Now, he (Sir George Grey) thought the House were not in possession of sufficient information upon the matter to enable them to accede to the Motion of the hon. Baronet, and it would, therefore, be better to institute an inquiry first. At the same time, he doubted whether the principle involved in the question was one which the House ought to affirm or not. He gave the hon. Baronet credit for the most benevolent intentions in the course which he had pursued, but he must repeat what he had stated upon a former occasion, that he believed it would be altogether impracticable to attain the object attempted to be carried out by this Bill. The remedy proposed by the hon. Baronet for the grievance of which he complained was a remedy for a grievance which was altogether illusory, and the House ought not to encourage what they knew to be a delusion. He (Sir George Grey) understood that the Bill now sought to be introduced was similar to that which was dealt with by the House last year, and that the hon. Baronet now proposed to regulate, by Act of Parliament, the rents to be paid for certain frames. He (Sir George Grey) thought it impossible to establish such a regulation by Act of Parliament; but if the House thought that a further inquiry was necessary into the condition of the people interested in this question, and who complained of a great grievance pressing upon them, he had no objection to the institution of such an inquiry, though he could not himself see any necessity for it. He had, however, no objection to an inquiry, because the House last year, he would not say, affirmed the principle of the Bill, but read it a second time, with the avowed object of sending it to a Committee to take evidence and inquire into the facts of the case. The Committee who sat upon this subject, and also upon the Truck Bill last Session, made, at the end of the Session, as he had anticipated, no Report, but recommended that they should be reappointed this Session, in order that they might be enabled to proceed further with the inquiry. If the House thought fit to reappoint the Committee he would not object to their reappointment, because he certainly thought that that course ought to be adopted before leave was given for the introduction of the Bill of the hon. Baronet.

MR. PACKE said, he was somewhat surprised and exceedingly sorry to hear that the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary, on the part of the Government, was prepared to resist the introduction of this Bill. The right hon. Baronet had declared it was a measure "altogether illusory," but that was surely begging the whole question, for the Committee which had been appointed last Session to consider that question had not been able to arrive at it, and it was scarcely to be affirmed that the measure was illusory before its character had been really inquired into. If the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Craufurd) had been in earnest as to the desire for an inquiry, he would have proposed the reappointment of the Committee before the reintroduction of the Bill, which, however, it should be observed, affected only the hosiery trade. It appeared that a particular class of the community were suffering grievous wrong—it was a maxim of the constitution that wherever there was a wrong there was a remedy—and it was to be expected that the House should at least attempt to provide a remedy. It was all very well to talk of theories of political economy, and to use phrases of "labour" and "capital," and "supply and demand," and so forth; but the plain simple fact was, that capitalists were too powerful for the artisans, and that the latter must accept their terms or starve. The master manufacturers charged 2s. a week for frames, worth hardly 5l.—about 100 per cent, and if the poor artisan happened to obtain possession of a frame he was denied employment. This was a grievous injury to a large class of workmen in the midland counties, and for that wrong there ought to be a remedy. It was not just to refuse to permit a Bill to be brought in for that object, or to throw it over until a Committee had sat on the subject, which would be postponing it sine die. The measure ought, at least, to be allowed to be brought in, and he should certainly vote for it.

MR. WILKINSON said, he thought it would be cruel to hold out to parties in distress that by means, such as this Bill contemplated, their condition could be bettered, or that it was in the power of the House of Commons to remedy such grievances as these men complained of. The measure would be a delusion. The men should be told at once that theirs was a bad trade, and that they had better leave it.

SIR JOSHUA WALMSLEY said, he must express his surprise at that which had fallen from the hon. Member for Lambeth. That hon. Gentleman had been pleased to call this Bill a cruel measure, calculated to deceive the workmen, and subversive of all the true principles of trade. It had been acknowledged by almost every speaker that stocking weavers were in a most depressed and disastrous condition; that they had been so for years, and were almost without hope; that their wages were lower than those of the agricultural labourer, and that they were subject to heavy deductions. These men had for years prayed that House to consider if any and what measures could be adopted for their relief. They believed that by a Bill for the payment of wages in full, without deductions, they might have the opportunity of bargaining and reducing those charges which were deemed exorbitant. They had petitioned that House again and again that leave might be granted them to make known and explain their grievances, and to show that the remedies they proposed were just and reasonable, and they were now to be told that the Bill they prayed for was a cruel measure. It appeared to him that to refuse their prayers was indeed the cruelty which might be fairly complained of. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department had been pleased to make an assertion which he took leave to repudiate, namely, that the Bill was an attempt to regulate the rates of frame rents and charges. The right hon. Gentleman ought to have informed himself on the fact, and not have made such a representation to the House. So far from attempting to regulate the rates of frames, the workmen desired that they should form a question of bargain between employer and employed, and not by custom, as at present. Neither did the workmen attempt any dictation as to the rates of wages, or desire to do so. On the contrary, they were prepared to take even less wages than they now received, rather than submit to the charges at present levied. He had never hesitated to declare their anxious wish to sustain the rights of property, to pay for the frames they used; but they objected to have their wages reduced by deductions to which they were not a consenting party, and which were founded on what they believed to be an unjust principle. It was urged they would be in no better position were this Bill to become law; but those who used this argument should remember that the men had some experience in the matter, and ought to have credit for understanding their own interests. It would be a cruel mockery to refuse inquiry to the prayers of 60,000 people in such a state of suffering as had been described. It should also be remembered that hopes had been held out for inquiry. In a full House of 311 Members, a majority of sixty-one affirmed the same Bill last year; and it was sent to a Committee upstairs, but who had not time to examine into its merits. Surely the same course might be adopted now. He sincerely trusted, whatever might be the result of the Bill, they would not act so discourteous and offensive a part as to refuse the introduction of the Bill. All that was sought was a full, a searching inquiry. He believed such was as essential to the welfare and comfort of the manufacturers as to the workmen. Many of the manufacturers were favourable to the principle of the Bill: some had long worked profitably under similar regulations, and, he believed, that in a few years there would not be a manufacturer who would not rejoice in the passing of this Bill, as, he believed, they would all do on seeing their workmen happy and contented.

MR. BOOKER said, that no doubt there were cases in which such abuses existed with respect to the relation between capital and labour as to render the interference of the Legislature necessary, and he hoped, therefore, that the House would not act upon the expressed wish of the Government, and prevent the introduction of this Bill, the only object of which was to place the artisans in the hosiery trade on the same footing as workmen in other trades. It had in former years been considered by Parliament that there were cases in which "capital" proved too strong for "labour," and this was one of them. Abuses had arisen which it was necessary to put a stop to, and he trusted the House would not refuse to entertain a measure brought in for that object. He had served upon the Committee which was appointed to consider this subject last year, and he regarded the suggestion that the Bill should be referred to that Committee as a mere attempt to get rid of the measure altogether. He had entered the Committee-room with very strong preconceived opinions in common with one-half of the Committee; the remainder of the Committee entertained equally strong preconceived opinions on the other side; and he believed that the evidence given before them only tended to confirm the original opinions of both parties. The Committee agreed to no Report, but they simply adopted a Resolution recommending the reappointment of a Committee to consider the subject during the ensuing Session. He hoped that, if a Committee were reappointed to consider the Truck Acts, it would be an entirely new Committee, composed of persons who had not formed any opinion on the subject. It was true that a great deal of evidence was adduced before the Committee of last year to show the advantage which had been derived by the population of England, Scotland, and Wales from the working of the Truck Acts; but, on the other hand, many individuals were brought forward, including shopkeepers and persons engaged in manufactures, who condemned the operation of those Acts. That Committee failed, however, to come to any determination, and he therefore thought it desirable that a new Committee should be appointed to ascertain whether the truck system was or was not beneficial to the working classes.

Sir J. Walmsley

MR. GARDNER said, he considered that if it was not the intention of the promoters of this Bill to raise wages by Act of Parliament, any agitation on such a subject could only have the effect of bringing that House into contempt and odium with the people, by leading them to suppose that the House had the power but not the will to afford them relief. His hon. Friend (Mr. Booker) had said that the investigation before the Committee had not altered his views on this subject. He (Mr. Gardner) had been a Member of that Committee, and he must say their inquiries had produced an effect upon his mind. After hearing the evidence given before the Committee, any doubts he had entertained with respect to the truck system were completely removed, and if the truck question was brought forward again he would oppose any imprudent and injudicious legislation upon such a system.

MR. W. J. FOX said, he thought his hon. Friend who last spoke had misrepresented the object of this Bill when he had called it a measure for raising wages by Act of Parliament, for it was not a Bill for raising wages, but for enforcing the honest payment of wages. The principle of the Bill seemed to him (Mr. Fox) to be most simple and unobjectionable, and whatever inquiry might be needful could surely only be necessary with regard to matters of detail, and not with respect to the principle of the measure. What an employer undertook to pay the operative he should pay according to contract. When the work upon which the operative was engaged was brought to the employer, whether that work was produced by a machine belonging to the labourer himself, or by a hired machine, or by a borrowed machine, or by a machine obtained in any other way, the business of the employer was to remunerate the employed for the work which he had completed. As to the master's stopping the wages of the operative, in order to provide for the punctual payment of the person whose machine the operative might have hired, it appeared to him that a master had no more right to interfere in such a case than for the payment of the rent of the labourer's cottage, or of the tradesman from whom he obtained provisions. The hire of the machine was a debt, to be treated like all other debts. The House of Commons ought not to expose the labourer to the inconvenience and injury of allowing his master to withdraw, in an arbitrary manner, a portion of his wages to pay for the machine he had hired. He supported the Bill on the simple principle upon which it was based—that "the labourer is worthy of his hire." Let the master pay the operative his hire, and let the operative expend it as he pleased.

MR. BIGGS said, that as one deeply interested in the question, he would not oppose the introduction of the Bill, though he did not believe any good would result from such legislation. He considered that the measure of the hon. Baronet would, by a series of vexatious enactments, so complicate the relations of labour and capital in the midland counties, and diminish the profits of manufacturers, as to lead to the withdrawal of capital from the trade, and its application to other objects. The Bill proceeded on the assumption that considerable distress existed among the operatives engaged in the hosiery trade in the midland counties, and that such distress was caused by the cupidity of the manufacturers, who exacted undue rents and made unfair charges upon their work-people. But could they reduce those rents and charges without reducing also the rate of wages? If they could, the House might, perhaps, be justified in interfering on the score of common humanity; but what was the fact? The hosiery business was carried on in the midland counties, where it had been established a century and a half, and employed about 50,000 hands. The custom of charges against which this Bill was levelled had existed since the establishment of the manufacture, and had no influence whatever upon the prevailing distress, which had arisen from a combination of causes, one of the main causes of such distress being the introduction of improved machinery. The trade was in a transition state, and there had been a great pressure on the whole system. There were now 50,000 frames in the midland counties, 10,000 of them being new and improved frames, by which a woman or a strong boy or girl could produce six stockings in the time it would have taken a man to make one stocking by an old frame. It was impossible for the English manufacturers to compete with the Saxons without making continual improvements in machinery, and exercising their skill in the most judicious manner. The depression of this class of workmen had been going on for the last thirty or forty years, and the great reason of it was the continual growth of improved machinery. Any attempt at legislation on the subject would only hold forth delusive hopes to those poor men, who complained of the hardships which they endured without having any adequate knowledge of their causes. The Bill of the hon. Baronet opposite was levelled at two things—at the taking of rents for the frames, and at certain charges to which the workmen were liable. Now, this was a trade carried on in numerous villages and in the cottages of the workers. The frames were generally, though not always, the property of the manufacturers; and if they abolished this rent, they might, on the same principle, abolish the rent taken for cottages, or even for farms. It was said no rent was charged for the ploughs, the shovels, and other instruments used in the labours of a farm. No; but rent was taken for the farms; and he contended that these frames were the farms of the stocking manufacturers. Capital was invested in this kind of property with the intention of receiving interest or rent from it. He warned them that the effect of passing this Bill and taking away the rent or consideration given for the frames would be to reduce the wages of the workmen. As to the other charges to which workmen were liable, he was willing to admit that cases might have occurred where cupidity on the one hand, and dependence on the other, led to exaction; but that was no reason why legislation should be levelled against a whole class. He believed that, morally and intellectually, and for the social good they had done, the manufacturers in the midland counties might be compared with any order of men in the empire. The charges referred to were incurred on account of the soap, oil, water, light, &c., used by the individual workmen in weaving the raw material. One man took charge of, perhaps, twelve or twenty workmen, went to town, got the raw material for them, and provided the articles just mentioned, deducting the price of the latter from the wages of the workmen, before he went to the warehouse with their work. This was done by him much cheaper than they could do it for themselves, and it was a natural result of the trade being left to itself, and being carried on upon the cheapest and most economical system. The Bill, if it passed, would not get rid of this process, for the articles must be paid for either by the individual workman or by a middleman, who would provide

extent, and abandoned, it being found of no benefit either to the masters or the workmen. If this Bill should pass, it would be a dead letter, and as valueless a piece of legislation as ever had passed that House. The only remedy was for the operatives to transfer themselves to other employments that were more profitable, and if they could not do so, legislation of the kind now submitted to the House would not assist them.

MR. BARROW said, he should vote against the introduction of the Bill with a feeling of deep regret that the trade had fallen into such a state that no legislation could mend it. The Bill would cause an interference between masters and workmen, and could do no good. He could not believe that tradesmen who were driven out of the market by machinery would be benefited by it. If this Bill should pass, it would lead to the transfer of machines from the cottages of the workmen to large factories, and he was quite sure that those who were friendly to the workmen did not wish that they should be concentrated in large masses and exposed to the evils of strikes, which might follow from such an arrangement.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, it was not denied that abuses existed in this trade. The existence of these abuses was admitted fully by those most disposed to refuse all legislative attempt to remedy them. The legislation proposed by the Bill which it was sought to introduce was directed against the truck system, in an aggravated form, which had existed in the hosiery districts for many years, and been productive of very painful results to the operatives. The hon. Baronet who brought the subject forward had studied it for years, and all he asked was that he should be permitted to bring in the Bill—a permission granted last Session in a full House—for the purpose of having it considered in committee upstairs. It would be most inconsistent to refuse permission to introduce this Bill, for the Committee, part of whose duty it was to consider this Bill last Session, was so occupied by other business, that it never reached the subject of this Bill, and consequently had never performed the task assigned to it by the House. He hoped the House would not revoke a decision to which it had come last year. From his (Mr. Newdegate's) knowledge of the locality in which this truck system prevailed, he was prepared to assert that the grievances complained of had an existence, and could be dealt with without injury to the fair trader, and, he believed, with great advantage to the operatives.

SIR HENRY HALFORD, in reply, said he could not avoid expressing his surprise at the course that had been taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department. His surprise was the greater, because that course was different from the one which had been adopted last year by the noble Viscount now at the head of the Government. He could not reconcile it to his conscience to abandon the measure, and would divide the House upon it.

Motion made, and Question put, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to restrain Stoppages from Wages in the Hosiery Manufacture."

SIR C. NAPIER—NAVAL OPERATIONS IN THE BALTIC.

MR. MALINS said, the Motion of which he had given notice was one of very great importance, and consequently he felt considerable hesitation in being the organ of bringing it before the House. But, involving as it did considerations of importance to the public service, the honour of public servants, and the discretion of the Government, he did not feel himself at liberty to decline the request that had been made to him to bring the matter before the House. He trusted, therefore, that he should receive the kind indulgence of the House while he made a statement of facts as the foundation for the Motion he should have the honour to make. The House was well aware of the circumstances under which Sir Charles Napier was appointed to command the fleet in the Baltic rather more than a year ago. It was in the month of February, 1854, that the Government, having determined to equip and send out to the Baltic the finest fleet, as universally admitted, that had ever left the shores of Great Britain, proceeded to execute that task which became an imperative duty upon them, and to exercise the best of their powers of judgment in selecting for the command of that fleet the most distinguished officer that could be found in the Navy List. The Admiralty was at that time presided over by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham), and the present Prime Minister was at that period the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Upon the right hon. Member for Carlisle more particularly devolved the duty of selecting the commander of that fleet. The nation, knowing that this great fleet was about to quit these shores, looked with intense anxiety to the person who should be selected to command it, and they received, certainly with great approbation, the announcement that Sir Charles Napier had been selected to take that command. The Government of that day felt proud of their selection; they felt that they had completely to their own satisfaction, and, as they thought, to the satisfaction of the nation, fixed upon the man whose appointment would be hailed with universal joy; and the House would also remember, that the appointment was celebrated by that dinner at the Reform Club, to which, however, he should only advert for the particular purpose he had in view. The propriety of that dinner had been discussed in that House, and it was not his intention to renew that discussion on the present occasion; but he would not discharge his duty in bringing forward this Motion if he did not advert to it for, as he had just stated, a particular purpose. The dinner on that occasion was presided over by the noble Lord the present Prime Minister of England, and it was attended by the right hon. Member for Carlisle, then First Lord of the Admiralty. It was also attended by another Member of the Government, the Chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests, and by a great number of Members who sat on the Government side of the House. He would refer very shortly to one or two things that were said at that dinner, to show the satisfaction which Members of the Government expressed at the selection that had been made of Sir Charles Napier to command the fleet. He should trouble the House by reading one passage from the speech of the noble Lord the present Prime Minister, who said at the conclusion of his address—

"As bearing upon that point (that is, upon the fitness of Sir Charles Napier), I cannot refrain from repeating an observation made to me by a very discriminating and calculating friend of mine, who passed some portion of his time in the East at the period to which I have adverted, who saw a good deal of my gallant friend there, and who, when he came home, came to me to give me some account of what he had observed there. I mentioned my gallant friend to him, and praised his boldness, his intrepidity, his daring. My friend said, 'Yes, all that is very true; but there is another quality Sir Charles Napier possesses as valuable as any of those, and a most important ingredient in them. I never saw a man in my life who calculated so many moves beforehand as Sir Charles Napier.' Now, when a man calculates his moves beforehand, and has a spirit and genius to execute them, I think that the country which places its fortunes in his hands may well feel confident in his success."

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle then said—

"I shall not pretend to weigh the precise ingredients of valour my gallant friend was distinguished for, his remarkable daring and bravery; but even then, in that early part of his career, he verified the praise of the noble Lord. He looked several moves before him, and, in my judgment, he is not only a gallant, but I look upon him as a most discreet commander. He possesses my entire confidence, and I rejoice in having had the opportunity on this great occasion to command him to the choice of my Sovereign. The selection, I believe, is approved by the country—it is approved by the profession; and although the propelling power of the fleets may be changed, though naval tactics may be altered, as he goes forth the commander, not of a pressed body of men, but of volunteers in Her Majesty's service—though all these old plans may be changed, yet there is one thing that is unchanged, the gallantry and the power of command of my gallant friend. He does not go forth under the hypocritical pretence of conducting a religious war, but he goes forth to assert the independence of Europe—to resist, and I hope successfully to resist, the lawless spirit of aggression and aggrandisement which now threatens to disturb the general peace. My gallant friend says that when he gets into the Baltic he will declare war. I, as First Lord of the Admiralty, give him my free consent to do so. I hope that war will be short. It may be sharp, but I trust, with the spirit and energy that have ever guided my gallant friend, it will be decisive, and although politics are excluded generally from the naval profession, yet we, as Reformers, may be proud that the honour of the British flag in the Euxine and the Baltic is intrusted to two such champions as Admiral Dundas and Sir Charles Napier. They will prove true to their country in the last extremity, and I sincerely hope the time may not be far distant when you, perhaps, will kindly invite me again to celebrate the return of my gallant friend. This evening is an evening of happy augury. When we next meet I hope it will be to celebrate a brilliant success."

Could any man have believed that the gallant Admiral who on the 7th or 8th of March, 1854, was proclaimed to Europe as the fittest man to be found to sustain the honour of England, should, when he returned with that fleet, having received the approbation of the Government almost every day while he commanded it, be met by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle with contempt and contumely, and dismissed from his command, instead of being invited to meet the right hon. Gentleman to celebrate his success? He hoped the House would clearly understand that he did not bring forward this matter as a personal question that merely affected an Admiral, but as a question involving the honour of public servants generally. He trusted the House would agree with him in thinking that England could not insult her best public men and most valued servants with impunity, or without proclaiming to the world either that the Government was shortsighted in the selection of a man, or being foresighted, as they claimed the credit of being, it was an unworthy service to embark in when the man selected, having done his best and received praise, should be so treated at the end.

The appointment having been so inaugurated, the gallant Admiral hoisted his flag and proceeded to the Baltic. He (Mr. Malins) begged here to observe that he had experienced great difficulty while examining the documents which had been submitted for his inspection, being apprehensive lest in bringing them before the House he should refer to anything that would be calculated to impair the public service. In the midst of such a correspondence it was difficult to steer clear of such a difficulty, but he should endeavour as much as possible to avoid reading anything that might be considered a communication to the enemy or which contained anything detrimental to the public service. He found that the gallant Admiral having arrived in the Baltic, a correspondence, both public and private, took place. Letters were written by the Board of Admiralty to the gallant Admiral, and letters were also written to him by the First Lord of the Admiralty in his individual capacity, expressing to him the most marked and unequivocal admiration of his conduct from the day he sailed, down, at all events, to the month of September. The House would consider the difficulties with which the gallant Admiral had to contend; they would recollect that he quitted their shores with the most powerful fleet that England had ever sent forth, but with undisciplined men, who had not any experience of war, and had before him a navigation the most intricate which any part of the world presented. The House would see that the gallant Admiral in command of that fleet evaded those difficulties, preserved his fleet entire without disaster, and did all the Government had expected of him, and more; and instead of being treated in the manner he had been treated, the public service and the honour of the country required that he should be received with honour by his country and requited in a manner worthy of the position which he occupied. It would be necessary for him to refer to some letters that had been written by the

First Lord of the Admiralty in his individual capacity to the Admiral, and he was aware it might be said they were private letters. He had maturely considered the subject, and he was satisfied the House would not consider them as private letters. It could not be considered that letters written by one public officer to another in the public service, and calculated to influence the actions of that public officer to whom the letters were addressed, should be treated as private communications. Supposing, for instance, the First Lord of the Admiralty, in his individual capacity, had written to the commander of the fleet, requesting that he would not delay an attack on Cronstadt beyond the 1st of June—he (Mr. Malins) was only putting a case, such a thing did not occur—and suppose the Admiral, contrary to his judgment, resolved to make the attack, and failed, was he to be told that he should not be at liberty to produce in justification of his conduct a letter written by the First Lord of the Admiralty to him, which was calculated to influence his conduct, and which did in fact influence it? He could not think that any one would deny that proposition. However he had a precedent for reading these letters. A noble Lord on the other side of the House had proposed the appointment of a Committee, commonly known as the Stafford Committee, to inquire into the conduct of a gentleman on that (the Opposition) side of the House in the management of the dockyards and other matters. The question arose before that Committee whether letters written by the First Lord of the Admiralty in his individual capacity should be read before that Committee, and the Committee, which was presided over by the noble Lord the Member for Totness (Lord Seymour) resolved that all those private communications should be produced, and that no person examined before the Committee should be allowed to protect himself by saying that the letter he had received was a private letter, or that a communication which had taken place between himself and another public servant was a private communication. He thought the decision of a competent tribunal, that such communications were not private communications, was sufficient to justify him in the course he was about to pursue. He should now proceed to refer to the letters that had been addressed to Sir Charles Napier by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle;

but it was not his intention to place their contents in extenso before the House. He had made a selection of a few of the most important passages which bore on the general proposition which he meant to submit to the House. He had stated the circumstances under which Sir Charles Napier was appointed, he had referred to the favourable auspices under which he left these shores, and to the manner in which the operations in the Baltic were carried on, and he was now desirous of showing that those operations were conducted to the entire satisfaction of the Government; and for that purpose he would read a few passages from the letters of the right hon. Baronet. It would be remembered that Sir Charles left England in the middle of March. On the 10th of April he received the following letter from the right hon. Member for Carlisle—

"I am entirely satisfied with your proceedings. Neither Lord Clarendon nor I anticipated your movement inside the Belt, and believed that you would watch in the Cattegat, the entrance of the Sound and of the Belts until you received orders to enter the Baltic. You judged, however, wisely, and the time which you have gained has been very precious, and the passage of the Belt in fine weather and in safety has been a most successful exploit. You will also have been enabled to exercise your officers and men to great advantage, with the certainty that the enemy is in front of you, blocked up in ice for some time to come, and that your reinforcements will arrive, and that your discipline will be improved. When the state of the ice permits, I conclude that you will establish a close blockade of the Gulf of Finland, dividing the enemy's squadron at Cronstadt, and at Sweaborg, and intercepting the trade of Revel and Riga. I rely on your prudence in not knocking your head against stone walls prematurely, or without the certainty of a great success, or the fair prospect of attaining some most important object worthy of the risk and of the loss, which when you attack fortresses with ships are serious and inevitable."

All that prudent advice was given by the Admiralty during spring and summer, the fitting seasons to attack stone walls if they were to be attacked at all; but when winter came, with hurricanes and boisterous weather, they were very desirous that those stone walls should be attacked. On the 1st of May the right hon. Baronet again writes—

"I have received your letter of the 19th, of the entrance of the Gulf of Finland. I am glad that you decided not to proceed to Sweaborg. The weather is still broken, the channel is not clear of ice, and your force is not yet concentrated. A safe anchorage within the Gulf of Finland would seem to me your greatest and most pressing necessity. I had hoped that Port Baltic might be available for this purpose, but if it be commanded from the shore, or if for any other reason you reject it, still I trust that you will be enabled to establish and to hold a close blockade of the Gulf of Finland, and to cut off the communication by sea between Sweaborg and Cronstadt. Your force, I hope and think, will be large enough to render the escape of any Russian squadron from the Baltic impossible, and to leave us quite at ease in England, although we may have no large reserve ready on our own shores. It will be best in the first instance to feel your way, and to make good your hold in the Gulf of Finland. When I say this, I by no means contemplate an attack either on this or that place (mentioning two places). I have a great respect for stone walls, and have no fancy for running even screw line-of-battle ships against them. Because the public here may be impatient, you must not be rash; because they at a distance from danger are foolhardy, you must not risk the loss of a fleet in an impossible enterprise. I believe both to be all but impregnable from the sea, Sweaborg more especially; and none but a very large army could co-operate by land efficiently. If, then, you have no means except naval at your command you must pause long and consider well before you attempt any attack on the Russian squadrons in their strongholds, and I am afraid they are much too cautious to come out and meet you. Had you been weaker, they might have done so; now they will wait and watch an opportunity in the hope that you will seriously cripple your force by knocking your head against their forts, when they may take you at a serious disadvantage, and inflict a fatal blow. These considerations must not be overlooked by you. I recall them to your mind, lest in the eager desire to achieve a great exploit, and to satisfy the wild wishes of an impatient multitude at home, you should yield to some rash impulse, and fail in the discharge of one of the noblest of duties, which is the moral courage to do what you know to be right, at the risk of being accused of having done wrong. It is enough to present this view to your deliberate attention; you will reflect on it, and I am certain that your judgment will not err."

He (Mr. Malins) did not read those letters for the purpose of blaming the advice that had been given. On the contrary, he conceived it to be a sound advice to give, and a good advice for the Admiral to follow; but he complained that all that advice which was given at a certain period was departed from, and the Government thought fit to quarrel with the Admiral because, having adhered to this advice during the summer and a part of autumn, he did not think fit at their suggestion to depart from it when winter set in. On the 15th May, the right hon. Baronet writes as follows—

"If anything can be done, you will discover the best means of doing it; but no rash experiments must be tried which do not hold out a reasonable prospect of success. I am anxious to hear your opinion and intentions when you have looked at Sweaborg and entered the Gulf of Finland. I am afraid that the Russians will not pluck up courage and come out to meet you."

It was a subject of frequent reproach that the Russians avoided coming out and giving battle in the open sea. On the 20th of June, by which time the Government had some experience, the Admiral having gone out in March, the right hon. Baronet thus expressed his most unqualified approval of the gallant officer's proceedings—

"I am well pleased with all your operations; and the concentration of your force at the entrance of the Gulf of Finland, in a safe harbour where you can command fresh water, appears to me a judicious operation. I conclude that you will leave a squadron before Helsingfors sufficiently strong to prevent the escape of the Russian squadron skulking within the harbour, and proceed with the rest of the combined fleet to the neighbourhood of Cronstadt, which I am afraid you will find unassailable. If the Russian fleet will not come out to meet you, and if you find that you cannot reach them, after having well reconnoitred the works, and ascertained what it is possible and impossible to do, your return to the more open sea below Helsingfors would appear to be a judicious measure, every necessary precaution being taken to prevent the reunion of the Russian force now divided at Cronstadt and Helsingfors. I am well aware of all the difficulties of your position, and of the impossibility of triumphing over an enemy who will not fight you on fair terms; but you will discipline our fleet, and make our officers and men ready for any service. It is a disgrace to Russia that she dare not show a ship in her own waters, and that she is driven to seek for safety under the shelter of her fortresses. It would be madness to play her game, and to rush headlong on her granite walls, risking our naval superiority, with all the fatal consequences of defeat, in an unequal contest with wood against stone, which in the long run cannot succeed. I had reliance on your prudence, which was doubted. Your brilliant courage was proved long ago. You will now show to the world that you possess a combination of those great virtues which are necessary to make a consummate commander in chief."

On the 27th of June he again writes as follows—

"I am glad you have gone up to Cronstadt to see with your own eyes what it may be possible to do there. Whatever man can do I am certain will be done by you; and if you are restrained by a sense of duty from embarking in any desperate enterprise, on your return to Baro Sound you shall receive full instructions from me respecting an attack upon the Aland Islands."

Finally, on the 25th of August, the right hon. Gentleman wrote to say that he was more than satisfied with the gallant Admiral's proceedings, that he was delighted with the prudence and sound judgment he had evinced, and that it would have been a miserable want of firmness had he yielded to clamour, and risked his ships and sacrificed many valuable lives in an attempt to destroy by naval means, works which were certain to fall upon being attacked by land.

He added, that the gallant Admiral's reasoning in favour of the immediate and entire destruction of the forts at Bomarsund was irresistible, and hoped he would take care to destroy them so completely that not one stone should be left upon another. He concluded by observing, that he was well pleased with the promptitude with which Sir Charles had sent back the line-of-battle ships and steamers; that he gave the gallant Admiral the utmost credit for the work he had done; that he then wrote in haste, as the time pressed for the destruction of Bomarsund, but that in a few days he would write upon the subject of ulterior operations, and of the preparations which must be made for an early retreat from the Baltic before winter. Now he thought that correspondence distinctly showed that from the time Sir Charles Napier left England down to the end of August, he received through the right hon. Baronet the repeated and unqualified approbation of the Government. He would now proceed to see whether anything took place after that period to disentitle the gallant officer to the same unqualified approbation of the Government. On the 20th of June, the Admiral had been directed to make a Report upon the practicability of taking Sweaborg; and the Admiral himself, on the 20th of June, made a Report to the Government, inclosing another Report of Admiral Chada, agreeing with his own on the subject of such an attack. Both Admirals agreed as to the particular mode of taking the fortress, and they both agreed that if proper appliances were afforded them, and the attack were made at the proper season of the year, they should have no doubt whatever as to the success of the operation, but they both agreed that the attack must not be made later than the autumn. Now, after the fall of Bomarsund, namely, on the 4th of September, the French army sailed from the Baltic, and returned to France, but the French fleet remained there until the 19th of September. About the middle of that month Government were desirous of obtaining the opinions of the English and French Admirals as to the practicability of taking Sweaborg, and accordingly Sir Charles Napier was requested to hold a conference with the French Admiral, and to take into consideration what could be done. A plan for the purpose had been submitted to the Government by a distinguished engineering officer, namely, General Jones, and another plan by a distinguished French engineer, namely, General Niel, and the English and French Admirals were desired to hold a conference, and take those plans into consideration. Accordingly a consultation was held on board the Duke of Wellington, the Admiral's ship, on the 12th of September, which was attended by three English admirals, the French admiral, and the French vice-admiral; and having considered the plans, they agreed to a Report, which the House of course would not expect him to read; but they all unanimously agreed in this, that the season of the year was too late to admit of such an operation being justifiably undertaken. That Report was forwarded to the Admiralty by Sir Charles Napier, on the 12th of September; but soon after, the Admiralty, feeling some anxiety on the subject, again wrote to Sir Charles Napier, requesting that a second consultation might be held; and accordingly Sir Charles Napier again wrote to the French Admiral, requesting his attendance on board the Duke of Wellington to reconsider the details of the plans. The French Admiral, however, declined to attend. He stated that he had already given his opinion, and his mind was made up on the subject. This was on the 18th of September; on the 19th the French fleet returned to France, and now of course the position of Sir Charles Napier became very materially altered to what it had been in the middle of June, when he had the assistance of a powerful French army and a powerful French fleet. If Sir Charles Napier was strong enough to carry on any great operations with the English fleet alone, of course the presence of the French fleet and army in the Baltic was unnecessary. At that time no great operations had been performed, and up to the present moment they remained unperformed; although Bomarsund had been destroyed, neither Cronstadt nor Sweaborg had been taken: In order to conduct operations of such magnitude with success, it was necessary that they should be undertaken with the greatest naval and military force that could be assembled; if they could be undertaken with a combined fleet, they ought not to be undertaken with a single fleet. Sir Charles Napier being unable, from the reason he had stated, to comply with the instructions of the Admiralty with regard to a second conference, did that which he thought was the next best thing—namely, called a council of his own admirals. It was held on the 19th of September, on board the Duke of Wellington, and was attended by Sir Charles Napier and three other admirals, two of whom had been present at the previous conference, while the third, Admiral Byam Martin, had not. These officers again took into consideration the plans for attacking Sweaborg, and again came unanimously to the conclusion that the season of the year was too late to justify such an operation. In the meantime Sir Charles Napier had been directed to make a reconnaissance of Sweaborg, and, having done so, he sent home a detailed plan for an attack on that fortress, which, if adopted, the gallant Admiral felt no doubt would be successful, provided it was put in force at the proper time. That very plan was being adopted at this very moment, but it was to be carried out under the direction of another Admiral.

On the 25th of September, Sir Charles Napier, having been left only with the English fleet, communicated his plan of attack to the Admiralty; and now came the point of difference between him and the Admiralty. He had repeatedly read that report; although he could not read it in detail to the House, the Government knew its contents, and many hon. Members probably had seen or would see it, and he thought it impossible for any one to read it without seeing that Sir Charles Napier submitted to the Admiralty two distinct plans of attack, one of which was very uncertain of success, and the other was certain of success. But, with regard to both of these plans, Sir Charles Napier expressed his opinion that they were not practicable at that season of the year, when the weather could not be depended upon for two hours together, and when he did not know how many ships might be lost. That opinion was expressed on the 25th of September by Admiral Sir Charles Napier, who up to that very point of time had been regarded as a man of the greatest ability and a most consummate naval commander, and whose whole proceedings had to that time received the most unqualified praise. He (Mr. Malins) appealed to the House whether justice to a public servant did not require, when he was sent out on a mission of such importance, that confidence should be placed in him; and, whether, when those who were intrusted with the command of our fleets and armies expressed an opinion as to the practicability or impracticability of any particular undertaking, confidence should not be placed in their discretion. If such confidence were not reposed in them, then he submitted that to leave those commanders still in possession of authority, and not instantly to recall them, was conduct on the part of the Government to the last degree imprudent, and fraught with danger to the nation. Well, there were two plans submitted by Sir Charles Napier to the Government, but with regard to both of which the intention of the gallant Admiral was that they should not be adopted that year, but either this year or the succeeding year. But the Government, instead of taking into consideration either of those plans, and forgetting the advice which the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle had himself given to Sir Charles Napier, that he must be cautious, not risk the fleet, and not put wood against stone, adopted what he (Mr. Malins) must call the most imprudent of all plans—namely, the calling upon the Admiral to do that which at the proper time all would consider to be right, but the doing of which at an improper time all unprejudiced minds must hold to be wrong. The right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues at the Admiralty forgot that prudent course of conduct which they had enforced upon the attention of Sir Charles Napier. At the time the gallant Admiral was appointed to the command of the fleet, the only fear entertained by the Government was, that he would not act with sufficient prudence and caution. His gallantry was never questioned, but his discretion, it was apprehended, might be. It had turned out, however, that the gallant Admiral in all this matter had been more discreet and more sound-judging than the Government itself. He had acted upon that discretion, and had refrained from an enterprise which he knew to be, at that time, impracticable. It was this display of discretion and sound judgment on the part of the Admiral that was the cause of all the obloquy that had been thrown upon him, and which, instead of his coming home and being entertained by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle at a second feast at the Reform Club, had occasioned him to be received here only to be disgraced and discharged. Well, the Admiral having pointed out that neither of the plans was practicable at that season of the year, the Government, it appeared, about the 2nd of October, received information that Sebastopol had fallen. They believed it, and because they believed it, notwithstanding they had been told, in the middle of September, both by the French and English

Admirals, that the season was too late to make an attack upon Cronstadt, they expected Sir Charles Napier alone (the French fleet having already left the Baltic Sea) to commence operations against that fortress. What, after this, could the House think of the prudence of the Government? They had already had signal proof of the incapacity of the Government, that England, hitherto great, honoured, and proud of her position in the world, was reduced at this moment to a state in which he doubted whether any one could feel proud, until her character was retrieved, of saying he was an Englishman. [“Oh, oh!"] He heard some derisive cheers from the other side of the House, but he would repeat it, that, for want of judgment and for want of foresight in the plans adopted, and in the course pursued by the Government in the management of the war, no man could doubt that the character of England had been lowered in the eyes of the world. We did not know at present who was really to blame for all this, but he hoped the Committee whose proceedings had been made public mainly by the advice of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, would enable us to discover to whom we were indebted for the disastrous expedition to the Crimea, in the month of September. As to the nature of that counsel, they need not speculate, for they had positive proof of the want of foresight and the want of wisdom in advising that expedition. The House had already expressed its sense on the subject by the vote it came to six weeks ago in appointing a Committee to inquire into the state of the Army before Sebastopol—a vote which resulted in the fall of the Government itself. The late Government did not hesitate to risk the army by sending it to the Crimea, and in the same way they would have risked the fleet, had it not been for the prudence and foresight of the Admiral. Well, then, he thought he had brought this clearly before the House; he said the Admiral was useless, unless he could be trusted—and if he could not be trusted, he ought not to have been appointed; but, according to their own showing, Sir Charles Napier was the fittest man they could find for the command, and they ought to have had confidence in his judgment and discretion; because it was confessed that between Russia and England there was nothing but the fleet for a protection, and if that fleet had been lost, either by bad navigation or by operations that could not hope to be successful, there was nothing to defend us against the aggressions of the Russian fleet. Surely, then, the Government, after receiving a report from the Admiral that the season of the year was passed for undertaking such operations, should have paused before they goaded on the Admiral to attempt them; but their misconduct had lost us the army, and they had resolved to lose us the navy, if the Admiral had been sufficiently pliable for their purpose. It was the prudence and foresight of the Admiral that averted the latter catastrophe; and the country owed that distinguished officer too deep a debt of gratitude to admit of its being tolerated that the truth of these transactions should be kept in the dark. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle told the House the other night that the Admiral had not been dismissed—that he had not been censured—and although the Admiral had proclaimed himself a hero, he could not allow him to proclaim himself a martyr. But it was not the Admiral who proclaimed himself a hero; it was the noble Lord the First Lord of the Treasury and the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle who had proclaimed him a hero; and unless he was a hero, he was unfit for command. The best evidence that he was a hero was his being selected to command the fleet; and he could not understand how the right hon. Baronet could have come down to the House and said the Admiral had proclaimed himself a hero, and he would take care that he should not proclaim himself a martyr.

But to proceed with his narrative. The Admiral had a further complaint to make against the Government. He alleged that the Government, in replying to the letter in which he stated his plans of operation, had perverted his language, and had attributed to him a plan of operation which he never submitted for approval, and which had never entered into his mind. The Admiral pointed out to the Government that the season of the year was too late for undertaking any operation of magnitude; but, the Government being under the impression that Sebastopol had fallen, nothing would do for them but that something should be attempted in the Baltic. “We have taken Sebastopol,” said they; “only let us take Cronstadt or Sweaborg, and the country will then be satisfied of what we have all along been satisfied with ourselves, namely, that so powerful a Ministry never existed before.” But the

Admiral did not conform to their views—he could not consent to undertake an operation which the united Admirals of France and England had disapproved of at the time. Everybody knew that September in the Baltic was equivalent to November in England, and that October was like December. Besides, the navigation was the most dangerous in the world; there were such rocks and shoals that the fleet could not go about anywhere without buoying its course, and yet the Government actually wrote on the 4th of October directing the Admiral to attack Sweaborg, and on his writing home to say he could not depend upon the weather, the Government again wrote to him, saying, "You may choose your own day and opportunity." Here was the Government—the First Lord of the Admiralty and the other Lords of the Admiralty—no doubt the hon. and gallant Member for Gloucester (Admiral Berkeley) among them, and giving his advice—here were they, sitting at Whitehall, writing to a British Admiral in the Baltic Sea, telling him to carry on operations in that sea at the end of October, and saying to him, "You may choose your day and your opportunity!" This was not contained in a private letter, but in one sent from the Board of Admiralty to the Admiral. If such a thing had been read in a correspondence between men of business, it would be said that the man who could so forget the circumstances with which he had to deal must expect disaster and ruin if he wrote or stated that an operation which could only be carried on in fine weather must be effected in the winter season, and that a fine day could be chosen for the purpose. They further said that an attack might be made towards the end of October, they having already been told by Sir Charles Napier that the middle of September was too late. They said, "An attack may be made towards the end of October with the least danger of an attack from the Russians, from the Constadt portion of the fleet." And what were the grounds for this? Because it appeared that between the freezing in of Cronstadt and of Sweaborg there was an interval of twelve days. So the Admiral was to choose some fine morning during that fortnight, when a part of the Russian fleet was frozen in, to make an attack on the other portion of it. If this had been told him (Mr. Malins) from recollection he should scarcely have believed it; but when he read it in official correspondence, and found the names of the Secretary and two Lords of the Admiralty attached to it, there was no reason for doubt, and he must feel convinced. Such, then, had been the conduct of the Government with regard to this operation. Could it, then, be wondered at, when Sir Charles Napier had pledged his professional reputation that even the middle of September was too late—when, as he said, he was goaded on by the Government to undertake impossible, impracticable, and unsafe things, which, had he undertaken, he should, he felt, have left his fleet behind—was it to be wondered at that he felt himself obliged to write on the 10th of October, and state that, in consequence of this correspondence, he felt that he had lost the confidence of the Government, and that, if he had, he was ready to resign his command and return to this country? At the same time, he declared that no opinion which prevailed at home should induce him to undertake an operation that was impracticable or unsafe, as he had had the honour of England and the safety of the fleet committed to his charge. Now, all this would be clearly established if he (Mr. Malins) succeeded in his Motion and the correspondence was granted. It was conducted with consummate ability on both sides. That it should be conducted with ability on the side of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle was quite natural enough, but it was somewhat wonderful to find the gallant Admiral evincing ability of the highest order in the correspondence, and showing that he was just as capable of protecting himself with the pen as the nation believed he had protected her with the fleet. The correspondence was certainly rather an angry one; but he (Mr. Malins) could not find in it anything which would justify the Government in asserting that Sir Charles Napier had forgotten his duty; and if the Government had calmly and deliberately considered the circumstances, they would have come to this conclusion, that, in taking the course he had, Sir Charles Napier had not only refrained from claptrap undertakings to gain popularity, but he had taken a wide and comprehensive view of the circumstances, and exercised the power for which the Prime Minister and the right hon. Member for Carlisle had given him so much credit—namely, that of calculating so many moves beforehand; and that, instead of taking the first move suggested by the right hon. Gentleman, the gallant Admiral had calculated his moves beforehand, and had come to the conclusion that the move suggested was a false and dangerous one, and, therefore, he would not undertake it. As the Government had given the gallant Admiral credit for this power, they ought to have adhered to it on this occasion, and believed that he saw further than they could see for him; and, instead of treating him with contempt, they should have honoured him for his advice and for the manner in which he had restrained from acting on their imprudent instructions. This correspondence virtually ended in November—it continued from the 4th of October to the 6th or 10th of November—when he found the gallant Admiral confessing a desire that this correspondence which had been a source of so much anxiety to him should come to a termination. He (Mr. Malins) could not bring this part of the correspondence to a conclusion without reading an extract from a letter written on the 31st of October—he must beg the House to bear in mind that on the 25th of August, Bomarsund having fallen on the 8th of that month, the First Lord of the Admiralty wrote to Sir Charles Napier saying, "I am more than satisfied with all your proceedings." The House should bear in mind that Bomarsund had fallen on the 16th of August, and yet, notwithstanding that letter of the 25th of August, the letter of the 31st of October declared the Government to be dissatisfied with the Admiral for not having followed up the success of Bomarsund with an attack upon Cronstadt. The only true principle of carrying on war was this—if an army had to be commanded, to select a Commander in Chief; or, if a fleet was to be sent out, to name an Admiral, and to say, "There is your enemy; you know we desire him to be harassed and destroyed in every possible way; but the mode of the operations must be left to your discretion." In the present instance the Government departed from that principle in not only dictating the operations, but almost naming the day on which they were to be carried out. Why, what would be said to the Secretary at War if it were found that he had written to Lord Raglan to desire that he would take Sebastopol on the 1st of April next, or any other day? What would be said of a Government writing to a general to carry out a particular operation on a particular day, thereby setting aside the discretion of the general himself? Would not his answer be, "This is a matter which necessarily you cannot possibly know so much about as myself, but if you have not sufficient confidence in me or my discretion as to the mode and time of carrying out these operations, I beg you will relieve me of this command. I am perfectly ready to return home." Now, that was precisely the case of Sir Charles Napier. The Admiralty, after having expressed its approbation of Sir Charles Napier's conduct, and after having carried on a correspondence with him relative to the attack on Sweaborg, wrote to him on the 31st of October and stated, "We are fully satisfied with the reasons for not attacking the fortress as determined at that council; but, considering the conflict of authorities"—he must here state to the House that this conflict of authorities arose between General Jones, the English engineer, and General Niel, the French engineer, the former stating that it would take six or seven days to take the fortress, while the latter put it down at two hours—"but, considering the conflict of authorities contained in the reports recently brought before them, their Lordships cannot express equal satisfaction that steps were not taken to attack Sweaborg immediately after the fall of Bomarsund." Now, he appealed to the House whether any admiral receiving such a letter would not naturally feel that he had lost the confidence of his Government, and that his command was no longer satisfactory, especially as, up to the end of August, his entire proceedings had met with the approval of the Admiralty? That naturally produced great dissatisfaction in the mind of Sir Charles Napier, and the correspondence was virtually closed on the 10th of November. Sir Charles Napier returned to England, and arrived at Portsmouth on the 17th of December. As soon as the gallant Admiral could make preparations, he came up to London, and had an interview with the First Lord of the Admiralty, from whom, considering the terms on which they had parted, he thought the gallant Admiral might rely upon it that he would meet with a cordial reception on his return. Now, he (Mr. Malins) thought that the gallant Admiral might consider himself entitled to such a reception from what the right hon. Gentleman said only a month back in moving the Navy Estimates. So far from intimating any ground of dissatisfaction with the proceedings of the gallant Admiral, the right hon. Baronet, as lately as the 16th of February, having been asked, with regard to the expenditure for the navy, what had been done in the Baltic, made use of these words—

"Now, I really must say that, on the whole, the operations in the Baltic, as they were conducted last year, appear to me to deserve the approbation of the House."

The operations of which he was speaking, be it remembered, were operations conducted under the command of Sir Charles Napier—

"Bomarsund, a most important naval station, fortified strongly, and bearing marks of an intention to carry that system of fortification to a much greater extent, has been destroyed. The great naval arsenal close to the capital of the Emperor of Russia was visited by a force inferior to the force there stationed. Battle was repeatedly offered and as repeatedly declined. Up to last month Sweaborg, with nine sail of the line, was blockaded by an inferior force of frigates only. Never were operations more successful, displaying more gallantry, more discipline, than the operations in the Baltic. In that sea not a ship was lost, a most effectivo blockade was kept up—a blockade which displayed the energy, skill, and gallantry of English officers and men, and the pressure brought to bear upon the enemy was, I believe, by no means slight."—[3 Hansard, cxxxvi. 1481.]

So that the right hon. Gentleman, in moving the Navy Estimates only an hour after the question had been put to him by an hon. and gallant Officer on that side of the House as to what was the quarrel between Sir Charles Napier and the Government—the right hon. Gentleman repeated what the hon. and gallant Admiral the Member for Gloucester (Admiral Berkeley) had said a few nights before—that Sir Charles Napier had neither been recalled, dismissed, nor censured; but he thought he had now satisfied the House that that hon. and gallant Admiral must really have forgotten for a moment what had passed, for the House could entertain no doubt that Sir Charles Napier had been dismissed, and also that he had been censured. With respect to the gallant Admiral's interview with the First Lord of the Admiralty, of course, he had no written evidence, and could only rely upon the statement made to him by the gallant Admiral, which, he could have no doubt, was strictly accurate. He said that the gallant Admiral, having come home after carrying on those operations only a month before, as the right hon. Gentleman stated, to the entire satisfaction of the country, considering that he had not lost a ship, and had gone out with the fleet in but an indifferent state of discipline, and, remembering what had taken place at his departure, had a right to expect, if ever any man had, a courteous and cordial reception on his return. Yet the gallant Admiral assured him (Mr. Malins) that on going to the Admiralty he was received in a manner all but insulting by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle, who did certainly hold out his hand coldly to him, but said at once that he declined having any conversation with him on the subject of the expedition. That was on the 22nd December; but he now proceeded to that which could admit of no doubt. The gallant Admiral returned to the Duke of Wellington, at Portsmouth, that night, where he next morning received a letter, signed "R. S. Dundas" and "W. F. Cowper," amounting to a dismissal from his command. It was dated the 22nd December, and was couched in the following terms:—

"Sir—The Baltic fleet, on its return to port, being now separated in different harbours of Great Britain, and several of the ships which composed this fleet being under orders for service in the Black Sea and the Mediterranean, you are hereby required and directed to strike your flag and come on shore."

He had read to the House the whole of the letter. These were the kindly and encouraging terms in which the most distinguished naval officer of Great Britain was greeted on his return from a great public service, which he had conducted, as the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham) himself admitted, to the entire satisfaction of the Government. That the gallant Officer should have been surprised, that he should have been more than surprised, that he should even have been disgusted at such treatment, the House would not wonder at. He wrote, but not immediately, for he had been so much taken by surprise that he required some time for consideration; but he wrote on the 25th December to the Secretary of the Admiralty, as follows:—

"Sir—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of their Lordships' order, directing me to strike my flag; and with reference to the same, I request their Lordships will inform me whether I am to consider that my command is at an end."

This was speaking very distinctly to the Board of Admiralty. The House would observe that the letter of the 22nd was couched in terms which might be customary with the Admiralty—he did not know—all he could say was, that they were terms which he thought few of them would adopt even in dismissing a domestic servant. He was assured that it was contrary to all usage; he was assured that

Sir James Saumarez, when he had the command of the Baltic fleet in the last war, upon his return in consequence of the winter having set in and rendering it unsafe and impossible for him to remain there, had permission to be absent until the season should admit the resumption of operations. That was the manner in which any officer under similar circumstances had a right to expect to be treated; Sir Charles Napier had that right, and he thought the House would agree with him in one thing, that the letters of the Admiralty, like every other step taken in this war, came a little too late. They thought fit, in their reply, to tender some kind of thanks to Sir Charles Napier; he should have thought that the proper occasion would have been when the letter was written to the Admiral recalling the fleet—but no; proper things were never to be done at the proper times, and all was too late. The gallant Admiral's demand as to whether he was to consider this letter as insisting on the termination of his services was answered as follows:—

"Sir.—With reference to your letter of yesterday's date, I am commanded by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty to acquaint you that the order which you have received, agreeably to custom, to strike your flag and come on shore, is always given at the termination of a flag officer's command."

And yet the hon. and gallant Officer the Member for Gloucester (Admiral Berkeley) could come into that House two months afterwards and say that the gallant Admiral had neither been dismissed nor censured, and that was repeated a week afterwards by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle. So that here was a great public officer, the commander in chief of the noblest fleet that England had ever sent forth, who had commanded that fleet to the entire satisfaction of the Government, and he believed of the nation, and who returned because operations could no longer be carried on, told in insulting terms to strike his flag and to come on shore—and when he asked whether he was to consider that the termination of his command, was reminded that this order was always issued on the termination of a flag officer's command. Now, he thought that, unless they were to give up the present mode of understanding the English language—unless this Government, which had introduced so many new things, had introduced also some new language to direct the operations of the war, the House would adhere to the construction he put upon the letter of the 22nd of December, as equivalent to a dismissal of Sir Charles Napier. Yet, having dismissed him without uttering a word of compliment to his services, or the services of those who had manned his ships, they thought fit—too late, as he had previously stated, for it was on the 26th of December—to attempt to repair the omission, for the letter went on to say—"and I am directed by my Lords to take this opportunity"—why not have taken that opportunity?—"to express to you the sense their Lordships entertain of your exertions during the period of your service in command of the Baltic fleet." Now, the House would, perhaps, remember a debate that took place on a memorable occasion—a debate in which he (Mr. Mallins) had taken no part, though he would willingly have done so, but in which the hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Admiralty had addressed the House. Whatever else might be inferred from the speech the hon. Gentleman then made, he saw one thing very plainly; that if the hon. Gentleman were not out of office, he expected very soon to be, for the hon. Gentleman reverted to his old habits and found fault with everything, declaring that the army had been mismanaged, and everything had been mismanaged, that nothing would ever come right until everything that had been done should be undone; but, added the hon. Gentleman, in a triumphant tone, nobody could find fault with anything done in regard to the fleet—everything was perfectly right in that department, and no one would be able to say a word against it. The hon. Gentleman probably did not know these things at that time, or, at all events, he must have supposed that the ban of secrecy could be kept upon this correspondence, and that, from an apprehension that the public service would be injured by divulging them, these things would be kept secret; for he thought if his mind adverted to this correspondence, the hon. Gentleman could not have anticipated so confidently that nobody could throw blame on what had been done at the Admiralty. That summary dismissal led again to a correspondence with which he did not intend to trouble the House in detail. He had limited his Motion to asking for the production of papers and correspondence which had taken place between Sir Charles Napier and the Board of Admiralty since the 20th of December. He had fixed that date, because it included the letter of the 22nd of December, and all the correspondence which had taken place subsequent to the gallant Admiral's dismissal from his command. He would, however, remind the House of what it had heard from the hon. and gallant Admiral the Member for Gloucester (Admiral Berkeley), who said he was sorry that Sir Charles Napier had shown so bad an example in making a speech at the Mansion House, contrary to all rules of discipline. He (Mr. Malins) had no desire to conduct this case otherwise than in a perfectly candid manner, or to express approbation where approbation could not be entertained. He thought that Sir Charles Napier had committed an error in making that speech, and going to the length to which he went; but it had been made the subject of comment that he had said he took the command of a fleet badly manned and worse disciplined, and some officers afterwards wrote to the papers to say that they were sure it could not be the Admiral's intention to cast censure on those who had served under him. Now, he found from the letters that passed two months before, that Sir Charles Napier was then remonstrating with the Government because they had not formally given their approbation to the officers serving under him, to whose exertions they were indebted for the safety of the fleet, to whom they were indebted for having brought back a disciplined fleet, after having taken out one that was undisciplined. Sir Charles Napier, in fact, in a letter written in January, reminded the Government that on the return of the French fleet from the Baltic, the Emperor, in his address to the Legislative Chamber, tendered his thanks to that fleet for its operations in the Baltic. Sir Charles Napier then said, reasonably enough, he was not aware that the services of the English fleet were less worthy of acknowledgment; he knew that great exertions had been made by every officer—he knew their great merits, and he regretted much that no thanks should have been tendered to them. What the gallant Admiral meant by saying he took the command of a fleet badly manned and worse disciplined, was not that the officers were incompetent—he stated in his correspondence there never had existed more gallant or more competent officers; but he had this difficulty to contend with, that not a single captain in the fleet had ever commanded in the Baltic previously. They were all unacquainted with the navigation—a difficulty enhanced a hundredfold by circumstances. There was also this additional difficulty, that, being so powerful a fleet, it had been manned hastily, and manned with those, several of whom were unable to go aloft; therefore it was "ill-disciplined," because the crews were collected together on a sudden, and "worse manned," because those crews were composed of men who were not sailors by occupation. Therefore, so far from Sir Charles Napier intending to cast any imputation upon the officers of the fleet, he had remonstrated with the Government for not tendering its thanks to those officers. He thought he had now shown the House that Sir Charles Napier had been dismissed from his command in December, and not only dismissed but censured, and in his conviction it was for the interests of the public service that such a transaction should be brought under the notice of Parliament. He trusted that, in doing so, the House would be of opinion he had not misconceived his duty as a Member of Parliament, but that he had succeeded in bringing the subject in a temperate and moderate manner before the House. He would not refrain, so long as he had the honour of a seat in that House, from expressing disapprobation of the proceedings of any Minister, when he thought disapprobation was deserved. He had ventured to express what he strongly felt—that the manner in which Sir Charles Napier had been treated by the Board of Admiralty, and consequently by the Government of which the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) was at the head, was unworthy of this great nation. He submitted to the House that it was incompatible with the public service of this country that its distinguished servants should be treated with neglect and injustice—that they should receive reproach and disgrace where honour and reward were due. It was also his conviction that it was absolutely essential to the public service that these transactions should not be kept in the dark, but that the facts should be brought to light, in order that Parliament might judge as to their propriety. As the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle had told them in the admirable speech he delivered on the question, whether the Committee now sitting should be open or secret, public reputations were not to be sacrificed in a Secret Committee sitting in No. 17. He cordially adopted the principle of the right hon. Gentleman, that the reputations of our generals and admirals were dear to the country, that they were the property of the country, and that an insult to them was an insult to every member of the community. It was upon their skill and courage that we must rely for our defence, and if we could not find men worthy to command our fleets and armies, then England would indeed be reduced to a miserable condition. If, when we had found such men, and when the Government of the day proclaimed to us that we had found the most fitting man—if, because the First Lord of the Admiralty took a view that was not in accordance with that of the commander of the fleet, the admiral was to be received on his return with ignominy, there was an end to all security for the efficient performance of the public service. When he found, therefore, that no other Member of the House was disposed to bring this matter under their consideration, he had felt it his duty not to shrink from bringing it forward, believing, as he did, that to keep such transactions in the dark would be attended with the greatest possible detriment to the public service in general.

SIR THOMAS HERBERT: In seconding the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford, and as a personal friend of Sir Charles Napier, and one who has served under him on many trying occasions, I must beg to trouble the House with a few words on the question now before them. The hon. and gallant Admiral the Member for Gloucester told the House, a few evenings ago, that Sir Charles Napier was not dismissed from his command. Technically speaking, he certainly was not; but he was removed from his command by ordering him to haul down his flag, and, to my mind, in a most discourteous manner, unaccompanied as the order was by a single complimentary expression in commendation of the gallant Admiral's management of the fleet while under his orders. Although I cannot approve of after-dinner speeches like the gallant Admiral's at the Mansion House, yet, after all, Sir Charles Napier's eminent services—many of them most brilliant, and such as to have called forth the admiration of such men as Lord Exmouth, Sir Alexander Cochrane, Sir Robert Stopford, Sir James Gordon, and other distinguished officers—I have too much respect for my gallant friend, who was once my commander during some trying occurrences, not to hope that his statement will prove to be correct, and that he will stand well with his countrymen. With regard to the gallant Admiral's conduct in the Baltic, I do not think that he could have done more with the force at his disposal than he did, and I firmly believe that it is to his cool judgment and wise discretion the country is indebted for the safe return home of our fleet; for had Sir Charles Napier been induced to have attacked either Cronstadt or Sweaborg without the co-operation of a large land force, and the assistance of mortar-vessels and gun-boats of an easy draft of water—a force which appears to have been entirely neglected attaching to the fleet last year—my conviction is that the attack would have failed, and that his ships most likely would have been all disabled. Can the eulogium pronounced upon Sir Charles Napier by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, at the memorable banquet at the Reform Club, ever be forgotten? There the right hon. Baronet not only congratulated the club on so thorough a Reformer having the command of a fleet, but added that his confidence in him was so great that he had his (the First Lord of the Admiralty's) authority to declare war, if he thought fit, upon his arrival in the Baltic. Now, what has all this boasting and confidence come to? That the right hon. Baronet and the gallant Admiral have fallen out; the Admiral has been dismissed by the First Lord of the Admiralty from his command, and their unfortunate misunderstanding I much regret, as being prejudicial to the public service, particularly to the discipline of the naval branch of it. However, the gallant Admiral in common fairness ought to have an opportunity, somewhere, of vindicating his character. I have not seen any of Sir Charles Napier's correspondence with the right hon. Baronet opposite; but if the correspondence asked for is refused to be produced merely on the score of being of a private character, it certainly does not come well from an Admiralty who made such liberal use of private and confidential correspondence in the inquiry into Mr. Stafford's dockyard appointments to refuse it.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

“That there be laid before this House a Copy of any Correspondence which has passed between the Board of Admiralty and any Member of Her Majesty's Government, and Sir Charles Napier, since the 20th day of December last.”

SIR JAMES GRAHAM: Sir, I have great pleasure in assuring the House that it will not be necessary for me, in answering the hon. and learned Gentleman, to detain them for anything like the length of time he has occupied in opening his case. For, Sir, I have not come down here prepared to read extracts from public despatches not presented to Parliament, and much less do I come here prepared with garbled extracts from private and confidential letters. Much less still am I prepared to enter into the details of private conversations. I have not the advantage of holding in my hand anything like that brief of a confidential nature which has been circulated among certain Members of this House. But at the very outset of what I have to address to the House, I shall just refer to the passage with which the hon. and learned Member concluded his speech, when he said he was anxious to vindicate the honour of this country. Now, Sir, I am not devoid of a desire to vindicate the honour of this country, and I heard the hon. and learned Gentleman with the deepest regret say, as I understood him, that the honour of this country, which was so dear to him, had been lost by the disasters which had befallen our arms. Now, Sir, whether I look to the Black Sea or the Baltic, as to what concerns the navy, I am satisfied that the honour of this country has been maintained; and as regards our army, I know that all is not lost. The honour of that army and the honour of this country, are, as I believe, still intact. We have never met the enemy on any one occasion in which our arms have not been victorious; and whatever the sufferings of our troops may have been, their exemplary patience, their gallantry, their good conduct, far exceed all my powers of praise; and in the presence of this House I am glad to declare that the honour of our arms still remains unstained. Sir, the hon. and learned Gentleman has commented upon an expression used by my noble Friend at the head of the Government on an occasion to which he delights in referring—that the highest proof of sagacity lies in looking several moves ahead. Now, I must plead guilty to a great want of sagacity, for the moves made by the hon. and learned Gentleman on this occasion were not foreseen by me. I certainly did not anticipate that he would have thought it consistent with his duty to read extracts from despatches in his possession—despatches which he says have been submitted to him—public despatches of the highest possible importance, which the Government of this country has not yet been asked by the House of Commons to produce, and with regard to which it remains to be seen whether, when they are asked for, they will think it consistent with their duty to the public to advise the House to sanction their production. Their discretion will be exercised by them; what is due to myself, I will shortly endeavour to state to the House. The hon. and learned Gentleman talks of the introduction of new things. Is there anything more new, Sir—with all your experience in that chair, have you seen or heard of anything so unexampled as the course pursued by the hon. and learned Gentleman? He has culled from private letters, without the consent of the writers of those letters, such extracts as, to use his own words, would maintain the view he takes of this case. Now, Sir, if there is to be any production of these letters, let it be complete and entire. But, until that production shall have taken place, I trust the House will not form any opinion from those extracts which the hon. and learned Gentleman has carefully selected, in order to support the view he takes of this matter. I said I did not expect the moves that have taken place. Had I been asked before this night whether I thought the day would come when Sir Charles Napier would put his case into the hands of a lawyer, sitting upon the opposite side of the House—would appear as plaintiff in a case charging the Government of which my noble Friend the Member for Tiverton is the head, with having treated him, as the hon. and learned Member alleges, with insult and contumely—I confess to you that nothing further from my anticipations could possibly have occurred. But there is another part of the conduct of the hon. and learned Gentleman which has also surprised me. He referred to the dinner which took place at the Reform Club, for which, as I have before said, I have done penance on the floor of this House. I have already stated that I then committed an error which I was not prepared to repeat. No doubt, on the occasion which has been referred to, I said that if there was a banquet in honour of the return of Sir Charles Napier from the Baltic, and I was invited to attend it, I should be prepared to do so in order to celebrate the brilliant successes which were then anticipated. Well, the gallant Admiral has returned; his services are ended, and I have received no such invitation; and had I received that invitation, the punishment to which I have referred was so severe, and I was so conscious of the indiscretion that I committed, that I know not whether I should have accepted it. Happily I have not been put to the test. It is true I stated on that occasion that I had the greatest opinion of the proved and distinguished valour of Sir Charles Napier, and I added that I thought he was also discreet. He has confirmed that opinion. Discretion, the better part of valour, has not been wanting. He has proved himself that consummate Admiral whom I praised both for valour and discreetness. I shall only say, in answer to another comment made by the hon. and learned Gentleman who, in order to vindicate himself for the production of private letters, alluded to the proceedings before a particular Committee of this House in which I was a party concerned; but that was a tribunal of a judicial character, and it was the order of the House that persons, papers, and records should be produced before that Committee. I think the House will perceive the difference between the production of documents before a judicial Committee sanctioned by the authority of this House, and the production of documents, such as the hon. and learned Gentleman has used to-night—partially, and, as I should say, most unfairly—in the absence of any appeal to the authority of the House to say whether it is consistent with the duty of the Government and the public interests at stake, that the whole or any part of them should be produced. Now, Sir, the hon. and learned Gentleman has said, and quite correctly, that "on the whole" the conduct of Sir Charles Napier in reference to the command of the Fleet up to the 24th of September was approved by the Government. I have never contradicted that assertion. "On the whole"—the very term used in the letter which he quoted—"on the whole" the Board of Admiralty did approve the conduct of Sir Charles Napier with reference to the command of the fleet under him. It is generally believed that a good workman does not quarrel with his tools; nevertheless it is true that the gallant Admiral—not at the Mansion House, but in an official letter to the Admiralty—did state that the fleet was ill-manned, and that it was unfit to meet the enemy. On the receipt of that letter, the Admiralty called on the gallant Admiral to state the specific ships to which he applied that remark, and when so called on, he failed to specify a single ship. I do certainly, Sir, maintain that the discretion exercised by Sir Charles Napier, in reference to attacks with an inferior force upon fortresses was, in the terms of my private letter, "a wise discretion." I have never quarrelled with the exercise of that discretion, and had he adhered to his assertion made early in May and repeated in July, that Sweaborg was unassailable either by land or sea, no one word of hesitation with respect to the prudence exercised by him, either in writing or in speech, would have fallen from me. It is quite true that, on the 24th of September, when he, for the first time, reconnoitred Sweaborg close at hand, he did write to the Admiralty a despatch upon which I shall not further dwell, because I do not think it consistent with my duty to enter into the details of that despatch, which appeared to the Board and to myself materially to alter the aspect of the case. It is said by the hon. and learned Member that the appliances necessary for that attack, as contemplated by Sir Charles Napier on the 24th of September, were not sent by the Admiralty. But on the 12th of May the gallant Admiral said that this particular fortress was unassailable either by land or sea, and, relying on the judgment of the gallant Admiral, the Board of Admiralty thought it of no practical use to send further appliances for the purpose of an assault declared by the gallant Admiral to be impossible. It is also certain, as stated by the hon. and learned Gentleman, that a difference of opinion did arise between naval and military officers of the highest authority—between the naval officers and General Jones commanding the Engineers on the one hand, and between the Admirals and the French Generals on the other. Into that difference of opinion I am sure the House will not expect me to enter, because it bears directly upon naval operations which have only been suspended for a short period, and are now about to be resumed. The hon. and learned Gentleman says he has looked at these papers carefully. He is an equity lawyer. What does he think of the justice of a proceeding which calls upon me to defend myself with my hands tied behind my back, when, without a breach of duty, I cannot produce this correspondence, or even refer to it? I have felt my sense of duty so strongly, that I have not brought a paper down with me. I have only seen a paper, prepared ex parte, and marked "confidential," containing extracts from both public and private despatches, which has been circulated among hon. Members near me.

And yet this equity lawyer, who is so fond of fair play, after conning his case, and speaking from a brief, comes down and makes an attack which he expects me to answer when I have not the materials, and when a sense of public duty, even if I had them, would absolutely forbid me to use them. It is quite true that the letter of Sir Charles Napier, of the 24th of September, with reference to the attack on Sweaborg, did present to the Board of Admiralty an entirely different view of the subject from that contained in his former communications. It then appeared perfectly clear to them, even on the showing of Sir Charles Napier himself, that it was perfectly possible, if the whole force then in the Baltic was reunited, to make an attack by the naval force alone on Sweaborg; the departure both of the English and French fleets was accordingly arrested. And then the hon. and learned Member has not thought it unworthy to assign a motive for the instructions sent out on the 4th of October. He said that accounts had then been received of the supposed fall of Sebastopol, and that, acting under the influence of the excitement which then prevailed, the Board of Admiralty varied their instructions, and gave orders entirely different from what they had given before. Now, Sir, I give the most positive denial to that statement. The new orders to which he has referred were sent out on the day after we received Sir Charles Napier's letter of the 24th of September, and if the hon. and learned Gentleman will look at the close of the despatch of the 4th of October, I think that he will see that Sir Charles Napier was told that he must make no desperate attack; and that whether he should attack or not was left entirely to his own discretion. Warning was given him that if the means placed at his disposal were adequate, the country had a right to expect that every thing that valour could do should be attempted; but that the decision as to the course which should be taken rested entirely with himself. If that passage is in the despatch, and I believe that it is there, I must say that I think the hon. and learned Gentleman has been guilty of a want of fairness and candour towards the Government in not reading it. Something has been said with respect to an assertion made both by myself and my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Gloucester, that Admiral Napier had neither been censured nor dismissed from the command of the fleet. It is quite true that "on the whole" the Admiralty had no ground for censuring Sir Charles Napier for his conduct in the command of the fleet, but it is not true that the Board of Admiralty did not censure certain acts of Sir Charles Napier with reference to the authority of the Government. On the contrary, they had more than once to warn the gallant Admiral that the language and tone he assumed towards the authority under which he served did not appear consistent with the subordination and deference due to the supreme authority under which he was serving. Then, as to his alleged dismissal. It is quite certain that Admirals, having performed similar services in the Baltic, have received similar orders at the end of the autumn so to strike their flags. Admiral Hope, who commanded in the Baltic in 1812, was, on his return, ordered to strike his flag. It does not, however, follow that, when an Admiral is ordered to strike his flag, he may not be ordered to rehoist it. It rests with the authorities to decide whether the conduct of the officer in that command has been such as to entitle him to the renewal of their confidence. And I do not think that it will redound to the efficiency of the service, or be conducive to good discipline, or have a happy effect on our forces, whether by sea or land, if this House should sit in judgment whether it is right that, at the termination of a naval campaign, the Board of Admiralty should again employ a particular officer or not. It is quite clear that Sir Charles Napier, on the 24th of September, in writing this despatch with reference to future operations before Sweaborg, did take a course which ensured him the command in the Baltic if that plan was adopted. But it was for the Executive to determine whether, having regard to the whole conduct of the gallant Admiral, it was desirable or advisable to reappoint him. Well, Sir, I have had the honour of knowing Sir Charles Napier for a long period. I have the greatest admiration of the gallantry he has displayed on many trying occasions. These are not empty words. On my own responsibility, in the year 1853, I awarded to him a good-service pension, as a mark of the respect of the Admiralty for his past services. But I should be altogether unworthy of my place in this House, and of the office which I lately had the honour to fill, if I did not say that the tone, from a very early period, taken by Admiral Napier in commenting on his instructions was turbulent and insubordinate, and assumed a character which, I should say, was altogether inconsistent with his duty to the Admiralty, and that if the Admiralty had tamely submitted to it, and ordered him to rehoist his flag, it would have set the worst possible example to the service. I have told you now, without disguise, the exact truth of this matter. I have not a particle of unkind feeling towards Sir Charles Napier; on the contrary, I very much regret what has occurred, but again I say, I think it will be a great misfortune if the Executive Government consent to the production of this correspondence. Certainly, Sir, if I doubted before whether it was right again to appoint Sir Charles Napier to the command of the Baltic fleet, the course he has taken since he was ordered to strike his flag, in addition to the language to which I have before adverted—his not having hesitated, when he was angry with myself and the Board under which he was serving, to produce documents of the most confidential nature, not among his intimate friends alone—certainly not among his brother officers, for not a naval officer has yet come forward to bring this case of undue oppression on the part of the Government before the House—but to go to the opponents of the Government in the hope of raising an adverse party feeling—all this, I say, is an additional confirmation to me in my opinion that the reappointment of that officer would not have been for the interests of the public service. I certainly did not hear all that fell from the hon. and gallant Admiral the Member for Dartmouth, who seconded this Motion, and I do not know, therefore, whether he is prepared to support the course taken by Sir Charles Napier with reference to the authorities under whom he was serving. If he is prepared to support that course, I must say I am glad I did not hear what fell from him, because it would in some degree have diminished the respect for his authority which his high character has always induced me to entertain. Upon the whole, I shall leave this matter in the hands of the Government; they will decide whether this correspondence shall be produced or not; but never in my life was I more astonished at the course pursued by any hon. Member than I have been at that taken by the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford. The hon. and learned Gentleman deems it consistent with his dignity to act as squire on this occasion to this knight-errant tilting against authority; and I am exceedingly glad that the post has not been undertaken by any Member of the naval profession. As for the equity and love of justice on which the hon. and learned Member prides himself, the mode which he has adopted of displaying these virtues may be very good practice in the courts of law, but I am very much mistaken if it will succeed or be sanctioned for one moment in the House of Commons.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT: Sir, before troubling the House with the few remarks which I have to make on this subject, I beg to assure them that I have not read anything connected with the matter. It is true that this afternoon Admiral Sir Charles Napier brought me a paper stating that it contained his case as it was to be brought before the House. I took it from his hands without reply; but, in walking down to the House, I formed an opinion that I ought not to read it, and I have not done so. Some few days ago, also, Admiral Napier came to me stating that his case was to be brought before the House, and hoping that I would give that assistance to a brother officer which his case might seem to me to deserve. I told him that I did not wish to enter then into any discussion on the subject, but that I would be in my place when it came forward, and if any opportunity offered of vindicating the character of a brother officer I was the man to do it. I must say that I very much regret that Sir Charles Napier should have allowed himself so far to be led away as to enter into a vindication of his conduct at a civic banquet, more especially as he had then demanded a court-martial from the Admiralty, and had the expectation of being able to submit his conduct to the judgment of a tribunal composed of members of his own profession. Moreover, with his experience of this House, he ought to have known that if he had a clear and fair case, this body of Englishmen representing the country, would never have failed to give a man of his station and responsibility that fair and patient hearing and that unbiased verdict which his case should entitle him to. If these papers are produced I shall go into them with the most sincere desire to see the fullest justice done to all parties. Now, Sir, there can be no doubt that there does exist in this country a very strong feeling that our success in the Baltic has not been equal to the just expectations which were entertained, nor commensurate with the strength of that magnificent fleet which was sent out. It is of the greatest importance that the country should know the reason of this. In the first place, the observation of Admiral Napier, as to his fleet not being well manned, is undoubtedly correct; and seeing the country was called on, at a moment's notice almost, to send out so large a number of ships, it was almost impossible that they could all have been well manned. It was a moral impossibility to have got a sufficient number of seamen; and the Admiralty, therefore, had nothing left but to do that which they did. The ships did go to sea ill-manned, but the vigorous and indefatigable exertions of the captains and officers did produce such an effect that, by the time the frost broke up in the upper part of the Baltic, the fleet was perfectly ready to cope with the enemy, if he had ventured to come out. Another cause of the shortcomings of the fleet was the deficiency in prams and gunboats of light draught of water. Were I not forbidden from entering at length into this particular point by the reflection that another fleet is now fitting out, I think I could show that the reason why the fleet did not do all that was expected from it was, that it had not the means at its disposal for doing it. Then, again, the country is wedded to the idea that wooden walls are fit to cope with granite walls. Now, I maintain that they are not, and that it is expecting more from ships than they are able to perform. Certainly Admiral Chads, after Bomarsund was taken, made some experiments on the walls, pouring in heavy broadside after broadside upon them, and he reported to the Admiralty, I am told, that he had acted very efficiently upon them; but I should like to know whether his practice would have been so successful had those walls been manned, and had they been replying to him with red hot shot? Then, there is Gibraltar; but I do not know that ships had any great success there. At Algiers, the truth is, the Dey was so "cursedly" afraid that he let the ships come into the harbour and take up their positions without ever firing a shot at them. Had he done so, I doubt very much whether Lord Exmouth would ever have got in. However, he did get in, and put a division of ships under the batteries in such a position that the guns could not be depressed to bear on them; but Admiral Milne, of whose gallantry I wish to speak in the highest terms, was not able to take a similar position, and in his ships, which were some few fathoms further off from the shore, and on which consequently the guns in the batteries could be brought to bear, there was great loss of life. Well, then, we now come to what took place at Sebastopol. What happened there? At that place we had a fine fleet of our own acting in conjunction with an equally fine fleet of our allies, and those fleets went in with a courage unexampled, and with a spirit that excites my highest admiration; they did all that could be done, but that all was simply nothing, except getting 600 men killed or wounded, and some of the ships so disabled as to be next to useless. Attacks of this hazardous description might possibly succeed, and a somewhat similar attack, under Nelson, who was for ever looking a-head and never a-stern, who cared nothing about losing his commission, and who thought of nothing but honour and glory, did succeed; and, indeed, it is not impossible for a fleet to run into Sebastopol, or into any port, provided there be a sufficient depth of water; but the chances are 100 to one against success if the attempt be made in such like instances. There is no commander-in-chief who, knowing the disastrous consequences which must ensue from the loss of his fleet, would, if he acted with prudence and discretion, attempt such an undertaking; and therefore I think that Sir Charles Napier, as far as I can judge, humble as is my opinion—and humble it is evidently considered, for to my prejudice I am unjustly placed on the reserved list—exercised a sound and wise discretion, and fulfilled his duty to his country in not exposing his fleet to be unnecessarily crippled; but is it nothing that the fleet in the Baltic crippled Russian commerce, insulted its coasts, commanded its waters, and confined its boasted navy within its harbours? I entirely agree with the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir J. Graham) that either all the papers should be produced or none, but as to whether the production of them would be injurious to the public service I can, of course, form no opinion, because I have not read them. The right hon. Gentleman has read them, and I am content to take his opinion on the subject. I wish, however, to state that I am sure that the hon. and learned Gentleman below me would not have brought the subject before the House unless he had been actuated by a sense of justice. He has undertaken the subject in no party spirit. [Cheers.] I am convinced that such is the case, for I have talked with the hon. and learned Gentleman upon the subject. I come now to another point. It has been said that Sir Charles Napier, on his return from the Baltic, received a letter which ran somewhat to this effect—"Sir, I am commanded by the Board of Admiralty to order you to strike your flag and come on shore." Well, this is a curt way of doing a thing; but the Admiralty, I must say, deals in curt ways. I cannot say that that letter should be considered as a censure upon Sir Charles Napier, or that it amounted to dismissing him from his command, because it was in conformity with ordinary practice. Sir James Saunarez, at one time, was ordered to strike his flag; but then it was intended to reinstate him in his command. Now, in the present instance, as far as I can judge, there was not the slightest intention of reappointing Sir Charles Napier to the command of the Baltic fleet, and, although I cannot complain of the order conveyed to Sir Charles Napier to strike his flag, I still think that, as two days afterwards a just tribute was paid to that gallant admiral's conduct, it would have been as well that that mark of approbation, which appears to me to have been elicited by Sir Charles Napier's letter, should have been conveyed to him at the same time as the order to strike his flag. I think it would have been a fair compliment to a gallant and meritorious officer if the Government, as conservators of the public good faith, had, in ordering Sir Charles Napier to strike his flag, conveyed to him that expression of approval to which two days afterwards they gave vent. With regard to the future, thank God, we have a magnificent fleet at Spithead prepared to go to the Baltic, which possesses an advantage over that of last year in having an adequate supply of gunboats, and I entertain no doubt that it will achieve some brilliant success, but, at all events, let the House and let the country be persuaded that all that British officers and British seamen can do will be accomplished.

SIR CHARLES WOOD: I consider it is necessary, Sir, for me to state, and I shall do so as shortly as possible, the course which the Government think it right to adopt with reference to the question now before the House. I do not think it advisable to advert in the slightest degree to the various topics which have been introduced into the discussion, for in the whole of my experience I have never witnessed a course pursued similar to that which has been adopted on the present occasion; and I feel persuaded that the House will not sanction such a course by any symptom of approbation. Certainly, I have never before known such a course pursued, and I think that the House will not sanction the quoting of extracts from private letters and official reports not properly before the House, and relating to operations which may be repeated. I will only protest in the strongest terms I can use against such a course, as for the first time in my experience, and I believe in the experience of the oldest Member present, has been tonight pursued in this House. My right hon. Friend (Sir J. Graham) has said that it rests with the Executive Government to say whether the papers now moved for shall be produced, and I at once say that it seems to me utterly impossible, consistently with the interests of the public service, that those papers should be produced. I, of course, have seen those letters, and I may inform the House that in them are discussed such topics as the means, the possibility, and the mode of attacking certain fortresses in the Baltic. The hon. and gallant Admiral who has last addressed us has stated that a fleet is about to proceed to that sea; and he has also said that he entertains no doubt that everything will be done which can possibly be accomplished. I also entertain the most confident expectation, that whatever can be done, consistently with a prudent discretion, will be accomplished; but I appeal to the House whether the production of letters referring even to the mode of attack upon the fortresses in the Baltic can possibly conduce to the success of that expedition? I feel that the simple statement which I have made is the strongest argument I can use against the production of these letters, and the strongest proof that it is the duty of the Government to resist their production. I feel that, after having made that statement, it will be the unanimous feeling of this House that the production of those letters would not be for the good of the public service. I should be at a loss for any argument in support of this opinion, for the case is self-evident; and I can only repeat that I feel it to be quite inconsistent with my duty to the public to agree to the production of the papers moved for by the hon. and learned Gentleman.

CAPTAIN SCOBELL said, he hoped the House would allow an officer who was engaged in the last war to say a few words. The reputation of a gallant officer was at stake ; and he could wish that his reputation had stood as high at the end of the Baltic campaign as it did at its commencement. Sir Charles Napier left this country under every disadvantage. There had been a naval review, a sham fight, and a reform dinner, at which he was lauded with all the praise that could be applied to a gallant officer ; and after these he was sent forth with the expectation of the country that he would do more than it was in fact possible for him or in fact any one else to do. That many of the ships were badly manned, the right hon. Baronet the late First Lord of the Admiralty had not attempted to deny. With respect to the possibility of his performing what was expected of him, it seemed that two engineer officers attached to the expedition differed. Had they coincided in opinion, it would have been almost impossible to stand against them ; but one had one plan, and the other another, and the Admirals disapproved of both. Though he scarcely knew Sir Charles Napier personally, he must say that his ears had tingled at certain expressions in some of the papers which they had heard read that night. He could not avoid saying, that he thought there had been something of harshness towards the gallant Admiral. If he was to be removed from his command, the thing should have been done with more consideration and courtesy : that would have been more creditable at all events to those who dismissed him. He gathered from what he had heard, that Sir Charles Napier had a plan of his own, which he was willing to carry out ; but the Lords of the Admiralty, sitting in their arm-chairs, thought they knew best how to deal out destruction to the enemy, and sent him their plan ; and if Sir Charles Napier considered that plan dangerous, he was perfectly justified—he would not say in remonstrating in improper terms—but in taking upon himself the responsibility of not carrying it out. What was the great evil at Balaklava ? That no one was properly responsible. They would have had another Balaklava had the fleet attempted to force its way into the Russian ports in the Baltic. The ships might perhaps have got in, but many of them would never have come out. There was one expression used by the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham) with reference to Sir Charles Napier, which he (Captain Scobell) thought he ought to recall. He referred to the use of the saying, “discretion is the better part of valour.” They all knew what that meant. Though he (Captain Scobell) did not know Sir Charles Napier himself, he well knew his career, and he maintained that considering the opportunities which he had had, that career would compare with that of any man who ever held command under Her Majesty ; and as the right hon. Baronet had given him a slur on that point on which no officer could bear a slur, he hoped he would rise in his place and say that he did not mean to impeach the gallant Admiral’s valour by attributing too much discretion to him. He would also observe that the right hon. Baronet fell into error in speaking of Admiral Hope as having hauled down his flag. Having been in the fleet referred to, he was able to state that the admiral’s flag was not hauled down. As regarded the correspondence of the Admiralty, he could produce letters written many years ago which were very curt ; and, though he would not call the Board an arbitrary one, he must say it was a Board which required more watching than almost any other Government department.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM : Sir, I am extremely obliged to the hon. and gallant Gentleman for having called my attention to the expression which he has referred to. If that expression, with reference to the discretion of Sir Charles Napier, can bear the interpretation which my hon. and gallant Friend has put upon it—and naval officers are rightly sensitive upon these points—I most willingly retract the expression, as it was not intended to convey any such imputation. Far from it. It would be an absurdity to raise such an imputation, for the entire life of the gallant Admiral falsifies it.

MR. MILNER GIBSON : Sir, the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Graham), in his reply to the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Malins), made some rather caustic observations relative to this question being brought under the notice of the House by a lawyer. I think, Sir, the experience of the right hon. Gentleman as First Lord of the Admiralty will suggest to his mind some very good reasons why naval officers should not put themselves prominently forward in disputes between the Board of Admiralty and those whom they employ. I quite agree that it is unreasonable to revive any more the old dinner at the Reform Club, and think it was unnecessary for the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite even to tell us of the dinner at the Mansion House. I am willing to pair off the dinner at the Mansion House with the dinner at the Reform Club, for in that respect I think the belligerents stand upon an equal footing. With regard to papers having been gashed, private letters quoted from, and public documents of great importance brought before this House without having been previously laid upon the table by the authority of the Government, all I have to say is, that the Motion before us is for papers, and when an hon. Member submits a Motion questioning the conduct of the Executive Government, he must make out a prima facie case; and for that purpose what can he refer to but documents? Does the right hon. Baronet dispute the accuracy of the quotations made by the hon. and learned Member opposite? No, he does not; but he questions the propriety of introducing such extracts, and I must say that he has shown a remarkable "discretion" in declining to go into those public papers, and to meet the quotations of the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford. I could not collect exactly what the present First Lord of the Admiralty said. I have been accustomed latterly to sit a good way from the Treasury bench, and now I am more distant than ever, but I understood the right hon. Gentleman to commence his speech by stating that he did not intend to advert to the subject immediately under discussion, but would say generally that the production of the papers in question was inconvenient to the public interests. Well, that is what I deem a curt reply. Now, Sir, I wish to know whether it is not possible to produce papers sufficient to throw light upon the matter as regards Sir Charles Napier's complaints, and yet not injure the public interests, by furnishing us with such extracts as may be necessary for the first purpose, but withholding, in accordance with the common practice, those parts that are likely to prove prejudicial to the interests of the country? Nothing is so common. No correspondence from the Foreign Office—no public document whatever—is moved for in this House except with a complete understanding that only extracts should be produced if any portion of such correspondence is injurious to the public interests. I certainly think that a similar rule might be followed in this case, and when we remember that the correspondence moved for dates only from the 20th of December, when Sir Charles Napier hauled down his flag, and therefore does not so immediately relate to the operations in the Baltic, that seems to be an additional reason why we should not have any difficulty in agreeing to the production of that correspondence. But what is the position of Sir Charles Napier? Has, I will ask, a naval officer no redress in this country? He has been, say what you please, censured by the Admiralty. It is understood by the country at large that the Government is not satisfied with his conduct. He now demands inquiry. He has assuredly a right to demand it, in justice to his own reputation. He goes in a proper way to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle, and asks for a court martial. It is refused. He next goes to the Prime Minister of the late, and also, I believe, to the Prime Minister of the present Government, and asks for inquiry. He is answered that there is no case for investigation. What resource, then, is there left to him but to come here? I ask, are we, the representatives of the interests and honour of England—if a public servant comes to us and tells us that he has made application in vain to the proper authorities, and has used without effect the legitimate means of redress, and that he only comes to us as a last resource, are we to turn upon him and say, "We will grant you no redress—we will look into no papers; it is very inconvenient to the country to interfere between the Executive and the officers whom it employs"? It appears that we cannot take such a course if we wish to discharge the duty which undoubtedly devolves upon us, to see not only that the Executive is fairly dealt with by its officers, but also that the public servants are fairly treated with by the Executive. There is such a thing, when great expectations have been excited, and when public disappointment follows the want of success, as shifting responsibility upon the public servants, and escaping from that fair share of blame which the Executive ought to bear. It is for us independent Members of Parliament to take care that unfortunate Administrations do not victimise faithful and zealous public servants who have endeavoured to discharge their duty, and who are not responsible for any part of the failure that may have occurred. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle, that my object in interfering in this matter is a public one. Undoubtedly, I have for some time past had a personal acquaintance with Sir Charles Napier; but if I had not, having read the documents to which the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite has adverted, I should unquestionably have felt it my duty to take a part in this discussion. Let me now refer to the despatch of the 4th of October, to which the right hon. Gentleman has alluded, and which was the first despatch that emanated from the Admiralty implying that they were dissatisfied with Sir Charles Napier's proceedings, and goading him on to an attack upon Sweaborg. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Graham) says, that the report of the fall of Sebastopol had no effect in inducing the Government to alter their orders, and to goad Sir Charles Napier to making an attack upon Sweaborg. Now, Sir, I hold the despatch in my hand. Undoubtedly, the word "Sebastopol" is not mentioned; but what are the contents of the despatch, given, be it observed, as the reason why Sir Charles Napier should attempt a hazardous enterprise against Sweaborg with his fleet alone, contrary to his own judgment, contrary to the judgment of the French admiral, and contrary to the judgment of the English general of engineers? Well, Sir, the 3rd of October was the day upon which the news of the fall of Sebastopol came to this country. The despatch from the Admiralty is dated the 4th, and it says, "Recent events in the Black Sea will not encourage the Russians to attempt any enterprise of more than usual hazard and daring at this precise moment." It may be said that referred to the battle of Alma; but it is very extraordinary, that as soon as it was discovered that Sebastopol was not taken, without waiting to see what was the result of the instructions of the 4th of October, out goes another despatch on the 9th, to tell Sir Charles Napier that all operations may be considered as concluded for the season, and ordering him to bring his ships away as fast as he could. That despatch was sent by telegraph. The French fleet was ordered to reunite with Sir Charles Napier when it was believed Sebastopol had fallen, but the moment the Admiralty discovered that Sebastopol had not fallen, it was telegraphed to the French fleet not to go back up the Baltic and rejoin Sir Charles Napier, for the season being at an end no further operations would be taken that year. This is inferential reasoning, but I maintain it affords a strong presumption that there was a sort of giddiness came over certain persons; that they fancied the Russians were demoralised and would not, "at that precise moment," undertake any great enterprise; and that, therefore, those expeditions which had been previously condemned were ordered to be attempted. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle has endeavoured to cast censure upon Sir Charles Napier, because, having first told the Government that Sweaborg was unassailable, in consequence of which they did not think it necessary to send out gun-boats and other appliances for the purpose of taking a place that was pronounced impregnable, and having afterwards stated that it could be taken by the fleet alone, he failed to accomplish that object, and therefore misled and disappointed the Government. I trust I am accurately repeating the right hon. Gentleman's statements? [Sir J. GRAHAM: To a certain extent.] I have no desire to misrepresent the right hon. Gentleman, but I am sure he said that Sir Charles Napier, in the first instance, informed the Government that Sweaborg was unassailable. What were the facts? Sir Charles Napier on the 30th of May received certain plans of Sweaborg. He had not then inspected nor even seen it himself, and as was his duty at the time, he forwarded those plans to the Admiralty with the observation that, according to those plans, Sweaborg appeared to be unassailable. But on the 20th of June, having had an opportunity of inspecting Sweaborg, he submitted a plan for taking it—a plan which required a description of force with which he was not then provided, and with which if he had been provided he considered he should have been successful; but he never said, in any part of that correspondence—and I have gone through it carefully—that he had any confidence in taking Sweaborg with a fleet alone. All he said was, if a certain additional force which he pointed out were intrusted to him, he was confident success would follow. I think I have answered the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. But, supposing Sir Charles Napier had submitted a plan for taking Sweaborg, he was acting in alliance with the French, and it was necessary for him in the operations in the Baltic to have the concurrence of the French Admiral. The council of war that was held unanimously decided that no operations in the Baltic could be undertaken with the resources they had, after the taking of Bomarsund. I may state to the House that after the taking of Bomarsund, the French Marshal, Baraguay d'Hilliers, being there, the French General of Engineers, General Niel, being there, and the French Admiral being there, they took into their consideration General Jones's report on some plan of military co-operation which he had submitted for the taking of Sweaborg. Now, Sir, the French Marshal, the French General of Engineers, and the French Admiral condemned that plan. It was, therefore, out of the question. General Jones's plan required the co-operation of French soldiers. The French Marshal condemned the plan, and would not allow his soldiers to be used for any such purpose, as he believed they would certainly be defeated, or at least, that great loss would ensue. Well, after the French military force had left the Baltic, and when General Jones's plan was entirely out of the question, out came an order from the English Government, ordering Sir Charles Napier to call a council of war to take it into consideration. Why, the means of carrying it into effect were absent—the French army was gone; and what seems so very strange is this—that the Government in England should have been so ill-informed of the movements of the French army, that after it had left the Baltic, and when General Jones's plan, therefore, was no longer practicable, they should have ordered Sir Charles Napier to call a council of war to take into consideration that very plan. That council was not—in fact it could not be—held. Another council of war, subsequently ordered, was held, at which the French and English Admirals were present. They decided that no operations with the fleet alone could be undertaken against Sweaborg, and that, indeed, it would not be advisable at that season to engage in any operations at all against any fortified place on the Russian coast. Now what is remarkable is, that the two generals of engineers reported how Sweaborg was to be taken; but I want to ask the naval officers in this House whether it is reasonable that these engineer generals should be allowed to control the conduct of admirals—whether they are fit persons to judge how admirals shall place their ships or carry on naval operations? But what made this particular case still more difficult to poor Sir Charles Napier was this—that the two generals were diametrically opposed to each other, and there was no person who so utterly condemned the plan of General Jones as General Niel. It is also a remarkable feature about the case that General Jones's plan, which may be called the military plan, was condemned by the French officers of the military service as well as by the French Admiral; while General Niel's plan, which was the plan for taking Sweaborg by ships alone, was condemned by the French Admiral. So we have the sailor's plan condemned by the highest naval authority, the French Admiral; and the soldiers' plan condemned by the highest military authority, the French Marshal; while poor Sir Charles Napier was censured by the Government because he did not, somehow or other, go in and take Sweaborg. I am fully convinced that Sir Charles Napier has not been fairly treated. If he had permitted himself to be goaded into some desperate enterprise, such as the attacking of a strong fortress like Sweaborg with a fleet alone, we should have had a greater disaster in the Baltic than, perhaps, any that has been even contemplated at Sebastopol. I think that Sir Charles Napier has as well deserved the thanks of this House for his conduct in the Baltic as Admiral Dundas has for his conduct in the Black Sea. I do say that this gallant officer, finding everybody complimented, everybody eulogised, and knowing that he has done his duty to his country to the best of his ability, has a right to complain that something like a reflection has been cast, not only upon him, but also upon the officers who served under him. I do hope that he may still receive that justice to which he is fairly entitled. I trust that we may have this correspondence in full, and it is my firm persuasion, unable as I now am to go through these papers, that if they be placed fairly before the public, and in the hands of hon. Members, an opinion will be formed that Sir Charles Napier has done his duty, but that the Government, disappointed in the success of the Baltic expedition, have endeavoured to make it appear that it was the fault of their admiral.

ADMIRAL BERKELEY said, he could not conceal from the House the regret with which he found himself placed in so painful a position. He had long since formed a friendship with Sir Charles Napier—a friendship which had been cemented by the services in which he had been associated with that gallant admiral, under whose command he had constantly been. He entertained the highest opinion of Sir Charles Napier's valour, and of his knowledge of war, and he esteemed the gallant officer as his friend. He did therefore feel that he stood in a painful position when it became his duty, as one of the Lords of the Admiralty, to find fault with and to condemn the conduct of that friend, and it was a duty which he would gladly have been spared the pain of undertaking. In the course of the discussion, private documents and public despatches had been referred to, and if he (Admiral Berkeley) had conceived it possible that private letters could have been brought forward in such a manner in that House, without the sanction of the writers, he would have come down prepared with those documents. It appeared to him that an attack had been made rather upon the late First Lord of the Admiralty (Sir J. Graham) than upon the Board generally. He (Admiral Berkeley) had not only been consulted by the right hon. Baronet the late First Lord of the Admiralty with respect to his public letters to Sir Charles Napier, but the right hon. Gentleman also did him the honour to confide to him the private letters which he addressed to the gallant admiral. He (Admiral Berkeley) had repeatedly assured Sir Charles Napier that if fault should be found with his conduct either in that House or elsewhere, because he had not attacked Sweaborg or Cronstadt, he (Admiral Berkeley) would stand up in his defence. Could it be supposed possible, then, that he would have consented to cast any censure upon the gallant officer? He denied having done so, and he denied also that the Board of Admiralty had ever censured Sir Charles Napier in any way with respect to his conduct and his management of the fleet before Cronstadt and Sweaborg. Having seen the papers relating to this subject, both public and private, it appeared to him that the case lay almost in a nutshell. The fact was, that Sir Charles Napier, who could use his pen as well as his sword, found that there was a strong feeling in this country because nothing had been attempted against the fortresses of Cronstadt and Sweaborg, and he then suddenly changed the tone of his correspondence with the Admiralty, and endeavoured to throw upon them the responsibility which he ought to have borne himself. He had seen with regret a memorial that had been placed in the hands of many hon. Members by Sir Charles Napier, containing a very unjust attack, which he had little expected from one whom he called his friend, and whom he might have supposed would have formed a very different opinion of his (Admiral Berkeley's) conduct. In the memorial which Sir Charles Napier had thought fit to circulate among Members of the House, he found this passage:—

"Your petitioner has been informed that there were two candidates for the command, with seats in the Admiralty. One was refused; the other got it. Surely they could not be impartial judges of the conduct of your petitioner."

He (Admiral Berkeley) had been a candidate for the command of the Baltic fleet as well as Sir Charles Napier, and the right hon. Baronet then at the head of the Admiralty, knowing his (Admiral Berkeley's) anxiety to go out, put to him this straightforward question:—"Do you think Sir Charles Napier is a proper man to go to the Baltic?" Did he (Admiral Berkeley) say that he thought himself or any other person more fit for the command? No; he said to the right hon. Baronet—who could contradict him if he was not stating the truth—"That if Sir Charles Napier went out in command he (Admiral Berkeley) would be only too happy to go out as second in command." Sir Charles Napier accused two Lords of the Admiralty of being unfit to be judges of his conduct. One of those officers was himself and the other was Admiral Dundas, who had been appointed to the command of the Baltic fleet. When he (Admiral Berkeley) asked for the command of that fleet, he was told by the right hon. Baronet then at the head of the Admiralty, that his services were required at the Admiralty, and that he could not be spared. Admiral Dundas never applied for the command of the fleet, but was chosen to command it by the right hon. Baronet at his (Admiral Berkeley's) request. He thought, therefore, Sir Charles Napier must admit that one part of his statement was altogether incorrect, as were also other portions of the memorial. Reference had been made during the discussion to a Committee which sat a year or two ago, but no private letters were produced to that Committee, and he (Admiral Berkeley) had refused to answer questions put to him by the Committee, because they related to conversations which he regarded as private, and his objection was allowed. He must say there was no pleasing some parties. If fault were found with generals or admirals, the Government were immediately blamed because they did not recall such incapable persons, without giving them the opportunity of defending themselves; and now, because the Board of Admiralty did not think fit again to employ Sir Charles Napier in the Baltic, they were held up to public obloquy. Although he still felt and professed that friendship for Sir Charles Napier which he could not forget, though he thought it had been violated by the gallant admiral, he believed, whether these papers were granted or not, that the most unfortunate thing Sir Charles Napier could do, with respect to his character as an officer fit to command a fleet, would be to stir up this question, for the more it was searched into the worse would the gallant Admiral's case appear.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that there was no act of injustice, of oppression, or of iniquity that could be perpetrated upon any officer in Her Majesty's service that might not be defended by the arguments which had been used by the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir J. Graham). The hon. and gallant Member who last addressed the House said, in effect, that he could not refer to the papers, and, therefore, he would not go into the question, that it was impossible to understand the matter fully without looking into the papers, that he never would look into them, and that by no possibility should the House be able to understand the truth of the case. What then was Sir Charles Napier to do? He felt insulted and aggrieved; he submitted his case to that House, and why? The gallant Admiral (Sir Charles Napier) informed him that, touched to the quick by the unjust treatment he had received from the Admiralty, he sought for inquiry, but inquiry was refused. He then applied formally for a court-martial, but that was likewise denied him. He then sought for an interview with the Prime Minister, and asked for redress. The noble Lord said some complimentary things which meant nothing, but redress was still withheld. What, then, was the gallant Admiral to do? He could only submit his case to that

House, and rest content with their decision. Now, what was the case? The gallant Admiral—a man like every one of his race, of honour and chivalry, of high spirit, of great experience—was selected, and wisely selected, he (Mr. Whiteside) considered, by the Admiralty to be placed in command of Her Majesty's fleet on a great occasion. He was covered with the praises of that Admiralty, and the same system of panegyric was continued up to the month of September. On the 25th of September the gallant officer sent to the Admiralty an elaborate document, which very properly had not been read, in which he told them there were two modes of discharging the duty confided to him. He (Mr. Whiteside) did not complain of the Admiralty for exercising their judgment upon that document, but he wished to know why it was that they praised the gallant Admiral up to the 25th of September, and then turned round and told him, "From this day forth we find it impossible to express any satisfaction with you, on account of the decision you have come to on a matter not properly belonging to you to determine?" What was the conduct of the gallant Admiral? The soundness of his decision having been confirmed by a council of officers, he respectfully submitted to the Admiralty that the judgment which he had originally formed was right, and he ventured to suggest that the meaning of the document of the 25th of September had been misunderstood or perverted. He respectfully asked them to withdraw the insulting letter, but they said "No;" and when he further addressed them in language, implying that he no longer possessed their confidence, and that if he deserved the terms in which that letter was couched he was not a fit person to command the fleet, he still received no satisfactory answer. He was, therefore, driven from the Admiralty. Then he appealed to the First Lord of the Treasury, but, as he (Mr. Whiteside) had previously stated, found no redress, and now the representatives of the nation were called on to say that he should get no redress anywhere, because the papers which were asked for his vindication were private papers which ought not to be produced. He could recollect, however, an occasion on which two letters were asked for in that House, the writers of which said they were not public but private letters, and should not be produced, but which, notwithstanding, were moved for and produced in order that they might be used against an hon. Gentleman sitting on the Opposition side of the House. The present First Lord of the Admiralty had told them that the papers now moved for ought not to be produced because their publication would be injurious to the public service, not seeming to be aware that the papers asked for were those dated subsequently to the 20th of December.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he had stated that as the papers discussed the plan for taking Sweaborg it would be injurious to the public service to have such details produced to the House.

MR. WHITESIDE : That statement convinced him that the right hon. Gentleman had not read the terms of the Motion, because the terms of the Motion excluded those dates which embraced the plans for the reduction of Sweaborg. The right hon. Gentleman had been so suddenly and so lately transferred from the Board of Control to the Admiralty that he was unaware of the fact that the papers asked for excluded those containing the plans and operations to which he had referred, and that therefore their production could not possibly be injurious to the public interest. The papers moved for by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Wallingford were not to be granted because the Minister told them it would be an inconvenience. In the war in which they were engaged they expected to gain victories and to achieve triumphs, but they could hardly expect to find men who had a high sense of honour engage in the service of their country with a chivalrous and devoted spirit if they persisted in denying them, when insulted and injured, that justice to which they were entitled.

MR. W. COWPER said, he rose to make an observation on what had just been stated by the hon. and learned Member for Enniskillen, with reference to the refusal to produce the letters dated after the 20th of December. He believed it would be highly imprudent to produce the letters written subsequently to the 20th December, because in those letters Sir Charles Napier had reproduced the facts and opinions he had stated in his former correspondence ; and the publication of those facts and opinions could not take place without detriment to the public service, at a period when we were preparing another expedition to the Baltic. He therefore trusted that the House would not insist on the production of those papers. He certainly had never been more surprised than on hearing the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman who had introduced the Motion, because that hon. and learned Gentleman had produced official documents containing the confidential statements of officers, with regard to the strength of hostile fortresses. He alluded more particularly to the disclosures made by the hon. and learned Gentleman of the opinions of General Jones and General Niel, and he would appeal to the House whether those opinions ought to have been made public at the present moment. The hon. and learned Member for Wallingford had incurred all the blame of this indiscretion for the sake of a case in which he had entirely failed ; for his object was to prove that Sir Charles Napier had been dismissed, and censured. But he (Mr. Cowper) denied the accuracy of that statement. The gallant Admiral had not been dismissed, for after the fleet had been dispersed his command had naturally ceased, and it would have been a very strange proceeding to have kept him still in full pay with his flag flying. The hon. and learned Gentleman complained of the curtness of the terms in which the gallant Admiral had been informed that his command had ceased ; but he (Mr. Cowper) should observe that those terms had been framed in strict conformity with precedent. There was the precedent of the case of Admiral Hope, in 1812, which had been already mentioned ; and there was a second precedent in the case of Sir Graham Moore, who, on his return from the Baltic in 1814, had been addressed in precisely the same terms. Sir Charles Napier had not been dismissed, and neither had he been censured. The fact seemed to be that the gallant Admiral had not received the amount of praise he thought he had deserved. But was the House of Commons to undertake to decide whether or not Sir Charles Napier had been sufficiently praised by the Admiralty ? He submitted that that was not at all a proper subject for the consideration of that House. The Board of Admiralty must be the best judges of the merits of officers acting under their command ; and it should be remembered that in that case the Board were naturally possessed in favour of an officer whom they had themselves appointed, and on whom the hon. Baronet at their head had bestowed the most special praise. Sir Charles Napier, at the Mansion House, had complained that he had been supplied with neither pilots nor charts. But the fact was that he had had on board his fleet 100 persons more or less able to act as pilots, and that he had had seven such persons in his own flagship. With respect to the charts he (Mr. Cowper) had only to state that the fleet had been supplied with the best charts in existence, and the same as those used in the French service. He regretted extremely that the gallant Admiral had taken the course he had chosen in that matter. But Sir Charles Napier, so far as he knew, had but one enemy, and that enemy was himself; and he had done so much to destroy his own reputation that no other person's reputation but his could have borne it.

MR. MURROUGH said, that the question was, whether the British public would submit to have the character of an officer who had long served his country and had long been a favourite with the country stamped with disgrace by a Ministry without due consideration? The hon. Gentleman who last spoke denied that there had been a want of pilots or of charts with the Baltic fleet; but he forgot to tell the House that the pilots sent out were utterly unacquainted with the navigation of the Baltic, and that they were sent home again because they were perfectly useless. Then, again, with regard to the charts, they were so faulty that the officers were obliged to use other charts, purchased at their own expense. The case of Admiral Saumarez had been alluded to, but it should be recollect ed that his recall was only temporary. The country, however, knew very well what was meant by the recall of Sir Charles Napier; the country felt satisfied that it was a matter of great convenience to the Admiralty to remove Admiral Dundas from one situation and place him in another, and that there was no other mode of effecting that object but by getting rid of Sir Charles Napier. It was unjust to sacrifice in this way an old servant of the country, and the least the House could do was to grant the papers moved for.

MR. BENTINCK said, he entirely dis sented from the observation of the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. Cowper), that the question brought under their considera tion was, whether or not Sir Charles Napier had been sufficiently praised by the Board of Admiralty. He (Mr. Bentinck) should say that the Motion involved a subject of much greater interest and importance than that. In the present state of the discussion, however, and in the absence of the documents necessary to enable them to arrive at a decision upon the question, he would abstain from any attempt to define its merits. But he would observe that, painful as were all discussions of a personal character, he rejoiced that that matter had been brought under their notice, because he believed that it must contribute to direct their attention to a subject of the utmost importance—namely, the practice which prevailed in this country from time immemorial of placing civilians at the head of our great naval and military departments. He readily acknowledged the great capacity and experience of the right hon. Baronet the late First Lord of the Admiralty; but he would ask the House whether it would be possible to conceive anything more anomalous and even more disadvantageous to the public service, as well as to the reputation of the right hon. Baronet himself, than that he, a civilian, should be placed in such an office that he would have to decide over a fire in a room in Whitehall upon the mode in which distant naval operations had been, or were to be, conducted. He (Mr. Bentinck) believed that the discussion which had taken place that evening, and the Committee of inquiry into the state of the army before Sebastopol, would have the effect of laying the axe to the root of our present system of administering the business of our military and naval departments.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the case, as presented to the House, appeared to him to lie in a very narrow compass. The hon. and learned Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins) grounded it upon the fact that Sir Charles Napier had been dismissed and censured, and he said it was due, as a matter of justice to the character of that distinguished officer, that the correspondence which had taken place since a certain period should be laid before the House. The foundation of the case was Sir Charles Napier's having been dismissed or censured, or both. Now, as he (the Attorney General) understood the facts—and, not having seen the statement of the gallant Admiral, he had had no means of becoming acquainted with them except from the discussion that evening—Sir Charles Napier, upon his return to this country, instead of being continued in his command, received from the Admiralty an order to haul down his flag. That was called by the gallant Admiral and his friends a dismissal; and further it was said that the letter implied a censure upon the gallant officer. In the first place he apprehended that that was no dismissal of Sir Charles Napier, but that his command had terminated in the ordinary course of things. The fleet which he had commanded had been called home and dispersed. It had ceased to be a fleet, and with the termination of its existence as a fleet terminated also, in the natural course of things, and according to the universal practice of the Admiralty, the command of the officer who had been at its head. He received a letter which might if they chose be called rather curt than courteous, but which it appeared to him (the Attorney General) was in the usual form in which the Admiralty called upon an officer to haul down his flag. It was clear, therefore, that the facts did not constitute a dismissal, and that the letter did not amount to a censure. But suppose the gallant Admiral had been dismissed, was the Executive Government of this country, acting on behalf of the Crown, to be told that if it ceased to have full confidence in the capacity of an officer it was not justified in recalling him? What could be more difficult or more delicate than to determine whether an officer was entitled to the full confidence of the authority which employed him? Surely it was within the province and within the duty of the Board of Admiralty, at any time, if it thought proper, to recall an officer; and though the recall might imply a certain amount of distrust, it might not imply a want of confidence, neither did it necessarily involve a censure. He apprehended that an officer who was recalled was not warranted in demanding an inquiry or a court-martial. The recall amounted to nothing more than an expression that the Government had no confidence—not in his courage, that might be undoubted—not in his qualities as a seaman, those might be unquestioned—but in his discretion, in his energy, or in some one or other of those qualities which went to constitute a great commander, and in which a man might be to a certain extent deficient, and yet might be a most distinguished and meritorious officer. Here it did not amount to that. The gallant officer was not recalled; his command terminated with the dispersion of his fleet, and it must be in the sole province of the Executive to say whether or not a command should be continued to a particular officer. As for censure, the letter certainly contains none, and the hon. and learned Gentleman who made this Motion had himself read a letter in which the Admiralty expressed their satisfaction with Sir Charles Napier. Of what, then, did he complain? Why, that he was not again sent to the Baltic. It was said that the papers now asked for involved nothing the publication of which would be detrimental to the public service. He (the Attorney General) was informed that this was a complete mistake. Sir Charles Napier, thinking that his merits had not been sufficiently recognised, entered into a discussion of the subject, and a correspondence ensued, in which he was told that the question whether or not the attack upon Sweaborg ought to have been made was fully gone into; and the House was told, both by the late and by the present First Lord of the Admiralty, that this correspondence went into details the publication of which would be most prejudicial to the public service. Those who supported this Motion having failed to make out that Sir Charles Napier had been either dismissed or censured, he asked what there was in the position in which the gallant officer stood in relation to the Admiralty which could justify the production of documents which could not be produced without detriment to the public service? Had he in any letter or despatch from the Admiralty been censured for want of courage, of conduct, or of a due regard to the duty he had to perform, he would have been entitled to an inquiry, and if he could not obtain it in the ordinary way, he would have had a right, as every Englishman had, to appeal to the great inquest of the country. As it was, he thought that no case had been made out for the production of these documents.

MR. OTWAY said, he could not consent to place this question upon the narrow ground taken up by the hon. and learned Attorney General, for there were occasions when not to be praised was tantamount to being censured, where an officer of the navy was exercising high command. The Government had proposed a vote of thanks to Admiral Dundas, for his services in the Black Sea; but, when Sir Charles Napier returned from the Baltic, no notice was taken of the circumstance. The hon. and learned Attorney General had said that the Board of Admiralty had accorded him their thanks, but those thanks were not given voluntarily, but were extracted from them by the letter written by the gallant Admiral. He (Mr. Otway) confessed, when he came down to the House, he laboured under a very different impression with respect to the services of Sir Charles Napier than that which he now entertained. Before he came down that night, he believed all the world had been told that nothing had been done in the Baltic, although the gallant Admiral had carte blanche to do what he pleased, and go where he pleased. If, however, the operations in the Baltic had not been as successful as was expected, what was the reason? Was not the cause to be attributed to the description of vessels employed, and the armaments used? A noble Lord, a Member of that House, now no more, had repeatedly put questions to the Government, and he (Mr. Otway) had done the same, with reference to the equipment of the Baltic fleet, but they had always been put off with answers from the First Lord of the Admiralty that everything should be done to fit out the fleet in the most efficient manner. With regard to the Motion before the House for the production of the papers, he would vote in its favour, because the most essential portion of them had already been divulged, and he thought there could be no well-founded objection against publishing them.

SIR GEORGE TYLER said, he thought that Sir Charles Napier had not been fairly treated. At the same time the order to haul down his flag did not strike him (Sir G. Tyler) in the character of a dismissal, because, according to the regulations of the service, in the case of a fleet which had been employed upon a particular service, it was a common occurrence that, when the service was performed and the fleet returned, the flag was as a matter of course hauled down. He felt as a naval officer—although, like the hon. and gallant Admiral the Member for Christchurch (Admiral Walcott), he was supposed to be too old for service—that if this had occurred to himself he should have considered it a hardship. At the same time he gave to the gallant Admiral every credit for the manner in which he had conducted that magnificent fleet. The gallant Admiral felt it to be impossible to adopt the plan which the Admiralty at home thought it expedient to determine. He, of course, being upon the spot, was the best judge. He (Sir G. Tyler) thought that the despatch after the taking of Bomarsund, in which it was said that the Admiralty approved highly of the gallant Admiral's conduct, but that they could not entirely express their satisfaction that he did not go to Sweaborg, might appear as a censure to the individual to whom it was addressed, and he had no doubt but that the gallant Admiral felt it so, without its having been intended as one by those who sent it. In conclusion, he begged to defend the naval officers against the insinuation which had been thrown out against them by the right hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. M. Gibson), that they would not take up such a case as the present. He was quite certain that these hon. and gallant Members were as independent as the right hon. Gentleman himself, and he (Sir G. Tyler) was ready on that and on any other occasion to offer an independent opinion to the House.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I confess, Sir, that I have listened to this discussion with much regret, for I think it is setting a bad example that hon. Gentlemen who feel themselves called upon to vindicate the character of professional men in this House should, in doing so, read to us portions of particular documents, while, at the same time, they call upon the House to determine whether those documents shall be produced or not. This is a way of begging the question, and endeavouring to obtain an object by a sidewind, which is not, I think, advisable for this House to pursue. With regard to the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman, the House must agree that there are good and sufficient reasons why it is injurious to the interests of the country that the documents should be produced, and, therefore, I shall undoubtedly give my vote against the proposition. I think the hon. and learned Gentleman has made a mistake in discretion in the course he has pursued with reference to this subject. I also think another hon. and learned Gentleman has also made a mistake, and, led away by the similarity of the names, has mistaken Admiral Dundas who is going to the Baltic, as the same Admiral Dundas who has lately returned from the Black Sea. Perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman is not aware that, in this country, and in the north especially, there are persons of the same name who are not the same persons, and, in fact, who bear no relation to each other. I have had the pleasure and honour of long acquaintance with the gallant Admiral who is the subject of this discussion, and as an admirer of his professional and personal character, it would have been a matter of sincere regret to me if he had been either censured or dismissed for his conduct when in charge of an important command. But I think it is clearly established that the gallant Admiral has neither been censured nor dismissed. And when the hon. and learned Gentleman who brought forward this Motion quotes the opinion which I expressed in another place as to the professional merits and distinguished qualities of Sir Charles Napier, I tell him that I retract none of those opinions, and that I am proud to say the courage, gallantry, professional skill, and ability of my distinguished friend, as I must still call him, stand as high now as at the moment when I made those observations. It has been my fortune, upon former occasions, to profit by the valuable services of Sir Charles Napier. On those occasions the gallant Admiral rendered most important services by the able and distinguished manner in which he performed his duty; and it is only due to him to say, that nothing has occurred in the last year to diminish, in the slightest degree, the high character which he has deservedly obtained for having done great and important services to his country. Sir Charles Napier has rendered important service to the country in the command of the Baltic fleet. He has shown the greatest skill in the conduct of that fleet through the most difficult and dangerous navigation in the world, and he has brought home that most magnificent fleet without any injury, under circumstances in which, if it had been under the command of one less skilled than my gallant friend, it might have sustained great damage and disaster; and he has secured this country against all those evils which might have arisen if the Baltic fleet of Russia had come out of port and scoured the seas. Whilst I say that I cannot agree to this Motion, I wish it to be understood that, in proposing to negative it, I do not consider myself as in the slightest degree casting any slur upon the reputation of Sir Charles Napier. On the contrary, I think that his character stands as high as it ever did, and I have no doubt that he will continue to rank amongst the most distinguished members of the naval profession.

SIR JOHN WALSH said, he thought the friends of Sir Charles Napier ought to be satisfied with the result of the night's debate, and that the testimony borne to the merits of the gallant Admiral from all sides of the House, and particularly by the noble Lord the First Minister of the Crown, must be most gratifying to his feelings. He considered Sir Charles Napier had shown in his command in the Baltic not only discretion, but that great moral courage which induced him to stand up for his own opinions and to act on his own discretion and judgment. He hoped his hon. and learned Friend would not press his Motion to a division.

MR. MALINS, in reply, said, he would not encroach on the time of the House at any great length. He believed that the noble Lord's (Viscount Palmerston's) declaration, that he thought as highly of Sir Charles Napier now as he ever had done, had taken the House somewhat by surprise, for no one could doubt that the gallant Admiral had now been dismissed from his command, at whatever time the dismissal might have taken place, because another admiral had been appointed to it. As the thanks of the House had been voted to Admiral Dundas, he thought, if the noble Lord were sincere, that he ought to move a vote of thanks to Sir Charles Napier, who had gained a signal victory in the destruction of Bomarsund. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham) had made it a matter of observation that this question had been brought forward by a lawyer, by an equity lawyer. He (Mr. Malins) had brought the subject forward, not as a professional man, but as one of the representatives of the people. This shot from the Admiralty seemed a favourite one, for the present First Lord had followed it up in somewhat the same strain. Now, as it was his profession to hold briefs in the morning, the right hon. Gentleman seemed to think he could do nothing but hold briefs in the evening. He had brought forward this Motion, because he thought a distinguished officer had been treated in a most unworthy and undignified manner. The hon. and gallant Member for Gloucester (Admiral Berkeley) said that the more Sir Charles Napier stirred this matter the worse it would be for him; but he thought that the stirring which the matter had already received did not bear out that assertion, and that after the discussion which had taken place that night, Sir Charles Napier would stand before the public in a very different position from that which he had previously occupied. If ever the day arrived when the production of this correspondence would not be detrimental to the public service, he would, if he still had the honour of a seat in that House, do his best to have it produced; for he was convinced that, when it was produced, it would redound to the high honour of Sir Charles Napier, and to the discredit of those who had endeavoured to impugn that honour. When the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston), the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Graham), and the hon. and learned Attorney General asserted that Sir Charles Napier had not been dismissed, and had not been censured, they must, surely, have forgotten the October correspondence. Up to that date, the Government had continued to express their satisfaction at his proceedings, but then, supposing that Sebastopol had fallen, they wrote that which any officer who received it must have considered as a censure. It must have been forgotten by the framers of the letter that the determination not to attack Sveaborg was not only the determination of Sir Charles Napier, but also of the French general and of the French admiral, and that in censuring Sir Charles Napier they were also censuring those gallant officers. It was apparent from the whole tone of the correspondence that Sir Charles Napier had been censured, and the letter of the 22nd of December, when interpreted by that of the 26th, showed that he had been dismissed. He (Mr. Malins) denied that he had set a bad example by reading extracts from the correspondence. When a distinguished officer had been treated with contempt, and, an inquiry into his conduct by court-martial having been refused, he applied to that House for redress, it would have a most lamentable effect upon the public service if the House were to sanction the principle that no part of the correspondence which had passed between that officer and the Government should be referred to. He had now, however, to consider what course he ought to adopt with regard to a division. When the Government had pledged their word before Parliament that the documents for which he moved could not be produced without injury to the public service, he was bound to attend to their intimation. The discussion had produced a most beneficial effect, and he trusted Sir Charles Napier would be satisfied with its result; for, under all the circumstances, he thought he ought not to press the Motion to a division.

The House adjourned at half after Twelve o'clock.

THE TICKET-OF-LEAVE SYSTEM.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, he rose to call the attention of their Lordships and of the Government to the great social question involved in the system of granting tickets of leave to convicts under sentence of transportation. Their Lordships were aware that when it had been determined, as a matter of necessity, that transportation as a system should in a great measure be put an end to, the question which had to be solved was, what other punishment could, in the present state of society, be substituted for it. Although it had been found that no punishment was so much dreaded by criminals as actual transportation, the country had no choice in the matter, because the Colonies, which had up to that period received our convicts, were determined to receive them no longer. Accordingly, it was decided that convicts whose term of transportation did not exceed seven or ten years, should undergo in its stead what was called "penal servitude," and by the 16 & 17 Vict., power was given to the Government to grant licences to any person under sentence of transportation, who had undergone certain portions of their sentences, to go for the remainder of the term to any part of the United Kingdom to which they were authorised by their tickets of leave—the limit being the United Kingdom and the Channel Islands. He mentioned this, because an opinion prevailed that convicts were allowed, on the tickets of leave, to go to the Colonies; but this was not so. The system was, of course, one which was open to many very grave objections, and required the most careful attention that could be bestowed on it. The determination which had been come to was, that, in cases where persons were sentenced to be transported for seven years, if they behaved well for three years, they received a ticket of leave, and those who were under sentence of transportation for ten years received a ticket if they behaved well during four years. In the first place, he need not point out to the House that the great object in punishment was certainty, which all authorities who were acquainted with the subject acknowledged was of more importance than severity; but this was not attained under the present ticket-of-leave system, as every man who heard himself sentenced to seven or ten years' transportation knew that such a sentence was a sham, and that his punishment, in reality, extended only to three or four years. This was a great evil, though, perhaps, it might be felt that it could not be remedied. Of course, the person who knew that he could shorten his term by good behaviour would submit to it—as he must in any case—and, of course, his great object would be to obtain the favour of the chaplain, because his good report, with that of the governor's, would shorten the duration of his term of imprisonment. He was curious to know the number of men who had served for three or four years who had been denied tickets of leave on account of misconduct. He believed that the number would be found to be very small. What did this prove? Why, that the men conducted themselves well during the time they were in prison; but it was well known a great number of these men relapsed the moment they obtained their release. No person could therefore doubt but that either the whole of the conduct of these men during three or four years was a sham in order to obtain their freedom, or that, when they had obtained their freedom, the temptations to which they were exposed were too powerful for them to withstand. There was a regulation in the present system that had a pernicious effect on the men; it was the following—a sum of money was given to the men on their release, and, although this was only a few pence per day for the time they had laboured, still on the average it amounted to 5*l.* or 6*l.*, and in many cases it reached 10*l.*, 12*l.*, and even 14*l.*, which it was said was given to the men in two sums. But if men, who had not had 3*d.* for three or four years, during which time they had been in prison under restraint and discipline, found themselves at liberty in the possession of 5*l.* or 7*l.*, what must be the inevitable consequence? Why, unless they were really reformed, they would soon relapse into their former course of living—when they regained their liberty they immediately indulged in excess, and there was no power or inducement which could be supposed to induce them to abstain. In the case of soldiers and sailors who were paid after a long absence from home, the riot and debauchery in which they indulged were too well known; but the soldier or sailor, after having so indulged, could return to his ship or his regiment; but this was not the case with the convict, who was often prevented, by having given way to such excess, from obtaining a situation in the establishment of a worthy master. In 1854 a report was submitted to their Lordships, in which it was stated, that from October, 1853, to June, 1854, there had been 1,000 convicts released with tickets of leave, and that at that time there were 5,686 convicts undergoing their provisional confinement. Out of these 1,000 only four licences had been revoked; and from this Colonel Jebb drew a conclusion greatly in favour of the ticket-of-leave system, as in the ordinary cases of criminals who were released, after having undergone their term of imprisonment, nearly three-quarters of the whole numbers relapsed into their former course of crime. The only reason that he (Lord St. Leonards) could give for this great disparity between the numbers was, that the Government had not kept sufficient watch over the convicts, so as to enable them to know the working of the system. He did not mean, however, to say, that the convicts should be continually dodged; for he maintained that nothing could be more injudicious, after having given a man a ticket of leave than to place a policeman to follow him wherever he went in order to obtain employment, and to point him out whenever he made an application for work. This made a mockery of the system, and he therefore had raised his voice against it. But there was a great difference between dodging a man and taking due note of him, so as to have a check upon him; and this ought to be done not only for the sake of the man, but for the sake of society at large. From the last returns he could state that there were 5,686 convicts in confinement under sentence of transportation, and there were also 2,369 out on tickets of leave, and he would venture to say, that the Government knew no more of the doings of these men than he himself did. This, however, was not right, either to the men themselves or to society. He had taken the liberty, on former occasions, of pointing out that it was the bounden duty of the Government to take measures for ascertaining what became of these persons. There would be no difficulty in effecting that object; the very newspapers of the day would furnish them with information as to the number of prisoners who had been convicted a second time. He also objected to the system in which the discharges were made. He had made an inquiry with reference to a particular case; and the answer was, that the individual in question was discharged with 247 more under a general order of the Secretary of State, having no reference to particular cases; there ought, on the contrary, to be especial reference to every particular case; and these men ought not to be discharged in hundreds in this indiscriminate manner. There could be no doubt that the present system of granting tickets of leave caused an increase of crime. That such had been its effect appeared to be the opinion of Mr. Serjeant Adams, who had had considerable experience of the working of the system as a judge at the Middlesex sessions, where no fewer than one-ninth of all the criminal cases arising in England and Wales were tried. Mr. Serjeant Adams found great fault with the ticket-of-leave system, and maintained that its introduction had led to the recommitment of crime by the same offenders to a very considerable extent; and, from the manner in which the system was carried into operation, it was only natural to expect that it should produce such a result. The administration of the system might not be responsible for the whole of the cases in which relapses into crime occurred among convicts who had obtained tickets of leave; but there was no doubt they were responsible for a certain proportion of their number, and particularly for those of very young persons, who might be saved from falling again into vice if they were properly looked after. In one case, for instance, a boy who had been seven times committed to the same prison, and been absolutely steeped in crime up to his sixteenth year, was, at the age of eighteen, well dressed, and, with a few pounds in his pocket, thrown upon the world again under a ticket of leave, but with no protecting eye over him. He ought either to have been made to undergo a longer period of imprisonment under which there might be greater hopes of his improvement, or until he could be placed under the care of some master who would preserve him from relapsing into his former depraved habits; but to send him back to the haunts of crime seemed to him a mere mockery—he could only be thrown back upon his old associations without any possibility of saving himself. It was obvious that such a system could not be attended with salutary results. Last Session he (Lord St. Leonards) had moved for a return of the number of convicts liberated under tickets of leave who had subsequently relapsed into crime, and the answer made by the Home Office was, that that department possessed no means of affording the required information. Why did the Government not send a list of the persons admitted to tickets of leave to the different quarter sessions and assizes held throughout the country, and then a return could easily be furnished to them of all the cases in which such persons were again convicted? Instead of doing that, however, the authorities at the Home Office had produced an incomplete return, including such cases only as were known to the department, at the same time alleging that the whole number could not be accurately stated for want of the supervision requisite for such a purpose. Now, until a list of these persons was regularly kept it would be impossible for the ticket-of-leave system to work satisfactorily. The Government ought certainly to keep some control of surveillance over these men, in order to be able to inform the country how the system worked, what good and what injury it did; and he was quite sure that if this were done, if these men knew that the Government was watching them, not with an unfriendly eye, but as the head of a family would watch an erring son, with an earnest desire to see him keeping in the right path—they would be strengthened and encouraged in their efforts to persevere in honesty and good conduct. He, therefore, trusted that the Government would be able to inform him that they had some scheme in preparation for the supervision of these ticket-of-leave men and for obtaining complete and accurate information with respect to them. The noble and learned Lord then moved—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for a Return in Continuance of the Return of the 18th July, 1864, in pursuance of an Address of the 1st June, 1864: And also, Return of the Names of Prisoners sentenced to Transportation who did not receive Tickets of Leave with other like Prisoners on account of misconduct in Prison."

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I can assure the noble and learned Lord that the Government regret quite as much as he can do the necessity for reverting to a system of this kind and for abandoning the system of transportation, which, when it could be carried out effectually, and when the services of the convicts were accepted by the colonists, was the best of all secondary punishments. But they were now left to a choice of evils, for the alarm which is felt at home at the evil effects of a different system shows how difficult it was to force upon the colonists a course to which they so strongly objected. Even the noble and learned Lord did not blame the Government for making the experiment they had made—for it was only an experiment. I regret to say that it is not in my power to give the noble and learned Lord an assurance that the Government have in preparation any new scheme by which they can obtain more complete information with regard to the doings of the ticket-of-leave men. The noble and learned Lord has pointed out some of the evils of this system, which to a certain extent I am compelled to admit. I have brought down with me the report to which the noble and learned Lord referred, and I have glanced over several passages which it was my intention to read to your Lordships, but I feel that I should be trespassing upon your Lordships' time by doing so, and will, therefore, content myself by expressing a hope that, on so important a question as this, your Lordships will read through the whole of this very valuable paper. I think it shows that the alarm expressed by the noble and learned Lord on the subject of the new system is in some degree exaggerated, considering that the number of criminals released under the present system is small in comparison with those formerly released from the hulks, and that there is reason to believe that the men who have gone through the reformatory education for three or four years at present provided must come out much better than those who were formerly subjected to the demoralising influences of the hulks. I think, too, the noble and learned Lord has somewhat exaggerated the sum of money with which each man comes out. Though some men may have more, the general average, I believe, is between 5*l.* and 6*l.*, and that I think is about the sum you would give to a man who was going out afresh into the world to give him a chance of earning an honest livelihood without being exposed to the risk of starvation or of dissipation at the commencement. As to the uncertainty of punishment which the noble and learned Lord complained was an effect of the present system, though I should not venture to put my opinion in opposition to his, I certainly always understood that the uncertainty of detection and the uncertainty of conviction when detected, have ever most strongly acted upon the mind of the criminal in the commission of his crimes, and I think that the slight amount of additional uncertainty now introduced—in other words, the prospect of having the term of punishment shortened in case of good behaviour—is very much counterbalanced by the reformatory influences to which the criminal under the new system is now subjected. The noble and learned Lord objected to the police being instructed to "dodge" these ticket-of-leave men; but I can only say that only one case of this sort has ever come under the notice of the Home Office, and it was found, on inquiry, to be entirely without foundation. I feel convinced that the noble and learned Lord, in bringing forward a question of such great social importance, has been actuated by no party motives, but simply by a desire to assist the Government, and therefore if I could, I would not trouble your Lordships, by going into the details of that case, but I must submit that it is impossible for you to be guided in your opinion of a system of this description by one solitary case. I think it is impossible to look at the report to which I have referred, at the letters from the chaplains, and the letters received by them, without seeing that there is the greatest possible interest felt in the welfare of all the persons who are released under this system. What I look to most in the noble and learned Lord's speech is the suggestions made by him, which I think will be of use to the Government. These, as I understood, were that there should be a strict surveillance over these men, and that the Government should take more effective means for obtaining information with regard to them. It appears to me to be a most difficult thing to draw a line between the objection which the noble and learned Lord takes to the dodging of the police, and the supervision which he would establish. It is a fact the police are instructed to keep their eyes upon these men, but to go further than this would be defeating the very object which we all have in view. The men so dodged would become as it were marked men in the eyes of their fellow-workmen, and would find it much more difficult to obtain employment. With regard to the want of information of which the noble and learned Lord complains, I am glad to be able to inform him that within the last three or four weeks Sir G. Grey has taken every step in his power to obtain the most accurate information upon this very point, and I think I can answer for him that not only will that information be at the orders of the Government, but that the Government will make every possible use of it in ascertaining whether any further steps are required for the alteration of the present system.

EARL GREY : I am sure your Lordships are greatly indebted to the noble and learned Lord for having brought this very important subject under your attention. This subject is a growing one ; and you are beginning to feel the evils which I anticipated, and against which I warned you, when you passed the Act abolishing transportation some two years ago ; and I am persuaded that if Parliament and the Government are not very careful, these evils, instead of being exaggerated, as my noble Friend above me would have us think, are only the commencement of far greater ills. I concur with the noble and learned Lord that the abolition of transportation was a great misfortune. There can be no doubt, from the evidence which reaches us from various quarters, that transportation, as regulated of late years, did ensure the great ends of punishment more completely than any other system which has yet been devised. It undoubtedly deterred from crime those who were disposed to become criminals, and it no less certainly provided a means by which criminals could return to society and earn an honest living. There can be no doubt that a much larger proportion of men who had gone through a proper system of punishment in this country, and were then sent out to the Colonies under judicious regulations with tickets of leave, became better members of society than was the case with criminals treated in any other way that had been tried. As for the inconveniences, there never was a greater mistake than that into which his noble and learned Friend had fallen. It should be recollected that in this country convicts liberated do meet with difficulties in the way of leading a reformed life, with whatever guards you may surround the system, which were not felt in the Colonies. In the Colonies the convict was removed from all those temptations which unhappily led him into crime—he was removed from all old associates and old associations—and he was placed in circumstances where there was every encouragement to good conduct and every discouragement to bad behaviour. I utterly deny that, taking a really enlarged view of the interests of the Colonies, they have suffered in this respect. I firmly believe that if you compare the moral condition of Western Australia at the present moment, with those colonies to which convicts had not been sent, the result would be decidedly in favour of Western Australia. It is a great misfortune, in my opinion, that it has been thought necessary to abolish transportation, and very great indeed is the responsibility of those persons in this country by whose language that necessity had been created—for I do not hesitate to say that a factitious and artificial feeling was created in the Colonies by the language used by injudicious persons, to say the least, in this country—it was the appeals which were made to the self-love of the colonists, and the declamations in unmeasured terms against the injustice of sending convicts to the Colonies, and against the alleged injury thereby inflicted on them, that changed the feeling there. It was by the language held in this country that the feeling of the Colonies on this subject was changed, because every one acquainted with the question is aware that, about fifteen years ago, the feeling of the Colonies was exactly the reverse, and persons there then used language as strong against the injustice of abolishing transportation as they afterwards did against continuing transportation. The noble and learned Lord and the noble President of the Council have both said that it was absolutely necessary to abolish transportation, because the abolition was demanded by the Colonies. Now, however unpopular the notion may be, I for one, will not hesitate to declare my opinion that if you are to proceed on the principle that whatever is asked for by the Colonies—whether their demands be just or unjust, reasonable or unreasonable—is at once to be conceded, then the sooner you part with your Colonies altogether the better; and if you part with your authority, get rid also of the responsibility of defending and protecting them. I deny that, in point of justice or reason, those colonies which were founded as penal colonies, and to which the inhabitants went expressly that they might have the advantage of convict labour, have any right to turn round on the mother country just when it suits their convenience and say they will receive convicts no longer. But, assuming that it was necessary to put an end to transportation, I still say that no little responsibility rests on the Government and the Parliament by whom this measure was carried into effect for the extremely hasty manner in which the whole thing was done. I ventured at the time to take some exceptions to the measure substituting penal servitude for transportation; but, in spite of all objections, the Act was passed in the shape in which it was proposed. A great mistake in the Act was this, that while transportation was abolished, the period of penal servitude substituted for it was made much shorter, so that four years of penal servitude were put in lieu of seven years' transportation. That or some similar proportion was adopted. - But it is now discovered that, unless you make the duration of punishment dependent on the conduct of the convict, it is impossible to maintain the discipline you desire in your convict establishments. The great improvement which had been effected of late years hinged upon this—that they now called into play in the mind of the convict the great motive of human life—they had sought to inspire him with hope, instead of attempting to compel him by fear. Formerly, in the hulks and prisons you trusted to fear—to the dread of immediate punishment for misconduct—as the sole stimulus to industry and good behaviour. Under that system, even with the assistance of the best and ablest officers, it was found practically impossible to maintain a real system of convict discipline, and you were driven into an excess of severity which hardens men, and you did not succeed in procuring either real industry or good conduct on the part of the convicts. A great improvement was effected when this subject was considered by the right hon. Gentleman now Secretary for the Colonies and myself, by methodising and bringing into more complete regularity the system, already begun by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby), of making the duration of punishment dependent on the conduct of the convicts. By applying this principle, under carefully considered regulations, you did succeed, with an inconceivably small amount of punishment, in enforcing perfect discipline and obtaining a larger amount of labour from the convicts than ever had been the case before; and I think I once mentioned that at the penal establishment at Dartmoor I saw work performed in a week by two convict sawyers which exceeded the amount of work done by two free sawyers in the same period. The holding out to the convicts the hope of an early discharge was the keystone to the whole system; and when you abolished transportation you ought not to have abolished a principle which was found so successful an inducement to good behaviour. By that most unhappy provision of the Bill, however, against which I warned the House, but on which the noble and learned Lord on the wool-sack insisted, and which I know has been a great source of difficulties and mischiefs, you crippled your power to effect amendment in the convict, because you are driven either to make him work, irrespectively of his conduct, the whole four years of his detention, or, if you adhere to the former practice of making some allowance for good conduct, then you were obliged to discharge him after a period of detention quite inadequate as a punishment and correction for the offences of which he had been guilty. That is the evil of the Act; but I think the fault may be easily corrected. Was there any reason, when you put an end to banishment, which was the part of the sentence which was the most formidable obstacle to the commission of crime, that you should also reduce the period of penal labour? You ought at any rate to return to the old principle, and let the period of penal servitude correspond with an equal period of transportation. After all, there are great difficulties to encounter; but I still believe that, on the whole, the system of tickets of leave at home ought not to be abandoned. We know by the experience of the Colonies that those who were sent out as exiles, which was the beginning of the plan, conducted themselves much less properly than those sent out with tickets of leave. It was found that the sudden change from complete coercion to freedom was too much for the men to stand; and a much larger proportion was reformed when discharged with tickets of leave. With such experience it was right and wise in Parliament to give power to the Crown to establish a system of tickets of leave in this country. But in doing so great difficulties were to be encountered. On the one hand, if you exercise too close a surveillance over the convicts, you greatly interfere with their means of maintaining themselves honestly; on the other hand, if you abstain from all control over them, then your ticket-of-leave system becomes a mere name. Whether it might not be possible to contrive some regulations founded on those which used to be enforced in the Colonies, of compelling the ticket-of-leave men to report themselves to certain officers at certain periods, and of keeping back their wages until they reported themselves—whether some arrangement of that kind could not be adopted is worthy of consideration. But, at the same time, I still think the Government ought carefully to consider the question, whether the means of extending somewhat further than at present the sentence of transportation might not be adopted. My own opinion is, that with a very little more expenditure of money, Western Australia and some other colonies that could be named, might be able to receive a considerably larger number of convicts than at present. Before I conclude, my Lords, permit me to say that I think this question is very much connected with another most important one, well deserving the consideration of Parliament—namely, the question whether there ought not to be some means adopted to effect a more complete organisation of the police throughout the country, and their establishment in such a manner as would secure a thorough concert of action between them.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that no Member of their Lordships' House more cordially agreed with the sentiment of the noble and learned Lord in regretting the necessity that had arisen for abolishing transportation than he did. The experience he had acquired during many years' administration of criminal law had convinced him that transportation better answered all the ends of punishment than any other that had been devised, for it contained in itself the two essential ingredients of punishment—the maximum of terror and the minimum of suffering. But, unfortunately, however advantageous it might have been to this country, it was the opinion of the last two Governments, and of their Lordships—not simply the opinion of the Government of the day, or of the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby)—that the time had come when transportation must be, he would not say abolished, for it had not been abolished, but to a very great extent cut down and modified. He believed that about a thousand convicts were the most that could now be annually sent out of the country. The noble Earl who last addressed their Lordships (Earl Grey) considered that the necessity for the modification of transportation had been too hastily assumed, and that the feeling in the Colonies had been brought about by unjustifiable language held by certain individuals at home, who sought for something the colonists did not desire. He (the Lord Chancellor) confessed that, to some extent, he was inclined to agree in that view of the case; but, from whatever cause it had arisen, the feeling was too great to be resisted, and not only did the Government think that something more than modification was needed, but it was felt to be impossible to continue to send out convicts in the face of the remonstrances that were made on the subject. The noble Earl said our Colonies were not worth keeping, if the Government were obliged to yield everything they demanded; but the question was this—when there came to this country repeated remonstrances against our loading those rising communities with the offscouring of our criminal population, could these remonstrances be either neglected or refused? There was too much justice in the remonstrance, and too much sympathy in the English Government, for them to resist the demand for alteration. It was necessary that an experiment should be made. When he said that an experiment must be made, he thought it of necessity followed that a Bill similar to that which their Lordships had passed should be brought in. He had himself proposed the Bill, but he took no credit for wisdom or forethought in proposing it, for if convicts could not be sent abroad they must be imprisoned at home. The question was, then, how should the old penalty be modified? What he proposed, and what their Lordships adopted, was this, that whereas there had been a very well-known system of substituting terms of imprisonment at Millbank for certain terms of transportation, that which had been done by the Executive should thenceforward be done by the Legislature. The terms, which were said to be short, were the exact terms that had been before in use. The man who was sentenced to transportation for seven years was by the universal system imprisoned for four years; for ten years seven were substituted, and so on. On this principle the Bill was framed, and whether right or wrong their Lordships sanctioned it. As to the question how far the Government had acted wisely in carrying out that enactment of the Legislature, it had been said, over and over again, that the whole dealing with this subject was necessarily an experiment.

He could not say whether or no the ticket-of-leave system had failed ; the Act had only been in operation about a year and a half, so that that was not time enough to ascertain its value ; but looking to the report of Colonel Jebb, he thought it would be impossible to deny that the system was working well. There might be individual cases of failure ; but the general result was, that of persons undergoing first imprisonment, and then penal labour, and who then get out on ticket of leave—the result was, that the system turned out a greater proportion of such convicts comparatively honest and useful members of society than any other system. His noble and learned Friend suggested that Government were to blame for not having a more effectual system of registration and control. Those were broad suggestions ; and in reference to the first he would only say that the Secretary for the Home Department had already thought of a more efficient system of registration, and was trying what could be done. He, however, thought that such a system would be necessarily, to a great extent, deceptive. A convict might change his name, and whether registered or not it would be difficult to know what proportion of persons had again lapsed into crime. The system might be attempted, but he saw great difficulties in carrying it into operation. The system of forcing a man who got into work—and was in a train to recover his character—to find his way to a central office, and report himself at certain times, was most objectionable. The man must get leave at stated times to do this, and this would act as a perpetual stigma, and more evil than good would be the result. All such experiments he should look at with suspicion.

CRIMINAL LUNATICS' ASYLUMS—QUESTION.

LORD ST. LEONARDS rose to ask whether Her Majesty's Government had any intention to erect asylums for criminal lunatics ? In regard to the administration of the effects of lunatics, a more perfect system than the English was not anywhere to be found. The laws which had been passed in reference to that subject, and the mode in which they had been put into operation, left very little to desire. But there was one very important part of the system which had been left unprovided, and it was to that that he now desired to direct their Lordships' attention.

The Lord Chancellor

Under the existing system a prison frequently became what it was never intended to be—an asylum for lunatics ; and he considered that, as it was improper to convert a prison into an asylum, so it was improper to make an asylum a prison, for the rules and regulations of the one and the other were altogether different. He was aware that he might be met by a statement on the part of the Government that at present they did not contemplate the erection of buildings to be used as asylums for criminal lunatics ; and under the pressure of the war, perhaps, it might be impossible to provide new buildings for the safe custody of such persons : but whenever new asylums were erected an important question would arise as to the classification of the persons who became inmates of those asylums. He thought, if the Government would consult the Commissioners in Lunacy and the medical authorities who were at the head of public establishments for lunatics in this country, that, with the advantage of their experience, a plan for the erection and conduct of those asylums might be adopted, and a system of classification might be arranged, which might be introduced whenever asylums for criminal lunatics were built.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he must admit that a great evil existed in regard to criminal lunatics, and that it was most desirable that proper accommodation should be provided for the safe custody of criminal lunatics, and that arrangements should be made for their classification. He was happy to state that the subject was under the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department, though he (Earl Granville) was not able to give a pledge that the Government could immediately carry into effect any plan for affording the requisite accommodation. The question was, indeed, entirely one of money, and was for the consideration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the House of Commons.

THE COLONIAL OFFICE—ABSENCE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

THE EARL OF DERBY rose to put a question to the Government " respecting the arrangements to be made for the efficient Discharge of the Duties of the Colonial Department, in the Event of the prolonged Absence of the Secretary of State for the Colonies," and said : My Lords, in putting the question of which I have given notice to Her Majesty's Government, I should be very sorry to cause embarrassment in the Ministerial arrangements; but the subject to which I have to advert is one of the greatest importance, and the neglect of it must cause so much public inconvenience—an inconvenience increasing day by day—that I do not think I should be justified in abstaining from calling the attention of your Lordships to the facts, and putting to Her Majesty's Government the question of which I have given notice. I need not remind your Lordships of the rather unusual circumstances under which the noble Lord (Lord John Russell), now at the head of the Colonial Department, accepted the duties of that important office. I need not remind you that the noble Lord did not form a Member of the Government as it was originally constituted, but that he had accepted a most important mission, upon which he had actually set out, and had left this country at the time when the secession of some Members of the Government rendered various new appointments necessary. The noble Lord was, I believe, already upon the continent when application was made to him by telegraph by the noble Viscount at the head of the Government, to ascertain whether he was willing to undertake the duties of Secretary of State for the Colonial Department; and, not by return of post, but by a still more rapid mode of communication, the noble Lord intimated his readiness to undertake the duties and responsibilities of that office. I am not about to complain that the noble Lord, after accepting office, did not at once give up the important mission he had undertaken, and return to this country to perform its duties. I think, on the contrary, that the abandonment of that mission might have been a matter of great injury to the public interests:—I am satisfied that it was quite proper and wise that the noble Lord should proceed to Vienna to perform the duties of the important mission with which he had been intrusted. But then the question whether the offer and acceptance of the office of Secretary of State for the Colonial Department were or were not justified must depend altogether upon the reasonable anticipation entertained by the noble Viscount at the head of the Government and the noble Lord as to the probable duration of the noble Lord's absence upon his mission. I know, my Lords, perfectly well that, technically and formally, every Secretary of State can perform the functions and duties of any other Secretary of State. The Secretaries of State were formerly three in number—tria juncta in uno—they are now four; and I know that any one of those Secretaries may perform in a formal sense the duties of any of his colleagues; but though this is so formally and technically, and although for a certain limited time—during the recess of Parliament for an especial instance—the ordinary and routine duties of one Secretary may be carried on and administered temporarily by another, it is obvious, looking to the importance and weight of the business pressing upon each of those departments, that anything like a permanent junction of the duties of these officers must be attended with very great inconvenience and injury to the public service. So much, indeed, was this felt to be the case, that when the present war commenced, it was found necessary to divide the Secretaryship of State for the Colonies into two departments, and to withdraw from the Colonial Secretary the business of the War Department, which was formerly united to that of the Colonial Secretary, and which is sufficient fully to occupy the attention of one Minister during a period of war. I believe, moreover, that there is no Minister whose presence in this country is more necessary, and whose duties can be less readily taken up by any of his colleagues, than those of the noble Lord who happens to be at the head of the Colonial Department; because there is no Minister, perhaps, whose duties are so much apart and separate from the business of his colleagues, whose individual responsibility is so great, and probably none whose general knowledge of the business of the office is so much confined to the individual by whom that office is held. My Lords, I do not go so far as to concur altogether in an axiom which, if I recollect rightly, was laid down by a right hon. Gentleman who for many years performed the duties of Under Secretary for the Colonies, that "Cabinets always hated colonies;" but having myself had some experience of the duties of the Colonial Office—and I believe my opinion will be shared by more than one noble Lord in this House—when I say that, of all the business which is brought before a Cabinet, there is the greatest difficulty in obtaining for the affairs of the Colonies a very small portion of that very small amount of time which Ministers are enabled to spare from the administration of their particular departments for the collective discussion and consideration of public affairs. And the reason is this—that there are always pressing upon every Cabinet matters more urgent with regard to immediate Parliamentary discussion, and more interesting to parties nearer at hand; and therefore, practically, the colonial business is more exclusively in the hands of the Colonial Minister than the home business is in the hands of the Home Secretary of State, or the foreign business in those of the Foreign Secretary. Hence, of all Ministers whose absence from the country would cause inconvenience to their departments, I believe the Colonial Minister is the one whose absence would cause the greatest. I am told that, in consequence of the absence of Lord John Russell, the duties of Colonial Secretary are for a time to be undertaken by a right hon. Gentleman of very great ability and experience, but who also fills the office of Home Secretary (Sir G. Grey). Now, my Lords, I know something of the duties of the Colonial Department. I know that, if not absolutely overwhelming, they are quite sufficient to occupy the whole attention of one Minister; but from what I have seen of the business and duties of the Home Secretary, I would say they were infinitely more laborious, more pressing—requiring every moment of time that the Minister can devote to them. I do not mean to say that there are not two ways of doing business. One way is not doing it at all, leaving everything in arrear, and thus making an easy berth of any office; but if the Secretary of State does his duty, as I know the right hon. Gentleman does his, the business of his own immediate department is, I am sure, enough, and more than enough, to absorb the whole of his time and attention. The right hon. Gentleman, it is generally believed, and regretted wherever it is believed, is not in very strong health, and upon that account alone, before the late changes in the Government, it was supposed he was desirous to retire from the conduct of public business; but were he the strongest man in England, strongest in mind and in body, I say it is absolutely impossible that for any lengthened period he should continue to discharge the combined duties of Home Secretary and Colonial Secretary, and attend besides to his Parliamentary duties in the House of Commons. Time and physical energy are absolutely impossible to equal the duties and labours which would be imposed by such a situation. Of course, all this turns upon a question of time—of the time for which it is probable the noble Lord the Colonial Secretary may be absent from this country. If Lord John Russell's absence from this country is likely to be one of short duration, of course the inconvenience would be materially less; but, however short it may be, let me point out, with reference to the state of the colonial business at the present moment, several important questions that are absolutely in abeyance in consequence of the absence of the Colonial Secretary. I do not refer to the delay—though that, too, is a matter of considerable importance—in coming to a decision with regard to any answer to be returned, or any acknowledgement to be made, to the various offers of pecuniary and military assistance which have been received from the Colonies; but the other night, when this question was referred to in this House, one of Her Majesty's Ministers—I believe the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Lansdowne)—stated that it was a question which must await the return of the noble Lord. But, at the present moment, I have a letter giving a most serious account of a matter which ought to be the subject of the greatest possible anxiety to the Government—of the state of that colony which is not unconnected with the question that has just been brought before the House by the noble and learned Lord (Lord St. Leonards)—I allude to the colony of Victoria. I do believe that the state in which that colony is at the present moment—partly arising from the difficulties relative to the gold licences, and partly from the course taken by the Colonial Office here, with regard to the removal of convicts from one colony to another—is such as to cause the deepest anxiety to those who watch the progress of the colony, and to imperatively require the earnest and immediate attention of the Secretary of State for the Colonial Department. Again, in the colony of the Cape of Good Hope we are threatened with a renewal of the Kafir war; but there is no Secretary of State to attend to the business of that department, and it is quite impossible that the Home Secretary can be conversant with the details. Sir G. Grey happens to have colonial experience, and so far he is better qualified than most people to deal with these questions, if he could deal with them in conjunction with his own department. Again, there is the whole range of the Australian colonies, which have been acting upon the power you gave them the year before last to form constitutions for the management of their respective governments. The whole of these constitutions have been returned by the Legislatures of the respective Colonies to this country to wait for the adoption, acceptance, or refusal of the Colonial Office. But, in consequence of the absence of the Colonial Secretary, all these constitutional questions must rest in abeyance, and the Colonies must remain uncertain as to what are to be the future constitutions of their country. Every day, individuals connected with these Colonies, and deeply interested in them, are coming here from the remotest parts of the world for the special purpose of communicating with the Secretary of State upon matters of the utmost importance to themselves and to the societies to which they belong. They come here; their time is limited; they find the Colonial Secretary absent, and no Under Secretary even appointed; and—having perhaps come from the antipodes—they are probably obliged to return without having had an opportunity of laying their case before the Secretary of State specially interested in the concerns of the Colonies. Again, questions are arising every day in the House of Commons of deep interest, upon which it is necessary to address queries to the Government and to the Minister especially charged with the Colonial Department. There is, however, no Colonial Secretary in the House of Commons; there is no Under Secretary appointed at the present moment; and I believe the appointment of such an official—even if he could discharge the duties of the department, which he cannot—depends upon the decision of Lord John Russell himself, he being at Vienna, and not having at present made any appointment. Of course, as I have already said, this question altogether depends upon the probable duration of Lord John Russell's absence. I do not know that I should have brought it forward at the present moment, if I did not hear that, after the noble Lord has been absent a fortnight from this country, preparations are being made for the removal to Vienna of the whole of his family—the whole of his establishment, including some very young children—who are to travel so leisurely that the journey to Vienna is, I understand, to occupy seven days. That, at all events, does not indicate an expectation of an immediate return to this country; and I confess I should not be sorry if the stay of the noble Lord at Vienna should be a lengthened one. It must be lengthened, unless there be an absolute rupture of all negotiations, and an end of all hopes of effecting peace. If the Conferences are broken up without effecting their object, and there is no hope of coming to an understanding, of course Lord John Russell will return to this country; but certainly his family arrangements, so far as I have heard of them, do not appear to warrant that view of the case; on the contrary, they would rather lead us to hope that he will be engaged in very protracted negotiations, with at least some prospect, though that is more than I expect, of his being able to conclude a satisfactory peace. But if these negotiations at Vienna are to be protracted, it is impossible that the present arrangement with respect to the Colonial Office can continue, or that the country can allow the greater part of the Session to pass without a Colonial Secretary or an Under Secretary in the House of Commons. That is not treating Parliament rightly; it is not treating the country rightly; above all, it is not treating the Colonies rightly, wisely, or judiciously. So great is the feeling of independence upon the part of some of the Colonies that, notwithstanding their good feeling and affection towards the mother country, you will produce a most unfavourable impression upon them if you declare to the world that the Secretarship of State for the Colonies is an office of such inconsiderable importance that it may be accepted by a Minister who had actually left the country, and held by a Minister who, being resident in Vienna, is physically unable to discharge its duties. It is upon these considerations that I have thought it my duty to bring this subject before your Lordships. I do not know whether I shall be able to put my questions in a definite form; but I shall ask the noble Earl the President of the Council whether he can hold out to us any expectation with regard to the probable period of Lord John Russell's return from Vienna; and, if he is unable to do so, within what time the Government would think it reasonable and necessary that some permanent arrangement should be made for intrusting the duties of the Colonial Office to a Secretary of State resident in this country, and not employed in protracted negotiations at Vienna?

EARL GRANVILLE: In answer to the question of the noble Earl, I must express my satisfaction at his concurrence in the opinion entertained by the Government and the country as to the great importance of the mission accepted by Lord John Russell. I believe that no appointment could have been made which could have led the nation generally to feel that the honour of the country was placed in safer hands; and I believe that no appointment could have been made of greater importance, not only to this country, but to the whole of Europe, inasmuch as the appointment of the noble Lord is regarded as a pledge and proof that the intentions of Her Majesty's Government are perfectly sincere in endeavouring to obtain peace as early as possible, provided peace can be obtained upon safe and honourable terms. Under these circumstances, I think it would have been a most injudicious measure when Lord John Russell had already visited the Court of the Tuilleries on his way to Berlin and Vienna, to recall that noble Lord in the middle of his mission. It is, perhaps, using a strong word, but it appears to me that such a recall, after the delay which had already taken place in consequence of the Ministerial crisis, would have been something like a breach of national faith. With regard to the second point referred to by the noble Earl, namely, whether the offer of the Colonial Office was a judicious one on the part of the Prime Minister, and whether the acceptance of that offer upon the part of Lord John Russell was or was not justifiable—I have not the slightest doubt in my own mind upon the matter. We had seen the difficulty of forming a Government strong enough to maintain its position. Even the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) had given an example of how much, in these sort of crises, personal and party feelings required to be sacrificed for the sake of the public interests; and I do think that it was right for Lord Palmerston, when his Government had been weakened by the secession of some of the eminent men who had belonged to it—I think it was right to strengthen it in the estimation of the public and of our allies as soon as possible by joining to it so eminent a statesman as Lord John Russell. With respect to the inconvenience which may result from the absence of Lord John Russell, the noble Earl stated that he was perfectly aware that formally and technically any Secretary of State could discharge the duties of the Colonial Office. Now, I think if those duties had been imposed either upon the Secretary for War or the

Secretary for Foreign Affairs—if, in addition to his ordinary office, either of them had been asked not only to transact the business of the Colonies, but to make himself master of all the questions connected with that department of the Executive—he must utterly have broken down in the attempt; but the person to whom the charge of the Colonial business has been committed for a limited time is a right hon. Gentleman who has the whole business of the department at his fingers' ends, and who had conducted the administration of that department up to within three weeks of the acceptance of office by Lord John Russell. Thus one-half of the difficulty a new Secretary of State has to overcome—namely, the mastering of the business of his office, which occupies not less than six weeks or two months—will be obviated. No one could for a moment contend that this arrangement, as a permanent one, is defensible; but, as the noble Earl justly said, it is a question of time. Lord John Russell has gone to Vienna for the purpose of endeavouring to negotiate a treaty of peace. It may unfortunately happen, as the noble Earl suggested, that the negotiations will be broken off at once, in which case there is no question that his Lordship will return immediately, and his absence from London will be of very short duration indeed; but if affairs should take a more fortunate turn, I can assure the noble Earl that the noble Lord will not be absent for so long a period as he supposes. The noble Lord goes to Vienna to discuss and settle the great general principles upon which a treaty of peace is to be concluded. If those principles are agreed to, and there is a real prospect of peace, I do not think it is desirable that Lord John Russell himself should stay for a long period in order to settle all the details and formalities of the treaty; and I believe I am justified in assuring the noble Earl that at present it is the wish and the intention of Lord John Russell to be back in this country by Easter at the latest. I believe that no inconvenience whatever has been felt by the Secretary of State's absence. Sir George Grey is the person who has the greatest right to complain, for a very arduous duty has been thrown upon him—a duty, as the noble Earl has said, which no person could ever undertake as a permanency with fairness to himself. So far from colonial subjects being unpopular in the Cabinet to which I belong, I beg to state to the noble Earl that we have already held two Cabinets upon them in which two important decisions have been arrived at, and the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey) has not shrunk from acting without delay upon those decisions. With regard to the noble Earl's suggestion as to the only way of getting through the work of the department, I may mention a story related of one of the distinguished colleagues of the noble Earl, who is said to have been told by a gentleman of great official experience, in answer to an application to suggest some mode of facilitating the laborious duties of this office,—“There are several ways of expediting matters; one sometimes adopted is that of not reading inclosures.” But I am sure the noble Earl will feel that, until the right hon. Gentleman's health does break down, he will conscientiously and honestly discharge the duties which have been thrown upon him. The question of the gold licences at Victoria may or may not become a serious question; but it is not one which can be dealt with in this country in its present state. With regard to the legislative question, the information we have received is not yet so complete as to enable the Secretary of State, whoever he may be, to come to a right decision upon it. There has been no delay in matters of routine, and the business of the department is still regularly proceeding. In some most important cases decisions have been come to without a day's delay, and in cases where no inconvenience would arise from the delay of a week, communications have been made between Sir George Grey and Lord John Russell. With regard to the Cape of Good Hope, everything that is to be done by this country has been decided upon. I am unable to give the noble Earl any intelligence with regard to the appointment of an Under Secretary, for even if arrangements had been made, it would be impossible to appoint an Under Secretary until the Bill with regard to that office has passed through your Lordships' House as well as the Commons. I am afraid that the noble Earl's language is calculated to create that very feeling in the Colonies which he has expressed a wish to avert; but that the colonists will be affronted when they hear an ex-Prime Minister—one of the greatest statesmen of this country, and one who has acquired singular eminence in the Colonial Office—has accepted that office in the present emergency is an utter delusion. I feel confident that neither the interests of this country nor of the Colonies will suffer in the slightest degree from the manner in which Sir George Grey will carry on the duties of an office with which he is thoroughly acquainted during the temporary absence of Lord John Russell.

THE LIGHT CAVALRY CHARGE AT BALAKLAVA—QUESTION.

On the Question that the House at its rising adjourn till Monday,

LORD ELCHO said, he would take advantage of it to ask a question of the hon. Member for Bristol with reference to a Motion which stood in his name to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that an inquiry may be instituted into the conduct of Lieutenant General Lord Lucan for ordering a charge of the Light Cavalry at the battle of Balaklava. He wished to ask the hon. Gentleman whether it was his intention, and if so, when he intended, to bring forward that Motion? The House was doubtless aware that his noble and gallant relative (Lord Lucan) had read in the other House of Parliament a letter addressed to the Minister of War by Lord Raglan. That letter, dated the 16th of December, contained charges so grave, that his gallant relative, though refused a court-martial on his first arrival in England, felt it incumbent on him to address a letter to the Commander in Chief praying him to reconsider that decision. His gallant relative, referring to Lord Raglan's letter of the 16th of December, said—

“This letter contains entirely new matter, and is replete with new charges reflecting more seriously than before on my professional judgment and character. There is now imputed to me, and for the first time, inattention to and neglect of another order, and, again, a total incapacity to carry out my instructions, and to avail myself of the means placed by his Lordship at my disposal. Charges so grave, and of a character so exclusively professional, cannot, I submit, be properly disposed of without a military investigation. I find myself, therefore, compelled to express my anxious wish that the Commander in Chief would be induced kindly to reconsider his decision, and consent to my whole conduct on the day of the action of Balaklava, on the 25th day of October, 1854, being investigated by a court-martial."

His noble and gallant relative felt that, if his conduct were investigated by a court-martial, he could refute these new charges, and, as he was himself confident the only object of the hon. Member for Bristol was to do justice to all parties concerned in this unhappy affair, he hoped the hon. Member would postpone his Motion pending the inquiry which his gallant relative wished might be granted, but with respect to which he had as yet received no answer.

MR. H. F. BERKELEY said, the noble Lord had only done him justice in supposing that the inquiry which he proposed to institute was entirely on public grounds. He felt that a great and grievous wrong had been done to the British army, that it was necessary an inquiry should take place into that wrong which had caused so wanton a sacrifice of life. He had no wish at all to prejudge the case of the noble Earl, and should be glad to postpone his Motion until some decision was come to. After that time he should consider himself at liberty to proceed with his Motion.

BREECH-LOADING ARMS.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he wished to bring under the consideration of the House certain improvements in the manufacture of breech-loading firearms and the importance of adopting such improvements in the British army. There seemed to be the same prejudice against these improved arms as there was against the introduction of the Minié rifle, but that prejudice he hoped soon to see removed. Within a very short time, he had had an opportunity of testing two or three breech-loading arms, and the weapon he was most anxious to bring to their notice was Sharpe's breech-loading rifle. In 1850, Mr. Sharpe, then a simple mechanic, presented himself before the chief of the United States Board of Ordnance, and laid the result of his ingenuity before him. The weapon was tried, and the result was a recommendation to the War Department to have it tested. The War Department accordingly ordered 500 of the weapons to be made according to the inventor's pattern, and placed them in the hands of the troops engaged in active service on the frontiers, with the view of testing their capabilities. The result was eminently favourable. It was reported that the rifle was a weapon not only easily handled, but that it had great accuracy of range, great power of penetration, and was never foul. The American Congress had since appropriated 100,000 dollars for the purchase of these arms, and Sharpe's breech-loading rifle was now the weapon adopted by the Government of that country. Colonel Burn, Captain Barlow, and Mr. Anderson were sent out to America to test the various improvements in firearms as well as improvements in machinery, and to purchase such machinery as would afford the greatest facility for the manufacture of arms in this country. When Colonel Burn returned he endeavoured to impress upon the Government the superiority of Sharpe's rifle. As early as May last that weapon was shown at Woolwich; and he was confident that if an honest test had been applied to it that weapon would, by this time, have been generally adopted in the British army. A trial was made of the rifle, both officially and non-officially, and a report of the result was sent to the Board of Ordnance, and also to the Horse Guards, but no notice had hitherto been given of the determination of either of those departments to those who were anxious for the success of the weapon. He considered that this rifle possessed great practical advantages over the Minié rifle. With the latter the charge was put in at the muzzle of the barrel; it was then driven down by the ramrod, which had at first to be drawn and afterwards returned to its proper place in the stock; but with Sharpe's breech-loading rifle, an opening at the breech was effected by touching a spring—the charge was then placed in its proper position and the opening instantly closed. He had that day witnessed experiments on the weapon at Lord Ranelagh's with very satisfactory results. He would defy any one to charge and fire a Minié rifle more than two or three times in a minute, whereas he saw to-day one of Sharpe's breech-loading rifles fired twenty-one times in a minute and a half, fourteen times in a minute, and forty times in five minutes and five seconds. Another advantage of Sharpe's weapon was that it did not foul. It could be fired upwards of 200 times without fouling. These were merits which entitled that description of arm to be favourably received by the Government. They had, already, proof that the Minié rifle was not that all-perfect weapon which, in this age of improvement, the British army ought to possess. Much delay arose, for instance, from the sticking of the bullet, as well as from fouling, disadvantages to which Sharpe's rifle was not subject. He also wished to call the attention of the House to another improvement, which consisted of a small magazine, in which could be placed fifty caps, so arranged that they should explode consecutively, but should any miss—an event of rare occurrence—the ordinary cap might be used. He put it to the House what an advantage it would be to have a corps of men armed with a weapon of such enormous power, especially when the troops were opposed, as was the case at the Cape of Good Hope, to a subtle and treacherous enemy. So fully was this recognised by military men, that, when the intelligence arrived in this country that there would probably be another disturbance with the Kafirs, it was suggested to the Horse Guards that this description of weapon should be placed in the hands of the Cape Mounted Rifles; and Colonel Hay, on trying the rifle at Hythe, had said, "Would to God they had them at Sebastopol." He likewise wished to call the attention of the House to Dean and Adams' revolver, which he considered a great improvement on Colt's. The man who had a revolver was trebly armed, and the advantages of that weapon were never more forcibly displayed than in the case of Lieutenant Cross, who, it would be remembered, shot four Russians and saved himself through the fortunate accident of having such a weapon in his possession. He thought the Government would be performing a service to the country by testing these admirable weapons.

COLONEL KNOX said, he had assisted with a number of other officers, as well as experienced gunmakers, at the trial of the new weapon at Lord Ranelagh's, to which the hon. Gentleman had just referred; and they had all agreed in considering it a most valuable arm. It was a decided improvement on the Prussian needle gun; it was easily used and easily cleaned; and he had no hesitation in saying that for cavalry it would be the most useful instrument that had ever been invented. He earnestly trusted that the Government would direct their attention to the subject, and give the service the benefit of so valuable a discovery.

MR. MONSELL said, he really admitted with the hon. Member for Dungarvon that it was extremely important that they should, with the least possible delay, introduce the best possible breech-loading carbine into Her Majesty's service. Before Mr. Sharpe, or any one on his behalf, came to this country, his carbine was sent to the Ordnance Office, and it was at once put into the hands of those whose duty it was to test such weapons. The military authorities, and more especially the Commander in Chief, were devoting their best attention to that subject; and it was only in consequence of their extreme desire that the choice of a weapon which they might make should be a good one, that they had not yet resolved what that choice ought to be. Early last year an intimation had been given to the most experienced gunmakers of this country that it was the intention of the Government to introduce a breech-loading carbine into the service, and they had been requested to submit for trial, by the 1st of May last, any weapons of that kind which they might have invented. Some of our most experienced gunmakers had requested that they might be allowed a longer time to prepare their instruments, and that application had been granted. Their weapons, however, as well as that of Mr. Sharpe, had soon afterwards been submitted to trials at Woolwich. A number of carbines selected out of the lot so tried had next been sent for another trial to Colonel Hay at Hythe, and among them a very remarkable one invented by M. Lenoir, a Frenchman. The matter was at present considered to be nearly ripe for decision, and in a very short time the proper authorities would pronounce what they considered was the best of those weapons. As soon as that judgment should be given, the Ordnance Department would lose no time in having a number of the most approved breech-loading carbines manufactured for Her Majesty's service. He had only to add, that from all he had heard he believed the choice would probably lie between Mr. Sharpe's and M. Lenoir's weapons.

MR. BELLEW said, that having witnessed the experiments at Lord Ranelagh's, he could also bear testimony to the excellence of Sharpe's rifles. He suggested, as they could be purchased in any quantity in America, that it would be much better to send for them to that country than to manufacture them here.

MR. MAGUIRE said, that several gentlemen had expressed their belief that the new instrument would not only be suitable for cavalry, but that it might, if adapted to the Minié rifle, be found of the greatest use for our infantry and our artillery. It would afford a great protection to the latter against their being cut down at their guns.

VOLUNTEER RIFLE CORPS—QUESTION.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he wished to put a question to the noble Lord at the head of the Government upon a subject to which he had the other evening directed the attention of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department. The right hon. Baronet had stated upon that occasion that offers had been made to the Government for the formation of volunteer rifle corps, but that those offers had been refused. He (Mr. Williams) was anxious to know what were the grounds of that refusal. He could himself see no objection to the formation of those corps, and he believed that, in case of invasion, they would be found extremely useful.

MR. G. DUNDAS said, that the country had great reason to complain of the delay evinced by the Government in adopting fresh improvements. The fact was, however, that it was part of the "system." We were overwhelmed with Boards, when if the matter rested with one man it would be immediately arranged. The Government had for once broken through the "system" at Woolwich, and had placed a man there of great ability and aptitude, who had already saved the country at least 16,000*l.* or 20,000*l.* If a matter of this sort rested with Captain Boxer, he believed that it would be settled in a very short time.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that in reply to his hon. Friend the Member for Lambeth he had to state that when he was at the Home Office he received from different parts of the country a great many offers to form these corps. He had to consider, first, whether there would not be a certain amount of expense attending their formation, and in the next place whether any possible utility was to be expected from them. There was no doubt that a certain amount of expense would attend their formation; and it appeared to him that they could be of no earthly use. The offers were chiefly from inland places. We were under no fear of an invasion, and if we were he did not think that volunteer corps of this kind would be of any practical service whatever. They would be composed of tradesmen and persons in ss, persons occupied in the en-

gagements of civil life, who could not absent themselves from their residences without interfering with the industrial and commercial arrangements of the country, and who by their habits and constitution were not at all fitted to encounter the exposure and the difficulties of a campaign to which they would be exposed if they were ordered to march to the coast. If they had to bivouac out, and to expose themselves as troops on service must do, it was evident that in the course of a week the greater part of them would be in the hospital instead of in the field. If we anticipated an attack upon our coast, there might be use for these corps in our seaport towns; but as that was not the case it did not appear to him that it would be of any use to accept the offers of these most zealous individuals, to the public spirit which actuated whom he must, in declining their offers, do justice.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that in reverting to the case of breech-loading guns, all the specimens he had seen had one great drawback, namely, an escape of gas from the breech. At the time he was connected with the Committee on Small Arms, no weapon had been invented which overcame this difficulty. He should like to see this gun of Mr. Sharpe's fired not 500, but 2,000 times, in order to see if by that time the double action was not so shaken as to admit an escape of gas.

MR. MONSELL said, that in July or August, Sharpe's carbine arrived in this country, and was submitted to the Select Committee at Woolwich. That Committee made a very favourable report of it, as also of two or three other descriptions of breech-loading guns. All the guns referred to had been sent to Hythe for trial, and those trials had, he believed, now been completed, and in a very short time the best description would have been selected.

SUPPLY—ORDNANCE ESTIMATES.

The House then went into Committee of Supply.

(1.) 1,387,500*l.*, Barracks, Works, &c.

LORD SEYMOUR said, he wished to call the attention of the Committee to the very large amount proposed to be expended in works at home, at a period when such extraordinary exertions were required abroad. Among other items included in this Vote was 30,000*l.* for defences at Dover and the coast of Kent, 60,000*l.* for new barracks on the western heights of Dover, buildings for new stores and garrison hospital in the Tower; 48,000*l.* for defence of commercial harbours at Hull and Liverpool; but the principal charge to which he was desirous of directing attention was one of 250,000*l.* for barracks at Aldershot. With respect to this last charge, he was desirous of knowing how the contracts for the erection of these buildings were to be carried out if they were to be built only of Christiana deals? Then, what was the object of the barracks at Aldershot, and whether the temporary barracks included in a previous Vote formed a portion of the same? Or whether the large sum of 150,000*l.* already voted for temporary barracks was to be swept away, and the further sum of 250,000*l.* now proposed to be expended in addition? It would also be desirable to know what was the number of troops proposed to be accommodated in these new barracks.

MR. MONSELL said, that the sum of 30,000*l.* was for the works at Dovor which were intended to carry out a series of defences that were commenced some years ago, and had already received the authority of Parliament, and for which, as a matter of course, a certain sum was taken by the Ordnance every year. The works were proceeding in a satisfactory manner, and Sir John Burgoyne thought them second in importance to none in the country. With regard to the sum of 60,000*l.* for the new barracks at Dovor, he had to state that, for the defence of the works at Dovor, barracks were required for at least 5,000 men: there were barracks now for 1,200 men and casemates for 1,200 more; those casemates, however, were considered to be unfit for young and unseasoned troops; and it was very desirable to provide for them additional barrack accommodation. As for the garrison hospital at the Tower, the troops there wanted it very badly. The sum of 48,000*l.* for the defences of commercial harbours was not merely for Hull and Liverpool, but was the commencement of putting many of the harbours of large commercial towns along the coast in some state of defence. It was a subject which had been continually and urgently pressed on the Government, and would give satisfaction to a great number of taxpaying people. As for the barracks at Aldershot, there was some confusion the other evening in the statements about temporary and permanent barracks. The object of erecting the temporary barracks was this. At present we had not in this country accommodation for lodging the troops and the embodied militia, for whom if was probable we should have to provide in a few months. To attempt to provide for them by billeting would be injurious and demoralising, and to take temporary buildings in the different large towns was also an objectionable and expensive mode, although the Government had been obliged to adopt it to a certain extent. At present we had not the means of concentrating large bodies of troops together, so that the officers might be accustomed to handle them in masses. It was believed that ample accommodation might be provided for 50,000 troops, officers and men, at the rate of about 5,900*l.* per thousand men. It was intended to erect buildings for 20,000 men at Aldershot, and for 10,000 men at the Curragh of Kildare; the place was not yet decided upon where the remainder were to be located. But these barracks were to be entirely distinct and separate from those for which the vote of 250,000*l.* was taken, which were to be erected at Aldershot. These latter were to be permanent barracks, and were to accommodate 10,000 men, being 7,000 infantry, 1,500 cavalry, and the remainder artillery. These permanent barracks would afford us the great advantage of being enabled to have at all times a large body of troops collected together for exercise and drill. Some observations had been made the other evening by the hon. Member for Coventry (Sir J. Paxton), as to the impossibility of obtaining the necessary quantity of Christiana deals for the construction of these barracks. He believed that the words of the contract were, "Memel, Riga, or Dantzic timber, and yellow Christiana deals." Many of the builders who offered themselves for the work said, there would be no difficulty in obtaining the quantity of timber of the description specified, but they doubted whether the sawing could be performed. It was considered that the best timber would be the most economical for permanence, and the inside lining might be of an inferior quality. The statement, therefore, that the contract included merely Christiana deals was incorrect; there were four qualities of deal included, and a very large proportion of the quantity had been already supplied. The total quantity of timber of all kinds required was 11,255 tons, and there would be no difficulty in obtaining a supply of 20,000 tons at the present moment. It was supposed that with care those wooden barracks would last for many years, and the engineer of the Ordnance had stated that by the adoption of an inexpensive process they might probably last twenty years.

MR. ELLICE said, he had seldom heard a more alarming statement than that now submitted to the Committee by the hon. Gentleman the Clerk to the Ordnance. He was the last person in that House to advocate false economy and to grudge the Government the means of conducting the war in the most effectual manner, but he hoped they might consider war an exceptional, and not the normal state of things for which they were to provide in this country. He thought, then, that if a scheme so vast as that they had just heard of were considered necessary, his noble Friend the First Lord of the Treasury ought at least to have explained the general principles upon which the Government were proceeding. If, happily, peace were restored in the course of the present year, in what condition would this country be left with such enormous establishments? For what purpose were these barracks to be erected? He did not quarrel with the sum required for fortifications at Dover, but it appeared that 60,000*l.* was to be laid out there in barracks this year on the ground that 5,000 men were required to garrison these fortifications. Such a force as this, however, was only required under the exceptional circumstances of war, and when they were told that already there was barrack accommodation at Dover for 1,200 men, and that 1,200 more could be lodged in the casemates, it was utterly beyond his comprehension that they should be asked for 60,000*l.* for fresh barracks. With respect to the vote of 48,000*l.* for the protection of the commercial ports, what emergency was there which required such an outlay at this particular time? He granted that this was a point which ought to be looked to. He said nothing against the principle of erecting those works at the proper time; but, whatever might have been the case two or three years ago, there was no pressing occasion for these works just now, and he thought it most inexpedient to select the present moment for adding unnecessarily to the burdens which the country was obliged to bear. Then they came to that most objectionable demand for a sum of 175,000*l.* on account of temporary barracks for the probable wants of the embodied militia, and for the accommodation of the troops raised this year in augmentation of the army. Now, he knew the inconvenience which would probably result from embodying the militia, but that was a temporary want which should be met by a temporary expedient, and no permanent provision such as that proposed was required. Then, again, with respect to the sum of 250,000*l.* for permanent barracks at Aldershot and the Curragh of Kildare, for the reception of an additional military force, he owned that he could not understand with what ultimate view this money was to be laid out. Was it supposed that we were to become a military nation when peace was restored, and that we were to put ourselves in competition with the great military Powers by keeping up a large standing army? That might perhaps be the intention of the Government, but this he knew, that when the question came to be raised by some worthy successor of his lamented friend, Mr. Hume, the House of Commons would not be induced to vote the money required for such a purpose. He warned the Government that when this war should be at an end, which he trusted would be much sooner than appeared to be anticipated by the Government, they would not be able to have a vast standing army, and by the course which they proposed to take in providing accommodation for it they would only be throwing away the public money. The Government ought therefore to be careful how they raised establishments which that House would certainly reduce after the peace. He doubted whether, after peace was restored, we should even require so large an army to be kept up as had been maintained during the last forty years. We were withdrawing our garrisons from many of our colonies, where the public money had been lavishly and prodigally wasted. He had been appointed one of the Committee upstairs on the Army Estimates, who found upon inquiry that 7,000,000*l.*, or 8,000,000*l.*, or 9,000,000*l.* of money had been wasted in maintaining a large military force in the Canadas, for no other purpose than that they might act as police in a country that ought to pay for its own. Hero was this vote of 250,000*l.* for permanent barracks at Aldershot, which might only be required for the present year. He did not wish to undervalue the advantages of the camp at Chobham, and small encampments of the troops might, no doubt, be useful from time to time, but were the men never to be encamped again under canvas tents, or cotton tents, which, he understood, were an improvement upon canvas? He was favourable to granting every shilling necessary for carrying on the contest with vigour and efficiency; but he would restrain the Government from forming permanent establishments of a military character, and which could not be maintained, believing, as he did, that the defensive power of the nation consisted in its maritime supremacy.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that if he agreed with his right hon. Friend that these were votes for creating great and permanent establishments which would not be required after the momentary emergency had ceased, he would concede to him that the Committee ought not to sanction them. But the contrary was the fact. The great mistake which the Government and Parliament of this country had made since the last peace was, that they had acted by fits and starts, and from the impulse of the moment, rather than from any settled and steady system of policy. It was all very well to say that the permanent defence of this country must be its naval force, and that we wanted no army or troops; but that was a claptrap which the good sense of the right hon. Gentleman ought not to suffer him to use. [Mr. ELICE: I did not say that we ought to keep up no army.] These votes were part of a permanent system of defence, not providing against any particular danger in one year rather than another, but enabling the country to maintain a proper position of independence. It was perfectly manifest that a great nation like this must have organised within the country some means of defence proportioned to its financial and political condition, and something in addition to its naval force. [Mr. ELICE: Hear, hear.] Well, that was granted, and it was very well to have some foundation to proceed from in an argument. The great mistake, however, he would repeat was, that after the termination of the last war, the Government and the Parliament considered that halcyon days were beginning, and that we should never again have occasion to defend ourselves from aggression, to vindicate our honour, or prepare for active hostilities. The consequence was, that the Government had rushed to the demolition and disposal of the greater part of its barrack accommodation, the inconvenience of which was, that in time of peace there was not barrack accommodation even for the reduced numbers of the army on the peace establishment, and the Government were compelled to billet the troops, to the great inconvenience of those upon whom they were billeted. No doubt innkeepers received their licences upon condition that troops might be billeted upon them, but there was no denying that this was a hardship upon them nevertheless, and in populous towns it was not only a hardship upon the persons on whom the troops were billeted, but it was also highly detrimental to the discipline of the army. From the inconvenience of billeting large bodies of men in particular towns had arisen the necessity of distributing them in small detachments, scattering them over districts where they were not wanted, and thus seriously injuring the discipline of regiments. Thus, while the Government imposed hardships upon the districts in which the troops were billeted, they also diminished the efficacy even of the regimental system. What had that House heard more strongly urged than that, however good the regimental organisation of the army might be, yet that there were no means of educating officers in the practice of those staff duties that belonged to the aggregation of large bodies of troops? The experience gained at Chobham, where not more than 5,000 or 6,000 men were assembled, had been of the greatest service, as well to staff and regimental officers as to the men, and he was told that those regiments sent to the East which had been encamped at Chobham were so much more handy, and so much better able to shift for themselves than those who had not had the advantage of being in camp, that the difference was exceedingly striking and easy to observe. The Government did not propose such vast establishments as his hon. Friend supposed. They proposed at Aldershot to have the means of collecting together some 7,000 infantry, with a proportion of cavalry and artillery, whereby they would be able every year to train in combined movements that number of troops, which was only a moderate portion of what they had always in the country even on the most reduced peace establishment. With regard to the militia, the greatest inconvenience had arisen from the impossibility of organising that force. He had been taunted by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) with want of foresight in not embodying the whole militia. The Government did embody as many regiments as it was possible to accommodate in barracks, but they were unwilling, without pressing necessity, to call out regiments which must have been billeted, at a time when better means of discipline were desirable. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Ellice) appeared to think the Government should wait until a time of profound peace before they erected barracks and defended port towns, but it seemed to him the proper moment for making military defences was when they happened to be at war, and when they might be required to use those defences. With regard to Dovor, the arrangement did not at all depend on the circumstances of the day. For several years it had been a subject of remark, that the coast towns had not proper defences. Dovor was considered one of the most important points which required defence. The fortifications of Dovor had been put under a system of progressive repair and improvement. Those western heights had been fortified, but the fortification was useless unless they had the means of lodging men who were to defend it. The casemates were certainly places where, in the event of a siege, they could lodge men, but they were not fit for permanent occupation, and he could assure the Committee that the barracks proposed on the western heights afforded no more accommodation than was absolutely necessary, if they were to have any defensive works at all. With regard to Liverpool and Hull, and several smaller ports, he could assure the Committee that for the last year and a half the Government had been beset with applications from commercial seaport towns to provide them with some means of defence if only to meet the attack of a privateer. When the Committee recollecting what an amount of property was aggregated in these places, and how they were exposed to attack, he was persuaded they would be of opinion that the erection of some small batteries to defend them on any sudden emergency was due to the interests of the commercial establishments in those ports. His only astonishment was to find how small a sum, comparatively speaking, was sufficient for their protection. He hoped the Committee would not be led away by the eloquence of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Ellice), but would feel that the Government were not proposing works which would be only wanted for a year, but that these were arrangements essentially necessary for maintaining an army, even on a peace establishment, competent to do the duties which an army was called on to perform. His right hon. Friend was engaged in an inquiry into bad arrangements, resulting entirely from the want of sufficient organisation in time of peace. We had been suddenly called upon to make war, and we found ourselves deficient, not in the bravery of our troops, in the devotion of our officers, in those military qualities inherent in man, or in the ordinary practice which regimental discipline developed and created, but deficient in those arrangements which were only to be acquired by the collection of large bodies of troops practising evolutions which belonged to a system of war. The right hon. Gentleman said—"The Government were not to imitate the great military Powers of the Continent; Parliament will never sanction it." He knew that as well as his right hon. Friend. It was folly to imagine England would ever have large standing armies like those of France, Prussia, or Austria; but, however small the standing army, it should be as good and as perfect, according to its magnitude, as care and arrangement could make it. He contended it was the worst economy, the most improvident system, to have an army and deprive it of the means to make it effective in proportion to its aggregate amount. Whatever they might choose the army to be, let it have the means of practising all that tended to make an efficient force, and when by any misfortune they were compelled again to engage in war they would have the foundation of a good army and the means of augmenting it on a basis which would render it complete, as far as its magnitude would allow it to be so.

MR. ELLICE said, he did not differ from the noble Viscount as to the policy of endeavouring to render our military force as effective as possible; the more so as it was so small, and in periods of emergency had to form the nucleus of a large organisation; but what he deprecated was an unnecessary extension of our military establishments. As to barracks—this was the first time he had heard of any deficiency, and he had been under the impression that we had ample accommodation for our troops in that respect. [Cries of "No, no!"] Certainly our barrack accommodation had been very much augmented, and there were large barracks in different parts of the country. He had never heard complaints as to billeting, and for the last eight years hardly had heard of an occasion for billeting our regular troops. He grudged no expense which the existing emergency rendered necessary, but he feared we were enlarging our establishments beyond what was necessary. He wished that these Estimates had been submitted to a Select Committee up-stairs, to inquire whether there was sufficient barrack accommodation for the usual number of troops, and, further, what temporary accommodation was required for the enormous augmentation obliged to be made in war time, including, of course, the largest of all augmentations, the militia. He placed confidence in the Government, and should make no opposition to the Vote, but he thought it his duty to warn the Committee before it embarked in establishments which he did not believe to be at all necessary for the permanent accommodation of our regular force.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE said, he was glad to find that the Government were, though too tardily, about to adopt a system of greater concentration in our army at home. He had himself been some years in the army, and his experience enabled him to state that nothing was so injurious to the discipline of a regiment as to fritter it away in small detachments, or to place the men on billets in public-houses. And if this was prejudicial even to regular and trained troops, how much more so must it be to newly-raised levies like the militia—raw and undisciplined as they necessarily must be? It was a system equally injurious to them and detrimental to the inhabitants of the districts in which they were billeted. The camp to be formed at Aldershot had great advantages for the militia and the army at large, and he believed it was intended to form a permanent military station; if so, certainly it was being constructed very hastily and superficially, and in such a way (the wood being fixed in the ground instead of being raised on a brick footing) that it would not last above three or four years, and enormous expense would be incurred in repairs; whereas, for a little more money, it might be constructed durably and properly. Great injury and inconvenience arose from the old system of having the troops scattered up and down the country, as a kind of aid to the police: occasionally called out to assist the Coast Guard or preserve the peace of manufacturing towns. It was necessary that such a system should cease, and he thought the collecting the troops together in camps would be of the greatest advantage to the service. The noble Lord had referred to the state of the defences of some of our commercial ports, and he was happy to hear the Government were about to fortify Liverpool and Hull. As to Hull, the Humber was more defended, at present, by its sandbanks than by any fortifications; and the late First Lord of the Admiralty, sailing down the river to inspect the place, had found his vessel stuck fast on a shoal. The inhabitants had been very uneasy at the defenceless state of the place. The only fort at present existing had been in the same state ever since the time of the civil war, 200 years ago. The site of it was not well chosen, and would afford no sort of defence to the town in the event of an attack by an enemy. At a very small expense a battery might be erected, which would afford effectual protection to the town, and, if the site of the old fort were sold, he had no doubt but that it would be sufficient to defray the expense of the new fortification.

MR. MONSELL said, he was happy to be able to inform the right hon. Baronet that his views with respect to the town of Hull were at this moment being carried out. A portion of the Vote of 48,000*l.* for fortifications would be spent upon Hull. The Government had considered it inexpedient to dispose of the site of the old fort of Hull until the new fortifications were completed. It was, however, their intention, as soon as that completion was effected, to sell the site, which he believed with the right hon. Baronet, would realise a sum sufficient to pay the expense of erecting the new defences; a work that would not only be of most important service to the country at large, but most acceptable to that particular part of the kingdom.

COLONEL KNOX said, he considered that the Government had taken a wise and proper course with regard to the erection of new barracks at Aldershot. He went down himself the preceding day and saw the whole arrangements, and he thought they were being carried out on a plan which would prove highly beneficial to the country. He, however, concurred in the suggestion of the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Trollope), that the timber, instead of being laid on the bare ground, should be supported by a foundation of brickwork. It might be done at a small expense, and would make it a permanent building. He was surprised that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Coventry (Mr. Ellice) should take objection to this expenditure for erecting new barracks. If there was one thing more than any other that had been a crying evil in the army for a long series of years, it was the want of barrack accommodation. He would only instance what was the state of things in the metropolis itself. So inadequate was the accommodation for the troops that at a memorable period, when there prevailed great excitement in this metropolis, and a large number of troops were assembled here, Her Majesty's horses and carriages were absolutely obliged to be removed to Windsor, in order to afford barrack accommodation for those additional troops. The whole amount of barrack accommodation in London would not meet the requirements of more than 3,000 men, while the brigade of Foot Guards alone consisted of 7,000 men; and there was not a single barrack to which in a time of popular excitement or riot they could lodge a battery of horse artillery in. He could not forbear calling attention to that disgraceful building called the Portman Street Barracks. It was nothing more or less than a villainously bad stable, and totally unfit for any men to be quartered in. And yet the rent of it, he understood, was perfectly enormous. He wished to know whether it was the intention of the Government to build another barrack on the site of the present? He was also much surprised that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ellice) should have said that there was ample barrack accommodation throughout the country. He could point the right hon. Gentleman's attention to a place on the coast of some importance, where it would be requisite to have a barracks erected—he meant Brighton. He therefore hoped the Government would pay proper attention to the subject of barrack accommodation, the want of which throughout the country generally, as well as in the metropolis, had been felt for many years; and he was glad that the Ordnance had shown a disposition to grapple with the subject.

COLONEL LINDSAY said, he wished the Government would inform the Committee when the Portman Street Barracks were to be given up. He should also be glad to hear some statement of the general intentions of the Government with regard to the important subject of barrack accommodation. New barracks, he perceived by the Vote, were to be erected at Dovor, at a cost of 60,000*l.*; at Plymouth, for 9,000*l.*; at Winchester, for 18,000*l.*; and at Gosport, for 61,000*l.*; making a total expenditure, under this head, of 148,000*l.* He wished to know on what principle they were to be built, and whether the old system was to be adopted? He gave the Ordnance credit for what they had already done in increasing the comfort of the soldiers, but he could not help thinking that, if the Committee appointed last year on the subject of barrack accommodation had sat, the result of their labours would have been most beneficial. Both the public and the House of Commons had recently had an opportunity of seeing what noble materials the British army was composed of, and in his opinion nothing which could tend to improve their social condition when on home duty would be thrown away upon them. They deserved well of their country, and their barracks were at present not sufficiently commodious for them; it was, therefore, the duty of the Government to make them so. He thought one means of accomplishing that object would be the establishment of a day-room, in which the men could associate together, and read or write without inconvenient crowding. He deemed it highly objectionable that a system should be continued which allowed women to reside in barracks; and, although he was aware that lodging-money was allowed by the Government, it was not sufficient to provide the requisite accommodation. He was glad to see gas was to be introduced in barracks; he had always felt that it would increase the comfort of the men, and some years ago he had called the attention of the House to the subject. He wished to know whether the Government intended to alter the present canteen system, which he considered highly objectionable? The subject of providing the means of rational amusement for our soldiers was of great importance, and, as he observed a sum of 900*l.* put down for a gymnasium for the Artillery at Woolwich, he thought, wherever it was practicable, something of the kind ought to be done for the other branches of the army.

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON said, the other night, when the first Vote on these Estimates was proposed, he stated that, in addition to the great difficulties which the contractors would have to contend with in the building of the huts in the short space of six weeks, the specification contained materials which could not be procured in this country, and in answer to the noble Lord the Member for Totness (Lord Seymour), the hon. Gentleman the mover of the Estimates said there was no difficulty in procuring these materials. Now, he should like to know if these huts were being erected according to the specification, and if Government were aware that the deals which were specified, and which contained about two-thirds of the whole of the timber, were Christiana deals. He thought it would be a great waste to put the timber on the ground; but if the huts were built on piers, he had no doubt that they would last twenty or thirty years. On a previous evening he had complained of the loss of time which had taken place; and he still thought that if the works had been commenced as early as they might have been, there would have been no occasion for the hurry which had characterised the operations of the Government. He had also to complain that the contracts had not been let in a business-like manner. The ordinary mode, when a great work had to be executed, was to provide plans, specifications, and bills of quantities. Some sort of plans, indeed, there had been, but there had been no bills of quantities—the contracts having been let on a schedule of prices. Bills of quantities, however, he regarded as absolutely necessary, in fairness to the persons who might be disposed to tender.

LORD HOTHAM said, he was quite sure that the Committee—if they were aware of the present state of the port of Hull—would not be surprised at the anxiety expressed by the inhabitants of that town with respect to its defenceless condition. It should be recollected that Hull is the great emporium of the trade of the north of Europe, and of late years there had been a great deal of accommodation furnished by the dock company of that port. They were now engaged in hostilities with Russia, and it was not surprising that a strong desire should be evinced to place the enormous amount of property congregated in that port in something like a position of security. When they considered the extent to which projectiles could now be thrown, it must be perceived that the port of Hull might as well be without defences at all as left to depend for its defence on the present fortification. If a hostile force should come up the Humber, the walls of the fort would be in as much danger from the recoil of the few guns upon it as from the fire from the enemy's vessels. He was, consequently, glad to hear of the measures which the Government were about to adopt with respect to this port, which had been too long left in a very improper state.

MR. MASTERS SMITH said, he wished to call the attention of the Committee to the Vote for the defence of the River Thames; and also to an item for 2,000*l.* for the erection of buildings for the accommodation of military lunatics at Fort Pitt. It seemed contrary to common sense that a lunatic asylum for the whole army should be placed in the middle of Fort Pitt, where unfortunate invalids were now experiencing comfort after their return from the Crimea.

SIR GEORGE TYLER said, he had urged upon the Government the necessity of establishing defences along the coast, and did so with the conviction that the Bristol Channel was not sufficiently defended. He had called attention particularly to the ports of Cardiff and Swansea, and he hoped a portion of the grant intended for the protection of harbours along the coast would be applied to the defence of those two ports to which he referred.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that the misfortunes which had befallen our troops had created so great a feeling of sympathy that nobody had made the least objection to any proposition of the Government. He thought, however, that Her Majesty's Ministers had taken advantage of the feeling of the House to bring forward items that were quite uncalled for, and that were upon a scale the most extravagant. Thus, he found in the Estimates for the last and the present year no less a sum than 871,000*l.* for building new barracks, and 285,000*l.* for repairing old ones; to this must be added 300,000*l.* for the huts, which, as they would last for twenty years, must likewise be reckoned as barrack accommodation, making a total sum of not less than 1,456,000*l.* for providing accommodation for an army which had never exceeded, if indeed it had ever reached, 60,000 men. That would give 25*l.* per man, whereas the cost of comfortable labourers' cottages was not more than 60*l.* each. Surely, then, the soldiers ought to be better housed than almost any other class in the community; and yet they were always hearing complaints of the insufficiency of the accommodation provided for them. There must be something wrong somewhere, and he thought that there ought to be a Committee to inquire into the subject. Again, it was proposed to vote 500,000*l.* for new fortifications. Of that sum only 12,000*l.* was proposed to be spent on Liverpool, in addition to 1,000*l.* for barracks, and only 10,000*l.* on Hull. And yet those two places had been strongly put forward by the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) in justification of the Vote. Colonels of militia were generally very anxious to have their men placed in barracks, but he (Mr. Williams) did not think that it was desirable to take that course. During the last war, a militia force double that now called out was embodied; and where were they lodged? They were billeted on the public-houses; and that was what he recommended the Government now to do. If they did so, when the force was reduced or abolished, they would have no difficulty in dealing with the places where the men had been billeted; but if they built barracks for them, those barracks would be a perpetual source of expense and loss. If a return of the sums expended on barracks during the last twenty or thirty years could be procured, the public would be astonished to see the vast sums which had been spent in this way, notwithstanding the constant complaints which they had heard of the insufficient accommodation provided for our troops.

MR. MONSELL said, that a great number of the militia had been lodged during the last war in barracks, which a false economy had led previous Governments to get rid of. At this very moment they were building new barracks at Winchester, whereas an edifice which would have supplied a much larger amount of accommodation had been sold, for a miserable sum, by one of his (Mr. Monsell's) predecessors, about the year 1833. It would be well if the Committee would take warning for the future from the experience of the past. He (Mr. Monsell) had lately had his attention strongly drawn to the subject of lodging the troops, and the result of his calculations had been that supposing the regular forces to remain on the footing on which they stood a month ago, there would be a deficiency of accommodation to the extent of 70,000 men. Under these circumstances, it appeared to him that the wisest course would be to erect those temporary buildings of which they had heard so much. He believed that it would be the cheapest measure they could adopt, and it would afford the troops the advantage of being exercised in large masses. With respect to the sum which was to be expended on the defences for Liverpool, he could assure the hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. Williams) that it would be 34,000*l.* in all. The observations of the hon. Member for Coventry (Sir J. Paxton), as to the materials of the huts, he had already answered—the deals were to be either Christiana, Memel, Riga, or Dantzic, and he was informed that about a month ago there were 20,000 loads in this country. The hon. Gentleman had referred to the rapidity with which these works were required to be executed, but up to that moment the Government had not obtained possession of the whole of the land at Aldershot. It was only determined to purchase the heath about a year ago, and there had been great delays in obtaining possession of it owing to the complicated rights of common involved. During the present week, however, they acquired land enough to justify the commencement of the building; therefore, the Committee would see that it was impossible for them to have begun at an earlier period. A Committee had been appointed by his noble Friend, Lord Panmure, which had put itself in communication with the most experienced builders in the country, and he had no doubt that the new huts would be constructed upon the most approved models. He quite agreed with the hon. Member for Coventry with respect to the injudiciousness of placing the huts on the bare earth, and he would take care that that was not done. In reference to the question of the hon. and gallant Member for Glamorganshire (Sir G. Tyler), he was happy to say that the Government fully appreciated the rising importance of the commercial ports in that county. They had given directions that Cardiff and Swansea should be included amongst the first that were to be fortified, and the others would be attended to in due course. The large works at the mouth of the Bristol Channel would afford a further protection to Glamorganshire. The hon. and gallant Member for Wigan (Colonel Lindsay) appeared to think that some partiality had been shown to the artillery with respect to means of amusement, but he would remind the hon. and gallant Gentleman that the barracks intended for the other troops were to be provided with racket grounds. It was quite true that the canteens had only been let till the 1st of September, and the reason was that the Government were anxious to introduce some improvement into the canteen system. All the proposed barracks would be constructed on the newest principles, and every available improvement would be introduced. He entirely concurred with the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Knox), who had referred to the state of the London barracks. The Portman Street barracks, indeed, were only kept on from year to year, until a new building could be provided; but the difficulties connected with the obtaining of a suitable site had as yet proved insuperable. With respect to the Thames fortifications, he was hardly prepared to give an answer to the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Masters Smith), but he should be glad to afford him any information in private. It had been decided to send the lunatic soldiers to Fort Pitt, but the Ordnance had no authority in the matter; and he must, therefore, refer his hon. Friend to the Secretary of State for War upon that point.

SIR JOHN BULLER said, it was the fault of preceding Governments that such a large expenditure was now required for providing barrack accommodation. In the place where his regiment was stationed there were only a few small barracks for the reception of the men, and the great outlay for barracks was now absolutely necessary. A large sum was expended on the lines at Plymouth, and it must be considered that that money was thrown away. When the lines were condemned by the late Duke of Wellington, it was to be regretted that such an expenditure had taken place. He wished, in conclusion, to draw attention to the absence of warm water, or warm baths, in the military hospital at Devonport. He thought it would be of great assistance to the sick and wounded arriving from the Crimea if some accommodation of that sort could be provided.

MR. COWAN said, he wished to remind the hon. Gentleman the Clerk of the Ordnance that all along the eastern coast of Scotland, where there was a vast amount of capital engaged in the pursuits of industry and commerce, there was nothing whatever in the shape of a fortress to serve for its protection. And yet, of this large sum now to be voted not a single shilling was to be applied to that purpose, unless, indeed, something was included in the vote of 48,000*l.*, which was for the defence of commercial harbours. Perhaps he might be allowed to ask whether a proposal had not been made within the last year to Government by a gentleman named Anderson for the erection of six or seven fortresses along that coast at an expense of about 20,000*l.* He had been given to understand, at all events, that that gentleman had been directed to make certain surveys, and prepare a plan for the fortification of the island of Inchkeith, which lay mid-channel in the Frith of Forth. The survey, however, made, in the first instance, was rejected by the Ordnance officers as not being sufficiently minute, and he was directed to make another. This was done, but on Mr. Anderson applying subsequently to be reimbursed for his expenditure—he made no claim for remuneration for himself—his claim was rejected by the Government. Now, really it did strike him as something very unfair that this gentleman should be invited to incur a certain expense, and that his demand for repayment should not have been favourably entertained.

COLONEL NORTH said, he begged, in the first place, to offer his thanks to Government for their efforts to render the army more efficient. He was quite able to confirm the statement which had been made with respect to the condition of the barracks at Plymouth and Devonport. Some five and twenty years ago he was quartered in that part of the country, and he could assure the Committee that at that time they were condemned as being in a most disgraceful state. Well, about three years back he was again there, and he found the barracks in precisely the same condition. The troops could hardly remain within them in consequence of the smoke, while the drains could not do their work in consequence of the insufficient supply of water. Indeed, the condition of things was perfectly intolerable. He hoped the Government would take into its consideration the suggestion of the hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) with regard to the employment at Aldershot of the senior officers of departments at Sandhurst, in order that they might become practically acquainted with their duties. He was quite sure it was a suggestion well worthy of consideration, and he thought, if carried out, it would prove most useful to these officers.

MR. DUNLOP said, he trusted that, taking into consideration the immense amount of shipping in the Clyde, the Government would see the necessity of rearming the fortress of Dumbarton.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he wished to impress on the Committee the expediency of improving the accommodation of barracks as they existed at present, for he believed they were very limited. There was no doubt that it was a false economy, and it operated very injuriously, especially with regard to the recruiting service, to have barracks without the necessary accommodation for the troops. Three or four years ago, a Commission was sent by the Government to inquire into the state of the barracks in Prussia, France, and other continental states, and report thereon. That Report was made, but it had never been laid before Parliament. He had no doubt that Report showed a decided advantage for the soldiers of France, Prussia, and two or three other countries, over the British soldier, as to the accommodation afforded them in barracks. There were some hon. Gentlemen holding office who entertained the notion that it was better to accustom the British soldier to hardships in barracks than to provide him with ordinary comforts. It was thought, indeed, that such a training would better enable him to rough it in foreign service; but he doubted that very much, because the officers, when they were obliged to rough it, were able to do so quite as well as the privates. The fact was, the system which those Gentlemen advocated was not only injurious to the health of the soldiers, but it also deterred men of a better class of society from entering the army. Now the importance of this question could hardly be overrated, because experience had always proved that an army selected from a better class of men was far more efficient than an army raised from the lowest orders of the people. We had several instances of this in our own country. One was, doubtless, familiar to every one in that House. There was a consultation between Oliver Cromwell and some of the other great men of that time, as to the difficulty which they had in getting troops who were capable of resisting the cavaliers, at the commencement of the civil war; and it was represented that the persons who then composed the Parliamentary army were tapsters and people of the inferior classes, who could not resist in the field the sons of peasants, and the better classes who had enlisted under the Royal standard. Now at the present time there was a difficulty in getting the sons of farmers and shopkeepers to enter the army, and the inferior accommodation in the barracks was one of the obstacles. These classes, as well as the officers, were quite prepared to meet the difficulties of a campaign, to be without tents, and to lie upon the ground when necessity required—but for a long continuance at home they would probably improve the moral composition of the army materially, by letting people know that they would not be kept in a state of physical discomfort unnecessarily. Depend upon it, if Parliament wished to raise the moral condition of the army, the barrack accommodation must be improved; and that being so, he for one, could not understand the reluctance which Government invariably evinced to bringing these portions of the estimates prominently forward. It was absurd to think that in this metropolis, the greatest that ever existed in the world, there was only barrack accommodation, and part of that of the worst description, for about 3,000 men. Besides, it was notorious that there were one or two barracks in the metropolis which were totally unfit for the maintenance of the health of the troops. Medical men who had directed their attention to the subject had stated that it required a certain number of cubic feet of air for the preservation of health—the number he believed was 800 feet per man—and yet there were several barracks in the metropolis which did not contain half that quantity of air. From time to time very little progress had been made in this matter. He would suggest, now that military matters were more attended to, from the urgency of the state of national affairs, that the Report to which he had referred should be laid before the House. He believed that Report had been made by the chaplain-general, who was partly a military and partly a clerical authority; for he had been originally in the army. He knew that a Report had been drawn up at the public expense, and the Executive Government had no right to withhold it from the House. He hoped that the hon. Gentleman the Clerk to the Ordnance, who had probably not heard of it before, would inquire about it, and ascertain whether there was any objection to its being laid before the House. He believed that Report would prove that the continental governments paid more attention to this subject than we did, and expended more money on barrack accommodation. With regard to the camp at Aldershot, he had been rather surprised to hear the magniloquent speech of the hon. Member for Coventry (Sir J. Paxton) which led him to suspect that a general election was near. That hon. Member seemed to say that this was a maritime country, and only a maritime country. At all events, it was admitted that we had now sufficient military means; and to say that our maritime resources were all that was required for our defence was a little too strong. It would be most inconsistent, after voting 120,000*l.* last year for the purchase of land about Aldershot, which he thought extremely wise and judicious, if they were to prevent the executive Government from carrying out the object contemplated by that purchase.

MR. W. BROWN said, he merely wished to direct attention to some huts open for inspection at Willis's Rooms. These huts each contained twenty-two feet of space, and could be divided into four parts; the whole weight was eighteen cwt., while they had stoves and glass windows. Besides this they were double boarded and lined with India rubber, and he had seen them taken down in four minutes and put up in eight; their total cost being 22*l.* 10*s.* per hut.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he believed that our present system of barracking was attributable in a great measure to our system of quartering troops. If a plan were adopted of concentrating the troops the saving to the country would be immense, and he could not, therefore, but regret that the barracks at Aldershot and the Curragh were merely intended for a temporary purpose. With reference to the vote for the additional barracks at Dovor, he wished to observe that he could see no reason why the troops stationed there should not be lodged in the casemate barracks as well as at Malta and Corfu, whereas every one who had been quartered there knew the casemates were not so occupied. He thought, however, that the expenditure would be much more judicious if the money were allotted to erecting permanent barracks at Aldershot, and in addition to that, he believed it was wrong in a military point of view to concentrate a large body of troops at such a place as Dovor. As regarded the barracks at Sheffield and Preston, although they are not perfect, still a great deal of money had been expended on them. Indeed, those at Sheffield had cost, as he had been given to understand, as much as 100*l.* a man, while troops were retained there merely for police purposes. Now, what he contended for was that if these towns required the presence of military for such objects they should be made to contribute to the expense of lodging them. Such, at all events, was the practice in France. The hon. and gallant Member for Wigan (Colonel Lindsay) had called attention to the canteen system. There could be no doubt it was perfectly disgusting as carried out abroad; for there the Government farmed the whole, and the worst wines and spirits were served to the men that some saving might be effected for the Government. There could be no doubt there was the greatest possible want of economy in the system adopted of getting rid of barracks and the taking them up again. Some time ago the barracks at Fermoy were sold for a poor-house. Now, however, they were taken back again, and a large additional expense had to be incurred. He would also like to know from the hon. Gentleman the Clerk to the Ordnance, why it was that the Government had purchased houses in Ship Street, Dublin, for the purpose of barracks, which was confessedly one of the very worst situations in that city. With respect to the hospital to be erected at the Tower, he saw likewise that a vote was required for building a store there also. Now as there was only room for one of these within the walls, he wished to know which of these buildings was to be placed there. And, lastly, perhaps the hon. Gentleman would tell the Committee when the barracks in Portman Street would be given up, and where a substitute was to be found for them.

MR. OTWAY said, it was impossible to look upon this Vote without some amount of consternation, when they saw that something like 1,500,000*l.* had been devoted in this and last year to the repair of barracks, and to new works in connection with them. It seemed to him very desirable that the troops should, as far as possible, be lodged in barracks and not be billeted, and if the people of this country were to be called upon to contribute so large a sum as this, they were entitled to expect that the troops should be so lodged. He would call the hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Monsell's) attention to an item of 2,000*l.* for the accommodation of military lunatics at Fort Pitt, and he wished to know whether at a more reasonable price, and with more comfort to themselves, the patients lodged might not be placed in private asylums there?

MR. APSLEY PELLATT said, he wished to have some explanation of the item of 3,560*l.* for the erection of chapel schools at Sheerness. He wanted to know whether a school or a chapel was required; and if the latter, would there be any additional expense in providing a chaplain? There was also an item of 6,000*l.* for officers' new barracks at Sheerness. What did that mean?

MR. MONSELL said that there had been some new barracks built for the soldiers, and now there were new ones required for the officers who commanded them. As to the item for chapel schools, the building would be used as a school on week days, and for the purpose of celebrating divine service on Sundays; but there would be no extra charge for the services of a chaplain. That matter was not in his department, and therefore he should not offer any explanation of it. In answer to the observations of the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. A. Pellatt) with respect to the officers' barracks at Sheerness, he begged to say that there were no barracks at present existing which could be used for the accommodation of the officers, and it was therefore intended to provide them now. The hon. and gallant Member for Portarlington (Colonel Dunne) complained that the barracks at Aldershot were temporary; but the truth was, that they proposed to erect permanent barracks for 10,000 men, which would be constructed according to the most approved plans followed in France and Belgium, as ascertained by the Commission of engineer officers. He quite agreed with the hon. and gallant Member, that it was extremely desirable to promote the comfort of the soldiers in barracks, and that object had not been lost sight of in the present estimates. With respect to the Ship Street barracks in Dublin, a sum of 5,000*l.* had been already expended; they had commenced the concentration of troops in that city, and hoped that the system might be found advisable in future years. As regarded the means of defence for harbours, he was happy to assure the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Cowan) that Scotland had been very liberally treated. At Dunbar the whole battery was to be restored, at Leith considerable fortifications were to be erected for the defence of the harbours and roads, and at Arbroath, Aberdeen, Peterhead, as well as in the Orkney and Shetland Islands, and in the Clyde, the old batteries were to be restored and new ones constructed, whilst at Banff the question of restoring a battery was under consideration. With regard to the Tower, certain storehouses, which were absolutely necessary, would be erected, as well as a hospital outside, which would not interfere with the stores.

MR. ADDERLEY said, that in reference to the Votes for works in the Colonies, he thought it was high time that the Cape of Good Hope, which had now a representative government, should undertake works for the defence of its own frontier. The only forces calculated to keep that country quiet, and to meet the attacks of the Kafirs, were the local forces to be raised there. The Government should not encourage the colony to lean any longer upon England for its defence. A similar course ought to be taken in respect to Canada and Australia. In respect to the erection of barracks at Williamstown, Port Natal, Quebec, and other places, he thought that, as a principle, it was most essential that the Committee should come to some general conclusion upon those items in the Votes. He hoped that the few words he had said would be deemed deserving of the attention of the Government, and that they should not find such Votes in the Estimates of next year.

MR. MONSELL said, he could assure his hon. Friend that the attention of the Government had been directed to the subject. They had taken steps this year to withdraw the garrisons from all places in Canada, except Quebec and Kingston. In Australia, the military force was at present about one-fourth of what it was. In regard to the Cape of Good Hope, the necessity of the large expenditure proposed arose from the removal of the head-quarters to Graham's Town. It was impossible to effect the desired object at once, but considerable progress towards it had been made.

MR. BAILLIE said, what his hon. Friend (Mr. Adderley) complained of, was the cost of erecting barracks at the Cape. His hon. Friend said, that if we pay for troops at the Cape, surely it was not too much to expect that the colony would furnish them with barrack accommodation.

MR. JACKSON said, he concurred in the view of the hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Adderley). With regard to the various items of the present Vote, there were some which appeared to him to be very extravagant. There was one item of 250*l.* for making two water-closets. In any new barracks to be constructed he trusted that ample space and room would be allowed, so as to provide for the health of the troops.

MR. MONTAGUE CHAMBERS said, he believed that the vast total of the Estimates arose from the large number of small items which usually passed unnoticed. In offering the contracts the most ample information should be laid before the public, so that men might come forward to tender immediately, and that there might be no room for favouritism. He should like to know whether it was the expectation of the Government that the war would be of long continuance. If they did not, where was the necessity of providing barrack accommodation for 70,000 men. As the Cape of Good Hope had been mentioned, he begged to observe that there were two regiments there which had seen some service, the 45th and 73rd, and which, as they had served their period of colonial service, might be made available for the operations in the Crimea.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he had no wish to object to the providing of sufficient barrack accommodation, but he should like to know whether, before this estimate was framed, a general survey of the barrack accommodation of the United Kingdom had been made; and if so, whether any Report had been made, and whether there would be any objection to lay such Report on the table?

MR. MONSELL said, the most minute and careful calculations had been made on the subject. It had been already stated, that there would be a deficiency in barrack accommodation to the extent of somewhere about 70,000 men, when the whole of the militia were embodied. Although a large sum was taken for lodging 50,000 men in temporary barracks, there would be no necessity for proceeding with the permanent barracks more rapidly than they were required. Permanent barracks for 30,000 men were now in progress, and although the Government had proposed votes which would enable them to provide permanent barrack accommodation for 20,000 additional men, those barracks would not be erected unless it were found they were likely to be wanted.

LORD SEYMOUR said, he wished to know what was the amount of barrack accommodation for infantry and cavalry already available in the country, and what was the number of troops which would require such accommodation when all the militia were embodied? They would then know what their position really was with regard to barrack accommodation. He thought it was most desirable that the whole subject of barrack accommodation should be carefully reviewed, and that they should get rid of the numerous old and detached barracks which were spread over the country. As the contract system had been alluded to, he must say he thought there was a great deal of deception with respect to the cheapness of contracts. The Government often found themselves bound by contracts which, although they had been supposed very advantageous to the country, proved to be very expensive. Indeed, it had been stated by Mr. M'Culloch, before a Committee upstairs, that the contract system, unless it was carefully conducted, allowed more jobbing and cheating than any system that could be devised.

MR. MONSELL said, that it would probably be his duty, in the course of a few days, to explain certain alterations about to be made in the Ordnance Department, by which he hoped that any faults existing in the present contract system would be entirely removed. The subject of barrack accommodation had received the careful attention of the Government during the last year, and changes were in contemplation which would involve the abandonment of the detached barracks, many of them not affording accommodation for more than 200 men, which he regarded as a pest to the country, and as objectionable, not merely on economical, but upon social and political grounds.

MR. JACKSON said, he wished to know upon what Report of the Ordnance Department the hon. Gentleman had made his estimates?

MR. MONSELL said, that the cost was founded, in the first instance, upon the estimate made by their own officer, and afterwards upon the amount of the temporary barracks already contracted for.

MR. FITZROY said, it appeared to him that there was great dissatisfaction felt both as regarded the locality and the requirements of the service to much of the barrack accommodation throughout the country. He hoped that the subject of barrack accommodation generally would be now carefully considered. He hoped that the new barracks would be erected only in those large and open spaces where ample room would be afforded for large masses of soldiery acting together.

(3.) 197,657*l.*, Non-Effective Services.

COLONEL NORTH said, he wished to ask whether any plan was under consideration for bestowing a mark of approbation on the subaltern officers of the artillery corps for their distinguished services in the last campaign. From the rules of the service it was impossible to promote these officers. Four captains had been promoted to majorities, but the subalterns had received no reward. He would suggest that a system might be introduced similar to that adopted in the navy, with regard to mates, of noting subalterns who distinguished themselves for promotion to brevet majorities as soon as they attained the rank of captain.

MR. MONSELL said, the hon. and gallant Member must be aware that he had no control in the world over that matter. He could only promise to bring the suggestion under the notice of the proper authorities.

Vote agreed to.

LUNATIC ASYLUM (IRELAND) ADVANCES BILL.

Order for second reading read ;

Motion made, and Question proposed, "that the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. SULLIVAN said, he should give his utmost opposition to the Bill, unless the Government made a candid statement of their intentions.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said he must also demand an explanation from the Government, and he should therefore move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

Question proposed, "That the word 'now,' stand part of the Question."

THE CHANCELLOR OR THE EX-CHEQUER said that he thought the most satisfactory way of dealing with the Bill would be to allow it to be read a second time that evening. Before it went into Committee such alterations might be made in the Bill as would meet the views of the Irish members, whose suggestions for rendering it more effective the Government would be happy to receive.

MR. SERJEANT SHEE said, he thought the course which had just been proposed by the right hon. Gentleman would scarcely prove satisfactory, inasmuch as the suggestions of the Irish members might have no weight in inducing the Government to alter those opinions with reference to the Bill which they had no doubt conscientiously formed. For his own part, he thought that the best course to adopt would be, to refer the Bill to a Select Committee.

MR. ROCHE said, he hoped the Government would give them a Select Committee on the subject, and if they acceded to that proposal he trusted his hon. Friend (Mr. Pollard-Urquhart) would withdraw his amendment.

THE CHANCELLOR OR THE EXCHEQUER said, his desire was to contribute to the settlement of this question, and, therefore, he had suggested that there should be a conference between the Government and the Irish Members on the subject. If the result of that conference should not be satisfactory to the Irish Members, he did not deny their right to move for a Committee, or to take any other course which might appear to them to be necessary. After the conference those hon. Gentlemen would stand in the same position as they did at present. All he wished was that an intermediate conference should be held in order to see whether the grounds of difference could not be arranged.

MR. DISRAELI said the Bill appeared to him to be a Bill of indemnity to the Government. Such a Bill, if not viewed with suspicion, ought at least to be looked at with considerable vigilance by that House. Some hon. Members, it appeared, thought it would be convenient to discuss the matter at the Treasury Chambers, imagining that the difficulties which now existed would then disappear, and that was evidently the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but in the mean time he asked the House to read the Bill a second time. He (Mr. Disraeli) did not object to the propriety of Ministers of the Crown cultivating a frank acquaintance with Members of the House ; but it was preposterous, when difficulties arose, that a Minister should propose to make those difficulties vanish by private communications behind the Speaker's chair or at the Treasury, asking the House at the same time to assent to the principle of the measure. The proper course would be to postpone the second reading of the Bill until the difficulties could be settled. Nothing could be more inconvenient and unconstitutional than the habit, which was growing into a practice, of conducting public affairs, not with reference to the opinion of the House of Commons or the House of Lords, but by an understanding to be arrived at between Ministers and private Members of Parliament under the influence of official quarters. If the right hon. Gentleman really believed that grave objections existed to the measure, and that they might be removed by frank explanations of a private character, he was justified in taking the course which he proposed; but he was not justified in now pressing the Bill to a second reading.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, if he understood the matter rightly, this was not exactly a Bill of indemnity to the Government. He believed the irregularity had been going on for a considerable time, and was equally applicable to other Governments. The difference which existed was more in appearance than reality. The Bill could not be referred to a Select Committee until it had been read a second time, and, therefore, in order to attain the object sought by hon. Members, it was necessary that the Motion for the second reading should be agreed to. If no agreement were come to between the Irish Members and his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it would then be as competent for any Member to move the reference of the Bill to a Select Committee as it was at present.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he thought that there ought to be a distinct understanding that if an agreement were not come to, the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. GRANVILLE VERNON said, he would add his voice to that of the Irish Members, in hoping the Government would adopt the reasonable course suggested.

MR. HORSMAN said, there had been some misunderstanding on the subject; if, on a conference with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Gentleman did not think it necessary to make the desired changes in the measure, there would be no objection to refer it to a Select Committee.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, upon that understanding he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE CAVALRY CHARGE AT BALAKLAVA.

THE EARL OF LUCAN: My Lords, I am anxious, before I make the Motion with which I propose to conclude, to read two letters. The first is addressed to me by the Adjutant General, in answer to the application I made for a reconsideration of my case, in consequence of the new charges brought forward against me by Lord Raglan, and is as follows—

" Horse Guards, 12th March, 1855.

" My Lord,—I have had the Honour to lay before the General Commanding in Chief your Lordship's Letter of the 5th instant, in which you express with increased Anxiety your earnest Desire, in consequence of the perusal of Field Marshal Lord Raglan's Letter to the Duke of Newcastle of the 16th December, 1854, that your Lordship's whole Conduct at Balaklava on the 25th October last may be investigated by a Court martial.

" I am desired to assure your Lordship, that the General Commanding in Chief has given to your Case the most careful and deliberate Consideration, and his Lordship sees no grounds for altering the Decision which has been already communicated to your Lordship, that he cannot recommend that your Conduct on the 25th October should be investigated by a Court-martial.

" I have, &c.

" (Signed) G. A. WETHERALL, A.G.

" Major General the Earl of Lucan, &c. &c."

To this letter I have sent the following reply—

" Hanover Square, March 12.

SIR,—I have just had the honour of receiving your letter informing me that the General Commanding in Chief adhered to his decision not to allow my conduct on the day of the action at Balaklava, the 25th of October last, to be investigated by a court-martial, as I earnestly prayed. I venture to remark, that it is unprecedented that charges so damaging to a general officer, imputing to him, as they do, inattention to one order, misconception of a second, and incapacity to execute the instructions he had received, should be brought against him by his Commander in Chief without an opportunity of meeting them being afforded to him. These charges are now for the first time brought against him by his Commander in Chief without an opportunity of meeting them being afforded to him. These charges are now for the first time brought under my notice, four months after the event, and are of so grave a character that, if well-founded, they should have incapacitated me from being continued for one hour longer in a command for which I had shown myself so wholly unfitted. Sir, a great wrong is thus done me, as I confidently affirm that, had the court-martial been conceded to me, I should have had no difficulty in establishing the injustice of the charges contained in Lord Raglan's letter of the 14th December, by the testimony of the most distinguished officers, not only of our own, but also of the French army.

"I have the honour to be,

"Your obedient servant,
"LUCAN, Major General."

I believe that in order to place these documents in your Lordships' hands, it is necessary that I should move that they be presented by the Government, which I beg to do.

LORD PANMURE said, that the documents the noble Earl had read were not yet in his possession, nor had he ever seen the letter which had been sent by the noble Earl in reply to the communication addressed to him by the Adjutant General conveying the Commander in Chief's decision not to grant the application for a court-martial. He had, however, to state, on the part of the Government, in reference to that proceeding, that he should be prepared to justify the decision of the General Commanding in Chief at any time, should their Lordships think it right to enter into any discussion of that question.

THE EARL OF LUCAN said, he was glad to hear the noble Lord make such an announcement; and that he would in consequence give notice now, that on that day week he intended, in order to bring the whole subject under discussion, to move for the production of Lord Raglan's Report of the battle of Balaklava, and also of his (Lord Lucan's) Report of that action.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he thought that, as the noble Lord (Lord Panmure) had consented to the discussion of the subject, he could not well refuse to grant the papers which had been asked for; but he must, with all respect to his noble and gallant Friend (the Earl of Lucan), call attention to a great irregularity which his Motion involved. The letter his noble and gallant Friend had received from the Commander in Chief was an official letter; and it was not competent, according to the practice of that House, for any noble Lord to read an official letter addressed to himself and then move for its production. He trusted that the course his noble and gallant Friend had thought fit to take would not be drawn into a precedent, for though in this instance it might not be attended with any great inconvenience; in others very serious mischief might result.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE BILL.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, having brought up the report on this Bill, observed that he had received several suggestions in opposite directions. Some parties were of opinion that if the Bill confined the jurisdiction to petty sessions great delay would often occur, inasmuch as in remote districts petty sessions were not held more than once in a fortnight. On the other hand, it had been suggested that cases ought not to be tried at petty sessions without providing that they should always be tried in open court. Now he could not yield to either of these suggestions. In some cases there might certainly be a delay of a fortnight; but this was a difficulty with which it was impossible to grapple, unless in every place there should be a petty sessions always going on. With regard to enacting that the petty sessions should be a public place, he did not like to introduce such a provision, because the Court of Queen's Bench had decided that the words, "petty sessions" implied a holding in public. He wished to introduce certain amendments in the Bill—such as the form to be adopted by the justices making convictions, and would then name a day for the third reading.

LORD BROUGHAM concurred in the course which had been taken by his noble and learned Friend in not yielding to the objections to which he had referred; and as the principal objections to which he had taken exception had been removed, he did not think he should have occasion to press his own Bill further. The noble and learned Lord then said that he intended before the recess to bring before their Lordships the most important subject of criminal law procedure. He proposed to go into every part of the subject except the law as to punishment.

Amendments reported; further Amendments made.

Bill to be read 3<sup>d</sup>, on Thursday next.

SECRETARIES AND UNDER SECRETARIES OF STATE (HOUSE OF COMMONS) BILL.

EARL GRANVILLE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, the necessity for it had arisen in consequence of the separation which had taken place between the War and the Colonial Departments. Its object was to remove the illegality of three Secretaries of State and Under Secretaries sitting in the House of Commons at the same time.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, that of course he should not object to the Bill, inasmuch as he had himself, on the separation of the offices, suggested that it would be necessary to pass a Bill to this effect.

EARL GREY: My Lords, I understand that this Bill has been rendered necessary by the recent consolidation of the old War Office and the new department of the Secretary of State for War. Although I cannot say I do not entertain serious doubts whether, even as a temporary measure, that was, as a whole, the best measure which could have been adopted—although it falls extremely short of that general reform of the military departments which I am convinced is necessary, and the urgent necessity of which is more and more proved by every day's experience, and by the new disclosures of mismanagement which have taken place; and although this measure cannot, therefore, be accepted as effecting all the necessary general improvements in the military departments, still I feel that it is not proposed with that view by the Government. Shortly after the appointment of my noble Friend the Secretary of State for War (Lord Panmure) to his present office, he said, among other things, that the attention of Her Majesty's Government should be called to the subject of the constitution of the military departments. He promised that he would bring forward a measure to consolidate under one Minister, at all events, the civil business of the army; but at the same time he said that he could not turn his attention to this subject until he had given it to the more pressing one of providing for the immediate wants of the army in the Crimea, and of applying remedies to the evils that had arisen; and I thought that this was most fair on the part of my noble Friend; and, as the subject was one requiring great consideration, it would have been very improper to have pressed him to bring forward with any undue haste a measure of such importance. Although, however, I am of opinion that even in the first attempts something more than the measure before your Lordships might have been adopted and accomplished without much difficulty, still I have no fault to find with my noble Friend, and will wait with patience for the larger measure that he has promised, and which I have no doubt in due time he will propose to this House, if it should be one requiring Parliamentary interference, or, if it should not, will advise Her Majesty of Her own accord to adopt.

VOL. CXXXVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

I wish, however, to take the present opportunity of calling your Lordships' attention to this—if it is acknowledged by Her Majesty's Government that the present constitution of the military departments is unsatisfactory, and that they, as they have stated, intend at an early period to bring forward some plan to place these departments on a more satisfactory footing, then it does appear to me to follow, as a matter of course, that it is highly inexpedient, while these departments continue in their present state, to adopt any measure of a large character, involving a large expenditure, which has not reference to the immediate wants arising from the war. With regard to the war, no one objects to Her Majesty's Government, though the departments are imperfectly constituted, proposing without a moment's delay whatever measures may be necessary for the war; but when they bring forward plans of an extensive character and involving a heavy expenditure—plans which are not to take effect during the present war, but which have reference to the permanent wants of the country—then the case appears to me to be greatly altered; and with regard to such a plan I cannot help saying that a large expenditure of this kind, in the present state of the military departments, ought to be avoided. It is on this ground that I have felt some alarm at some of the Votes proposed in the Ordnance Estimates which have been laid before the other House, and that alarm has been increased by the manner in which I am informed these Votes have been explained. I find that it is proposed to take a Vote of 1,000,000*l.* for new works at home in the course of the present year, and this Vote is in addition to a Vote of 560,000*l.* granted for the same purpose last year—so that in two years these Votes amount to nearly 1,600,000*l.* My Lords, this appears to me to be a large sum, especially as it does not represent the whole of the expenditure for this purpose, because a considerable number of the works to be undertaken will not be finished during the present year and with the present grants, but the large grants now taken are only for the purpose of commencing them; and in future years large grants will have to be made, or the money now granted will probably have been thrown away. The subject, therefore, is one of considerable importance. We are told that these Votes are taken with a view to a permanent system of defence; they are not for providing against any particular danger in any one year rather than another, but to enable the country to maintain its proper position of defence. Therefore I say they come within the description of works which, in my opinion, it is inexpedient at the present moment to proceed with. It appears that the main bulk of these works consist of new barracks and fortifications. It has been explained that it is intended to put an end in a great measure to the system of dividing the troops into small bodies, and to build barracks at particular places capable of containing large numbers. I entirely approve this alteration; it is one I have long thought ought to be adopted; for I know that it is injurious to the army to employ the troops as police, and that the division of them into comparatively small detachments in the manufacturing districts prevents them from being brought under that discipline which is necessary—for it is impossible in these busy hives of industry to obtain ground sufficient for the purpose of military instruction; in many parts, I believe, places cannot be obtained where ball practice can be carried on without taking the troops to a considerable distance, and there are many other inconveniences. Besides, I think that, in point of policy, it is inexpedient to confide the preservation of the peace to the troops—that it should be entirely confided to the police. We know that in this city since the establishment of the metropolitan police, some twenty-eight years ago, though we have gone through times of no ordinary agitation, yet we may congratulate ourselves that in no one instance has it been necessary to employ the troops, though in former times this necessity was continually recurring. The troops may in one or two instances have been kept in readiness to support the police; but they have never been employed. The duty of maintaining the peace having been satisfactorily performed in this city by the police, I think that other great towns and counties may reasonably be expected to perform similar duties for themselves, and that the troops ought only to be kept in situations where, in cases of serious disturbances, they might be brought forward to support the police; and, with the facilities afforded by railroads, this can be done without interfering with the concentration of the troops. I have stated thus much to show that I should be the last to make objections to the principle of these alterations; but I say that at this moment it is not necessary that measures of this kind should be brought forward. In the first place, these new barracks cannot be finished in time to be serviceable for the present war, unless, unfortunately, it continues longer than I think it likely. The Estimates, moreover, contain a vote for the erection of barracks, capable of holding 50,000 men. Now, considering how large a proportion of the army is abroad, and that the real want of barracks is chiefly confined to those troops getting ready to be employed abroad, I cannot help thinking that, in addition to the existing, temporary barracks capable of holding so large a number of men will meet the exigency of the present case. The other object of the Votes to which I have alluded is that of the fortification of our principal ports. Though this is a matter most proper to be attended to, it is most desirable to prevent the infliction of any serious blow on our ports by small expeditions; but if ever there was a time when such an attack was the least to be apprehended, it certainly is the present; because we are now acting in strict alliance with one of the great maritime Powers of Europe; and with respect to the other, Russia, with which we are at war, we have ample means of defending ourselves from any attack by her inferior forces. There is, therefore, no immediate necessity for additional fortifications; and in case of such works of defence being required, earthworks can be thrown up with great rapidity, for we know to our cost that even after our troops had sat down before Sebastopol, the Russians had succeeded in throwing up earthworks which have foiled all our endeavours, and I believe that at this moment Sebastopol is stronger than when the siege operations commenced. I blush to say that Russia has shown a superiority to ourselves in many points of military organisation; and with all our improvements in arms and boasted progress of civilisation, I cannot help thinking that we have reason to blush at the way in which we have in many points been exceeded by a comparatively barbarous nation. At all events, I am fully persuaded that in the erection of fortifications and earthworks, when the exigency arises, we shall not be found inferior to Russia, and that not many days—I believe I might say not many hours—would be required to render any one of our great ports safe from any attack that might be contemplated against it. I am persuaded that if need should arise, the heads which contrived and the hands which executed our great system of railways, if they were employed for such a purpose, would not be long in creating earthworks for the defence of our maritime cities to which the earthworks of Sebastopol would be but a joke. I say, then, that these works are not urgently necessary; and not being so, the argument I wish to submit to your Lordships is, that it would be injudicious to proceed with them during the present war. When the attention of the Government and of their officers is necessarily absorbed in the prosecution of the great contest in which we are now engaged, it stands to reason that it is quite impossible that a great plan for re-distributing our troops during peace, and for fortifying our coasts, can be considered at the present moment with the deliberation and care that are demanded; and remember that mature deliberation is required before such a plan as this, involving a large outlay of public money, is carried into effect. Many questions have to be settled, not only as to the most convenient position in which to establish your troops, but also as to the best manner of providing accommodation for them; and so likewise with regard to your fortifications. The experience of the present war is sufficient to show, that in spending large sums upon fortifications, it is not safe to blindly follow the beaten track, without inquiring what alteration may be requisite in the former system as the result of the progress of modern science and invention. Well, even if these subjects were to be considered by an authority in which there was every reason to place implicit confidence, it is not in time of war that they can be satisfactorily dealt with. But the authorities by whom such plans would have to be considered are such as I do not conceive to be entitled to that confidence. The Government have determined to remodel the civil departments of the army. They have done this under the pressure of the general opinion—an opinion unanimously entertained, I believe, from one end of the country to the other—that under the existing organisation of those departments our military affairs have not been well conducted, and that there has been a want of judgment shown before the war in applying the money voted by Parliament for keeping up the services of the country against the outbreak of hostilities, and also since the war in the appropriation of the larger grants that have been recently made. I believe it is likewise acknowledged that no small proportion of this mismanagement, which I may say is justly attributed to our military departments, is more particularly due to the Ordnance Department. I have no hesitation in saying, from what I know of the manner in which that department has been conducted, under every successive Administration since the peace to the present period, that the impression which prevails on this point is entirely well founded. The manner in which the enormous grants, made during the last forty years for fortifications and for barracks, have been expended gives the utmost ground for distrust. Take the case of fortifications. It would ill become me, a non-professional man, to express a decided opinion on the works of this kind which have been undertaken; but this I know, that as to the works that have been devised for our defence at home I find a very general concurrence of belief among those who are most capable of forming an opinion on such a subject, and on whose judgment I place the greatest reliance, that these works have been injudiciously planned and expensively executed. It is well known that they are objects of derision to all foreign professional men; and in some cases mistakes have been pointed out which a non-professional man, though he might not, perhaps, at first discover them, could hardly fail to see, when his attention is once called to them, are very manifest defects. I will mention one instance. Some time ago, I was examining one of the new batteries that have been constructed at Plymouth, which has been erected at considerable cost, and which seemed to me extremely formidable. I was told that it certainly looked very well, but that a foreign engineer who saw it had expressed the opinion that it was "a regular shell-trap"—that the battery was placed at the foot of a high perpendicular precipice, and so situated that every shot and shell fired at it, and missing the men, if it struck the rock behind them, must infallibly bring down large fragments of it upon them, and in a few minutes kill every artilleryman at the guns. Such was the opinion of a very eminent foreign engineer as to this fortification, and certainly when I heard the remark it appeared to me to be very well founded. This battery has been erected, I believe, within a very few years, and in many others of our recent works of defence similar errors may be detected. Then as to barracks, with regard to which a non-professional man may form a judgment with more confidence than he can respecting fortifications; from the little that I know about buildings I must say I cannot resist the conclusion that the barracks which have been provided for the English army by the Board of Ordnance have been injudiciously contrived in point of accommodation, and enormously costly in proportion to the extent of accommodation they afford. Even in the present Estimates there is good reason to believe that the same thing is the case. The Cambridge barracks, I believe, are estimated to cost somewhat more than 18,600*l.*, and are intended to accommodate 500 men and forty-four officers, or altogether 544 persons. This gives a cost of about 70*l.* per head. Now, a cottage—not, indeed, of the first class, but with two or three very comfortable rooms—may be built for less than 70*l.*; and two rooms in a cottage of that kind, I am sure, would furnish better accommodation for five or six men than you will give to every one of your soldiers at this extravagant rate. Again, the amount which I have named is only the estimated expense of these barracks, and your Lordships may be aware that there is very seldom a case in which the original estimate is not exceeded by the actual cost.

LORD LYNDHURST called the noble Earl's attention to an error that he had made in his calculation of the cost per head of the barracks in question. It would not amount to more than 30*l.*, instead of 70*l.*

EARL GREY: I beg pardon; I have given your Lordships the wrong figure. 37,000*l.* is the estimated cost of these barracks, making, in fact, just 71*l.* per man. The item of 18,600*l.* is the cost of providing barrack accommodation for forty-five officers, or at the rate of upwards of 400*l.* for each. Another item in the same Estimates is 1,200*l.* for finding barrack accommodation for a field-officer at Shoeburyness. Why, a good farm-house for the accommodation of a farmer and his family can be built for 800*l.*, but in this instance 50 per cent more than that sum is to be spent in erecting quarters for a single field-officer. These remarks occur to me on the most cursory inspection of these Estimates, but I rely more upon the notorious fact, which I never found a single officer in the army who did not confirm—namely, that the barrack accommodation provided for our troops by the Ordnance Department is both indifferent in kind and exceedingly costly. That being so, is it expedient that you should incur this heavy outlay before it can be fully considered by authorities on whom perfect reliance can be placed? Observe this is an expense not necessary for temporary purposes, but is part of a large plan for the permanent benefit of the country; and what

I ask you to do is to suspend its execution until it can be maturely weighed at a more convenient moment and by a more competent authority. If the Ordnance Department were to continue in the state in which it has hitherto stood, it would be objectionable to proceed with such a scheme as this; but just look at the time at which it is proposed to carry it out. Why, you have practically no Master General of the Ordnance at present. I am told that the Secretary of State for the War Department means to contrive some plan by which all the strictly civil business shall be brought immediately under his own cognisance and control. But who is responsible for these Estimates? Of course, my noble Friend the Minister of War cannot be, for they were framed before he took office, and, with the multitude of more urgent matters which have claimed his attention, it is impossible for him to have given proper consideration to them. So far as I can see, the only person responsible is the Clerk of the Ordnance, and, with all possible respect for the Gentleman who now fills that office, I must say that so large an expenditure ought not to be undertaken until some one of the higher and more responsible servants of the Crown is enabled to state to Parliament that he has satisfied himself that the plan which we are now about to commence is a judicious one, and that he can with confidence recommend to Parliament the expenditure required. The fact that there is no such person at present responsible for this expenditure is one reason against its being incurred; but, in addition to that, surely the war in which we are at present engaged is of itself a sufficient load, without adding to its pressure by commencing arrangements which are not needed for the war. I am informed, according to the best calculations which can be made by persons whom I believe to be able to form a good opinion from the documents now accessible to the public, that it will be necessary in the present year, either by new taxes or by a loan, to raise, in addition to the revenue which is raised under existing taxation, a sum of not less than from 15,000,000*l.* to 20,000,000*l.* If this be so—if the necessary charges of the war are to be so heavy—it is very desirable not to augment them. Be it observed, moreover, that you cannot withdraw from the labour and capital embarked in the productive industry of the country without diminishing the revenue of the country, and sooner or later every class in the community must suffer from such a diminution. Every unnecessary work that you undertake now increases the competition of the Government with the farmer and manufacturer in the market for money and labour. If, indeed, the wants of the country are so great as we are led to believe, you will not be able to meet them without having recourse to a loan. Sooner or later, in some shape or other, you will have to borrow money. You did so last year, though you denied the fact; and probably you will have to do it again to a much larger extent to meet the expenses of this year. It is proverbial in private life, and I believe it is quite as true with regard to public matters, that borrowed money is always the most extravagantly expended. So will it be now. If these plans are commenced in the present state of excitement they will not be properly considered, your money will be ill-spent, and very likely for objects which you will find out by and by are entirely useless. I must say that the Estimates laid before Parliament bear marks of what I cannot help regarding as nothing but reckless extravagance. I do not grudge anything that is necessary for the effective conduct of the war; but so far as I can judge from all the information which is accessible to me, I feel persuaded that, in addition to what is necessary and useful, the country is at the present moment throwing away money by thousands and hundreds of thousands from want of due consideration and care in the manner of applying it. I deeply regret to see such traces of extravagance in the proceedings of the Executive Government; and I more deeply regret not to see that extravagance checked in that quarter where, by the constitution, a check ought to be applied. On the contrary, I firmly believe that the more wild and the more extravagant the votes of money proposed by the Government, the more popular they would be at the present moment with the House of Commons and the country; and I regret that Her Majesty's Government have availed themselves of that disposition to propose Votes which under present circumstances would have been much more fittingly postponed. We are told upon very high authority that it has been the mistake of the Government and the Parliament of this country to have acted with regard to these matters rather by fits and starts than upon any settled policy, and in particular it has been pointed out, that at the end of the last war the country very foolishly sold for a very inadequate sum a large number of barracks which had been built during the war. I perfectly concur in that accusation. I believe that it has been the fault of the Government to have acted rather too much in matters of this kind without any settled policy, and it is upon that account that I object to the extravagance which is now about to be recommended, because I know that it is sure to be followed by a reaction in the opposite direction. That is exactly what happened during the last war. Those barracks which I have mentioned were sold because enormous sums had been spent in so lavish and improvident a manner during the war that the country was disgusted, and at its termination rushed hastily into precipitate measures for injudicious economy. Something of the same sort will occur again. I have been long enough in Parliament to have noticed that hot and cold fits succeed each other upon these subjects. I have seen some of each, and I am confident that the more rein you now give to extravagance, the more certain it is that Parliament will in turn run into the opposite fault, and be guilty of undue parsimony. It is because I wish to see the establishments of the country kept up, as they ought to be, to a proper state of efficiency during peace as well as during war—it is upon this ground that I so strongly deprecate what appears to me that reckless extravagance which is now being indulged in. I do earnestly hope, though the House of Commons has already voted the money, that my noble Friend (Lord Panmure), who is not responsible for these Estimates, will take care that no expenditure is incurred without the utmost consideration; and I cannot help giving him this piece of counsel—that in applying for assistance and advice he will not confine himself to the narrow field of a seniority corps. Let not the only authorities whom my noble Friend consults be the engineer officers—men promoted by seniority alone, and wedded too much, I am afraid, to routine; but let him go to those men whose talents have raised them to distinction in civil life. After all, the same principles of physical science apply to fortifications and to railroads; and it is a profound knowledge and a successful application of these principles that have enabled our Stephensons and Brunels to fill this country with those great works which will be the wonder of succeeding ages. From such men as these, and from our great builders, my noble Friend will get far more trustworthy opinions than he could obtain within the narrow limits of a seniority service. I hope I need not apologise to your Lordships for having taken this opportunity for submitting these matters to your consideration; but I felt that the discussion upon a Bill involving so many changes and so many new arrangements, occasioned by the war in which we are at present engaged, was not an unfitting season for the remarks which I had to make.

LORD PANMURE: My Lords, my noble Friend need have made no apology for having addressed your Lordships with so much ability on these subjects to which he has called your attention. I have listened to his address with the interest with which I always listen to everything that falls from my noble Friend, and more especially because I believe there is no individual in this House, or in the other House of Parliament, who has for so many years, with so much zeal and assiduity, turned his attention to the matters which formed the subject of his speech. My Lords, with respect to the matter now immediately under consideration, I understand that my noble Friend does not question the principle on which it is founded; and with regard to the principal part of the speech of my noble Friend, it will be answered in one short piece of information which I am enabled to give him—namely, that with reference to the construction of either new barracks or of new works, all that can be suspended, until I can lay before your Lordships' House a plan for reorganising these departments, has been ordered to be suspended. I think, my Lords, it would have been somewhat rash to have done otherwise—and in this point I quite agree with the views of my noble Friend—that it would have been rash with the establishments and with the system which all have condemned, and which Government is about to reform, to rush into the expenditure of the vast sums voted by the House of Commons on principles which might admit of considerable condemnation. With respect to some of the points on which my noble Friend has touched, I cannot say that I altogether concur in his views. My noble Friend has condemned the plans of some of these works on the ground that this is not the time at which they should be undertaken. My Lords, the first to which he drew attention were the fortifications which are about to be erected for the defence of some of our considerable ports. Now, my Lords, I cannot agree with my noble Friend that this is not the time to undertake these works. I must say, if I yielded to that argument, I should inevitably be told, when the emergency should arise, that it was too late to think of them then. My Lords, I think this is the time to engage in useful works of defence, to take advantage of the willing disposition of the country to carry out works in this direction; for, as my noble Friend observes, I am well aware that the time will come when there will be a reaction, and when, consequently, however desirable it may be to erect these defences, and however much my noble Friend may then concur in the propriety of erecting them, we shall be refused the money by Parliament, and it will no longer be in our power to construct them. I consider that, so far as these fortifications go, we are moving in the right direction; and I quite agree that it will rest upon any Government who undertakes these works of defence to be responsible for their being erected in the most approved manner, according to the newest and most approved principles of fortification, by the best and most competent persons, and with the utmost economy that may be consistent with rendering them effectual for their purpose. Then, my Lords, with reference to barracks, my noble Friend states that the principle of collecting troops in large barracks, instead of scattering them up and down the country in small bodies, is one which he advocates. I entirely approve of that principle also; and I believe that if steps which have been now taken to erect barracks of this description at Aldershot had been taken ten or fifteen years ago we should not now have had to complain of the inadequacy of our troops to undertake a campaign, or of the little acquaintance which they appear to have with the habits and duties of a camp. It seems a large sum. About 250,000*l.* is about to be expended on the barracks at Aldershot for 10,000 men; but when my noble Friend says that we are to rely entirely on the authority of the Clerk of the Ordnance for the plans of these barracks, I beg to say that I have inquired as to the manner in which these plans have been made, and I find that an engineer officer of very considerable eminence and reputation was intrusted with a mission to Belgium to inspect the large barracks erected at Waterloo, which I believe is the most complete establishment of the kind in Europe, and, before the plans for the barracks at Aldershot were adopted, to see all that had been done there, to mark all that existed there, and, by the information which he was thus enabled to gather, to frame the plans for the barracks at Aldershot. Now, my Lords, what is the object for which these barracks are proposed to be erected? It is to assemble a force of 10,000 men at one particular point, at which point opportunities would be afforded for exercising a body of cavalry, infantry, and artillery, in all the evolutions of field exercise; for encamping men by turns, and seeing that they learn the duties and habits of a campaign; and so giving to these large bodies of troops during the time of peace or of war the preparation such as they can receive at home for the practice of war abroad. This is a step which may be adopted in this country without any one being able to charge the Government which adopts it with the intention of fostering, during times of peace, a force unnecessarily large for the wants and necessities of the country. I think, however, that the race of economy, which has been run by all Governments one after the other since the peace was proclaimed, has somewhat reduced us to the state in which we are now in, so that although we had an army with a regimental system admirably well conducted, we had no army in which the duties of the staff were known to the officers, or the duties of command known to the generals. These, my Lords, are faults which will be remedied by the sad experience of the war to a great extent, but they are faults which must not be allowed to occur again. The establishment of this camp at Aldershot, with ample ground for exercise, is one of the means by which the recurrence of these evils is sought to be avoided. Now, my Lords, with reference to the expenditure sought to be bestowed on these barracks, I can only say that on considering the subject I entirely agree with the views of my noble Friend in going beyond the limited experience of officers of the engineers and of calling in aid the skill of those great contractors and of those men who have rendered themselves famous in erecting the great buildings which are arising around us every day. I cannot see myself why these barracks, any more than any other buildings, should not be built by other than military masons; and I have yet to learn that it is more economical or more wise to employ a corps of military bricklayers and labourers merely for the purpose of doing that which the people of the country could do infinitely better and have much more experience in doing. I wish to say one word upon the subject of the reforms which it is intended to introduce into the Ordnance Department. It is not my intention to go into the subject at the present time; but what I wish to state is, that while I have given orders that no new works shall be commenced under the present system which can possibly be avoided, so I have endeavoured, as far as I can, to be in a position of bringing before you, not many days hence, the manner in which I propose to alter the organisation of the civil departments of the army. I propose, as I stated on a former occasion, to unite all the civil departments of the army under the superintendence and management of the Department of War, and I trust to lay before your Lordships a scheme effectual for that purpose, though, perhaps, it may not go in other respects quite so far as my noble Friend may think it ought. Now, my Lords, with reference to the temporary barracks which are being erected throughout the country, I did not gather from my noble Friend that he threw out any great objection against them. Hut barracks can be erected at the rate of 6,000*l.* for 1,000 men—or at the rate of 6*l.* a man—and the reason why hut barracks are immediately resorted to arises, not from the necessity of quartering the army in this country, for that purpose we have more barracks than we require; but because, as my noble Friend must recollect, we have a large force of militia embodied. It is quite true that we have legal means of quartering them. We may quarter them in billets; but I think no one can point out a more unpopular Act, or, I may say, one more oppressive on the part of a Government, than that of quartering by billets so large a force on the inhabitants of the country. The object of the Government is to relieve the people of this country as much as possible from the oppressive system of billeting. At this moment there are in Great Britain 44,000 militia embodied, of whom 10,000 are in barracks and 34,000 are actually in quarters. It is for the purpose of taking these men out of quarters that these hut barracks are being rapidly run up; and I believe they are not only being run up, but run up in such condition that if proper care be taken of them they will last for several years, and if they be not required they may be disposed of in the market when they are vacant, at an advantage to the public. I have alluded to that point of my noble Friend's speech because I wished to assure the public of this country, on the one hand, that the billeting system should, as speedily as possible, be got rid of ; and because I wished, on the other hand, to assure the commanding officers of militia, who, I know, are as deeply interested in the discipline and in the moral condition of their men as any officers of any regiments can be, that the men under their charge will speedily be released from that position in which no soldier can be bound to his regiment—namely, the position of being in billets, where no discipline nor any kind of control can be enforced. I think we were indebted to my noble Friend for having brought this subject before your Lordships' House. I shall not follow him into that part of the question in which he discussed the actual condition of the country. I have ample reasons for refraining from doing so ; but otherwise I think we are under obligation to my noble Friend for having drawn public attention to the matter.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he did not rise to continue the discussion on the wisdom of the policy pursued by the Government in the erection of barracks and fortifications ; but upon that matter he should say, before proceeding to make some observations upon the Bill actually before them, that he entirely agreed with Her Majesty's Government in their views of the wisdom of erecting barracks at Aldershot on a large scale, and of providing every other convenience for the troops ; because it was not sufficient to spend money merely in the enlistment and drilling of soldiers ; if they did not give their troops every opportunity of being brigaded and disciplined as a perfect army, it was of no use enlisting them at all. It was, therefore, with great pleasure, that he had heard the announcement of the intentions of Her Majesty's Government. But the Bill before the House had nothing whatever to do with that matter. It appeared to him that the first object of Her Majesty's Government in bringing forward the Bill now before them was to consult the public convenience as much as possible in the conducting of the public service in both Houses of Parliament, and to arrange so that the business of the country should be carried on in both Houses as clearly and succinctly as could be done, and with as little reference of questions from one Member of the Government to another, and from one department to another, as possible. Now, believing that to be the object of Government, and believing it to be also their Lordships' wish that such an object should be carried into effect, he begged the attention of their Lordships for a few moments, while he called it to the mistakes that had been made in the arrangement of offices under the present Government as respected that matter. In the first place, the different departments of the State were not represented in their Lordships' House in the manner in which he should wish to see them represented. For example, the departments that were represented in that House were the Foreign Office, which was doubly represented by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Clarendon) and by another noble Lord (Lord Wodehouse) ; the Board of Trade was represented by his noble Friend opposite (Lord Stanley of Alderley), who had been in that department some years, and who was of course competent to answer any question and make any explanation that might be demanded of him. The Post Office was also represented in their Lordships' House, and the War Department was in the hands of the noble Lord who had just sat down, his office forming a new Secretaryship of State. But there were other departments which were not represented in that House, equally important as any of the others, and equally deserving of being represented—he meant personally represented—in their Lordships' House. The Treasury had no one to represent it there, the Home Office had no one, the Colonial Office no one, the India Board no one, the Woods and Forests no one, and the Admiralty no one. Under the late Government their Lordships had the Prime Minister in their House, and as he, in fact, represented all the departments of the State, and was, or was supposed to be, cognisant of what was going forward in all of them, their Lordships might, perhaps, have been satisfied. But under the now Government the case was different. It seemed to him to be considered a mere matter of convenience, entirely for the consideration of Ministers, whether the Colonial Office should be represented there or not ; and indeed, from the reply given the other night in answer to a question on this subject, it would seem that the office was at present entirely in abeyance ; and he must say, he was quite astonished when, on a late occasion, the noble Lord the President of the Council stated, as a satisfactory reply to the inquiries of their Lordships, that Lord John Russell would return from Vienna as soon as he had laid down the grounds of a negotiation. He should have thought that the groundwork of a great negotiation was not a work that could not be intrusted to the hands of an Ambassador, but must, indeed, be confided to the care of a special Plenipotentiary. That was not the way in which great negotiations were carried out in 1797 or in 1801. The work of a special English Ambassador was not the mere laying of the groundwork of a negotiation; that was laid in London at the Foreign Office, and the real business of the Plenipotentiary was the arrangement of the details of the negotiation, which could not be arranged at home. He must, therefore, say, in passing, that the reason given by the noble Earl was very unsatisfactory. He thought it was fair at all times in their Lordships' House to make a comparison between past Governments and the Government of the day. In fact, that was the only way in which the country could judge of the respective merits of the two Governments, by comparing the acts of the deceased with those of the existing Government. He begged, therefore, to draw their Lordships' attention to the way in which his noble Friend behind him (the Earl of Derby) attempted to consult the public convenience in the arrangement of offices during the time he held the office of First Lord of the Treasury. In 1852, when his noble Friend was Prime Minister, he (the Earl of Derby) represented the Treasury in their Lordships' House. The Foreign Office was there represented by a Secretary of State, the Colonial Office was represented by an Under Secretary, the Admiralty was represented by the First Lord of the Admiralty (the Duke of Northumberland); the Board of Trade was represented by the Vice President of that Board. The Post Office had its representative there, and the President of the Council was also in the House. Now, he was sure that no man could exhibit more clearness or give more satisfaction in answering questions than his noble Friend the present President of the Council; but he thought that noble Earl was taxing his energies almost beyond the power of any man, if, not being Prime Minister himself, and therefore not being personally cognisant of the affairs that were passing through the different departments and their details, he took upon himself to reply to all questions of business and detail respecting so many departments—for example, to reply to all questions respecting the Treasury, the Home Office, the Colonial Office, the India Board, the Post Office, and the Admiralty.

Now, a noble Friend of his said the other night that there were two ways of despatching public business. The one way was that of reading all despatches carefully from beginning to end, and the other was that of reading the covering despatches but throwing aside the inclosures. There were also various ways of meeting the questions that were asked in their Lordships' House. One way was to refuse any answer at all. That way of meeting a question was a very favourite one with the noble Earl who was lately Prime Minister of the country. He (the Earl of Malmesbury) would leave it to their Lordships to say whether it was a satisfactory one. Another way was to make the answer a spartan answer, as short and concise as possible, leaving out all the information asked for. A third way was to throw so much confusion into the answer as to leave the questioner a great deal more perplexed than before he asked the question. He did not know which of these different methods the noble Lord the President of the Council proposed to himself to adopt and follow; but if he was ready to give their Lordships a full and ample explanation on all those points on which their Lordships were not fully informed, and if he was to enter into all the details of the subjects to which his attention might be called in a manner and with a fulness proportioned to the importance of those subjects, with all his (the Earl of Malmesbury's) opinion of the noble Earl's abilities and talents, he thought he must be possessed of superhuman power if their Lordships found at the end of the Session that they had had much information communicated to them.

EARL FITZWILLIAM said, he did not know in which way he was to be answered, but there was one point on which it was very desirable their Lordships should have some clear and definite idea. He wished to know whether it was the intention of the Government, at the end of the war, to give to this country during the ensuing peace, a character more military than that which it had borne during the last peace? He had heard observations made as if it were the opinion of some men of great authority in England that the successive Governments which had governed the country during the late peace of forty years had been guilty of great errors in reducing the national military establishments. From that opinion he entirely dissented. He believed that the reason why we were now capable of carrying on war (even though we had not carried it on so successfully as could have been wished) was because we had during that long period of peace husbanded the resources of the country, and had drawn them out and expended and employed them to the greatest possible advantage. His belief was that if during the last forty years, instead of maintaining, in round numbers an army of 100,000 men, we had maintained an army of 200,000 men, we should have been far less capable of conducting the existing war than we were under existing circumstances. He should therefore deeply regret if there were any opinion lurking in the minds of his noble Friends that it was desirable during peace to maintain larger establishments than those which they had maintained during the peace that was now past. He was desirous of making these few observations, because it appeared to him that it was desirable they should not adopt erroneous views upon that subject, and erroneous he was sure those views would be, if they contemplated the possibility, or the desirability rather, of making this country more military in its character than it had been during the late period of peace, and aping the establishments of the great military Powers of the Continent. That idea was, he was aware, foreign to the mind of one noble Friend of his, a Member of Her Majesty's Government, and he trusted it was also foreign to the minds of that noble Lord's colleagues.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that without having adopted the silent system, or either of the other systems to which his noble Friend (the Earl of Malmesbury) had referred, or even that one of which a noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) had afforded a striking example in having, while at the head of the Government, with his own peculiar ability, monopolised nearly every statement and every answer which it was necessary to make in that House on behalf of his Administration—without adopting any of the systems to which his noble Friend had referred, he (Earl Granville) trusted that during the short time he had acted as the representative of the Government, inefficiently as he had performed the duties which devolved upon him, he had never shrunk from giving as clear and full a reply as he could give to every question which had been put to him. With regard to the question which had just been asked by the noble Earl, as to whether it was the intention of the Government at the close of the war to give a more military character to this country than it had before assumed, although he (Earl Granville) was afraid it was somewhat premature at the present moment to consider what was to be done with the army immediately on the conclusion of a peace, yet he thought he was sufficiently well informed of the feelings and opinions of all his colleagues to know that their wish would be not to increase the military establishments of this nation; but by better arrangements to render the army we possessed more efficient for the purposes for which it might be required, at, if possible, a much smaller expense to the nation than under the present system.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he understood that the intention of the Government was to withdraw the troops from towns in which they were now stationed in small detachments, and to concentrate them in large bodies, in situations where they might be exercised in military manœuvres on an extensive scale, and he thought it was highly expedient for the efficiency of the army that it should be so; but he wished to suggest to Her Majesty's Government that it was absolutely necessary, with a view to the security of the public peace, that as a preliminary to that concentration of the troops in large masses they should establish an efficient, powerful, uniform police throughout the country. A case occurred last year in which a very large manufacturing town would have been exposed to the excesses of a riotous mob if there had not been an opportunity of obtaining immediate military assistance in consequence of the inefficiency of the police force established there; and it was therefore absolutely necessary, before withdrawing the troops from the manufacturing districts, and from those parts of the country in which it was possible—however improbable—that disturbances might occur, and placing them at a very considerable distance from these localities, that they should, either by arrangements with the several bodies which had the power of employing and increasing the police, or—which would, in his opinion, be much better—by some general Act of Parliament, provide for establishing from one end of the country to the other a uniform police force capable of protecting the public peace. As had been correctly stated by the noble Earl opposite, no occasion had occurred in this metropolis since the establishment of the metropolitan police force, when it had been necessary to call in the aid of the military, although certainly on several occasions the military had been prepared to render their assistance to the civil power.

Earl Fitzwilliam

He believed that the same good results would accrue throughout the whole country from the formation of a similar force, and that if an efficient system of police were established there would be no necessity for the employment of military force in aid of the civil power throughout the country; but he considered it absolutely necessary that a uniform and efficient police should be established as a preliminary to the proposed measures of the Government. He was not surprised that objections should have been raised to the Bill which was introduced on this subject last year, for a worse measure he thought he had never read; and he could not understand how a noble Lord who was supposed to possess extraordinary administrative abilities could have proposed to Parliament a Bill which, had it passed, would have been utterly inefficient for the purposes for which it was intended—but which did not pass, because it ran directly counter to the prepossessions, prejudices, and feelings of the entire community. He trusted that any new measure that might be proposed on this subject by the noble Lord as First Lord of the Treasury would be both efficient and acceptable to the country.

LORD PANMURE was understood to say, in case any impression should get abroad that the collecting of men at Aldershot would endanger the peace of large towns, that no troops would be withdrawn from any place where their presence was requisite, and that care would be taken still to afford ample protection to every one of Her Majesty's subjects.

THE EARL OF ELLESMORE said, he considered that the military establishments had been reduced during the peace to a condition inconsistent with the security of the country. He thought it would have been wise and prudent, perhaps, if the Government had determined at an earlier period upon a measure of which he entirely approved—the establishment of a camp at Aldershot. He spoke upon this subject from some personal experience; for at no distant period, during the Administration of Sir Robert Peel, he felt so strongly the enfeebled condition to which some of our establishments had been reduced, and the state of insecurity in which he conceived the country to be placed, that he had privately, but earnestly suggested to a Minister of the Crown that the Commander in Chief should be enabled to concentrate 10,000 men, properly composed of infantry, cavalry, and artillery, in some convenient place within Her Majesty's dominions, with a view to their exercise in military operations on a somewhat extensive scale. The answer he received confirmed all his previous convictions, and he rejoiced that at last so desirable an object was about to be accomplished.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2<sup>d</sup> accordingly; and committed to a Committee of the whole House To-morrow.

House adjourned till To-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, March 12, 1855.

MINUTES.] NEW MEMBER SWEORN.—For Ennis, John David Fitzgerald, esq.
PUBLIC BILL.—1<sup>o</sup> Price's Indemnity.
2<sup>o</sup> Intramural Burials (Ireland).

THE CREW OF THE "INVESTIGATOR"—QUESTION.

MR. FRENCH said, he begged to ask the hon. Member for Gloucester (Admiral Berkeley), if it was true that the crew of Her Majesty's ship Investigator, who, under the command of Captain M'Clure, accomplished the object for which so many expeditions have been sent from this country to the Arctic regions, namely, the discovery of the North-West passage, being ordered to abandon their vessel, leaving behind all their clothes and other property, have only received three pounds compensation per man.

ADMIRAL BERKELEY said, that the petty officers of the Investigator had received 3*l.*, and the seamen 2*l.* 10*s.*, which was all that was allowed them by the rules of the service; the clothes with which they were fitted out having been supplied gratuitously.

THE JUDGE OF ASSIZE AT WEXFORD—QUESTION.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, whether it was a fact that Mr. Hughes, one of the Judges of Assize on the Leinster Circuit, when about to open Her Majesty's commission in the Crown Court at Wexford (the High Sheriff and grand jury being then in attendance), proceeded to canvass the electors of a northern county, although no vacancy in its representation had taken place, and whether any permission or instruction had been given to Mr. Hughes to do so, either by the Lord Lieutenant or the Lord Chancellor, previous to the arrival of a substitute to preside in the Crown Court at Wexford?

MR. HORSMAN said, that on having received notice on this subject from the hon. Gentleman on Friday, he had sent to Ireland for the necessary information to enable him to answer it; and he was now able to state the circumstances, which were slightly different from the impression the hon. Gentleman had received of them. Mr. Hughes, owing to the illness of one of the Judges, was appointed to go the Leinster Circuit, but he was not the only Judge, there being two for the circuit. The commission was opened at Wexford on the 2nd of March, and Mr. Hughes did not leave on the 2nd while the grand jury was being charged; but having on the 1st of March received a letter, asking him to stand for the county of Cavan, he left on that day and went to the Lord Chancellor, and stated that, as he was anxious to be a candidate for Cavan, he wished that a substitute should be appointed in his place on the circuit. Before he left Wexford Mr. Hughes had arranged with Baron Greene that he should perform all the duties of the Judges, and do all the business, which was very light, as it began on the 2nd, and was all over on the 3rd March. A substitute for Mr. Hughes was provided, who joined the circuit at Waterford. He had asked a further question of the Lord Chancellor, to the effect whether the absence of Mr. Hughes had caused any public inconvenience. The Lord Chancellor had stated in reply that no complaint had reached him of any interruption of the business of the circuit, and that no inconvenience had been felt by the public. He should add that no pecuniary loss would accrue to the public, because, although Mr. Hughes was entitled to 400*l.* for going the circuit, he had given that up on relinquishing the duty.

METROPOLITAN BRIDGES—QUESTION.

MR. OLIVEIRA said, he rose to ask the right hon. Baronet the First Commissioner of Works whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take any steps during the present Session of Parliament in reference to the Report of the Select Committee of last Session upon Metropolitan Bridges?

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH, in reply, said, that the Board of Works did not possess any funds with which to execute the metropolitan improvements recommended by the Select Committee of last Session, nor was it the intention of the Government to propose to Parliament to provide any funds for this purpose out of the public purse. His right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Health (Sir B. Hall) intended, if possible, to introduce that evening a Bill for the better local government of the metropolis, which would contain a clause empowering the local government of the metropolis to provide funds for metropolitan improvements, and for the execution of works similar to those recommended by the Select Committee of last year.

ORDNANCE SURVEY OF SCOTLAND.

On the Report of the Committee of Supply on the Ordnance Estimates being brought up, Resolution 1st,

LORD ELCHO said, he wished to call the attention of the House to the subject of the Ordnance survey of Scotland. He was aware the subject was a dull one, and not likely to interest those whose attention had not been specially called to it; but he, nevertheless, considered the question of our national survey as one of considerable importance. Great differences of opinion prevailed as to what that survey should be. It was at the close of the last century that the Ordnance survey of Great Britain commenced. The scale then adopted was one inch for a mile, which was considered sufficient for all purposes. The survey on that scale proceeded steadily from the south of England towards the north. The first departure from it was in consequence of the recommendation of a Committee of that House in 1824, which reported in favour of a map of Ireland on a six inch scale, the object of the survey being a general valuation of the property of that country, this recommendation of the Committee was adopted by the Government. The people of Scotland afterwards memorialised the Government for the same extension of the scale to the survey of their country. On the 1st of October, 1840, a Treasury minute was passed, which ordered that the survey of Scotland also should be on a scale of six inches to the mile; but, in consequence of the great dissatisfaction which prevailed in that country upon the subject, he, in 1851, moved for a Committee to inquire into the whole question, and which Committee finally reported in favour of abandoning the six-inch scale and returning to the one-inch scale. The Government of Lord John Russell adopted the recommendation of the Committee, and by a Treasury minute it was ordered that no other counties should be surveyed, except those in which the survey had already been begun. The Government of the Earl of Derby afterwards conceded the six-inch scale to the counties of Haddington and Fife; and thus the matter stood up to the time the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) became Chancellor of the Exchequer. No less than fifty-nine memorials had proceeded from public bodies in Scotland, all praying for an extension to them of the six-inch scale. The position, therefore, in which they had got in respect to this subject was, that either they must adhere to the rule laid down by the Government of Lord John Russell, and which had been departed from by the Government of the Earl of Derby—in which case they would give offence to the people of Scotland—or else they must adopt the six-inch scale, which had been condemned by the Committee appointed to consider the subject. Under these circumstances, there appeared only one course to be pursued, and that was to adopt a scale without reference either to six inches or to one inch. He himself ventured to recommend the adoption of a scale considerably larger than six inches, which would fulfil all the conditions mentioned in the Treasury minute to which he had referred, and which would be of use for all time. The scale he suggested was one of twenty-four inches to a mile. He had referred the matter to a very eminent engineer, Mr. Vignolles, and one of the Ordnance surveyors, Colonel Dawson—and the opinion which he (Lord Elcho) had expressed in favour of a large scale was confirmed by those gentlemen, but on the other hand it was opposed by the Ordnance, and by several officers of that department. Under these circumstances, it was thought the best course was to ascertain what were the opinions of practical men who thoroughly understood the question with reference to the point at issue. Accordingly, that able and indefatigable public servant, Sir Charles Trevelyan, wrote a circular addressed to members of counties, land agents, engineers, and various other parties, putting to them this question—whether, in the event of a larger scale being adopted for the survey of England, they were of opinion that that scale should be six inches or twenty-four inches, or, at all events, some other larger scale than six inches. He held in his hand a summary of the replies received to that circular. Of those replies 120 were in favour of the larger, and thirty-two in favour of the smaller scale. Subsequently

Colonel Dawson suggested an intermediate or decimal scale of about twenty-five and one-third inches to the mile; and upon a similar course being taken with reference to that it was found that, while there were thirty-nine replies in favour of the twenty-four inch and sixty-two in favour of the twenty-six and two-thirds inch scale, there were seventy-nine in favour of the decimal scale. The whole correspondence relating to the decimal scale was submitted to Sir John Burgoynes, Mr. Blamire, and Mr. Rendle, three eminent engineers, and the Government, fortified by their approbation of that scale, published a Treasury minute, directing its adoption in the surveys of Ayrshire and Dumfriesshire, and providing that if the experiment should turn out favourably it should be applied to the whole of Scotland. The experiment had not yet been completed, and therefore the cost could not be ascertained; but from an estimate made by Colonel Jones, an officer of engineers, who had proceeded upon the assumption that the cultivated land should be surveyed on the large scale and the uncultivated on the one inch, which he (Lord Elcho) thought would be the best mode of proceeding, the cost would be 522,000*l.*, while the Estimate for the Ordnance map of six inches to the mile was 750,000*l.* He thought it would be most advantageous to publish the larger map, as it would be most useful for all property, sanitary, and engineering purposes, and also for agricultural statistics. The demand would soon show whether the population desired to possess the map, and he believed the cost of production would be covered by the publication of a few copies. With respect to the system of contouring, he believed that the cost of that process was estimated at about 4*l.* per square mile, or something like 120,000*l.* for the whole of Scotland; and he agreed with the Committee in the opinion at which they had arrived, that the process was not worth the money. He hoped that the Treasury would concur in this view, and would object to proceed with contouring. There would thus be a considerable saving effected; and by the system of running levels frequently along the watercourses, and at different points of elevation, all the advantages which were to be derived from contouring might be obtained at a much less cost. He trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would direct his attention to the subject, and that as soon as the experiments which were now being made should be brought to a satisfactory conclusion, he would issue a Treasury minute deciding finally upon this much vexed question.

LORD SEYMOUR said, he feared the noble Lord was calling upon the House to incur a very large expenditure, and without very sufficient grounds. We had had in England maps made on a very large scale for the Tithe Commission, and the landed proprietors had paid for them. It was now asked that maps should be made on a scale which was of no use to the public, or worse than useless for practical purposes, and which the public would have to pay for. What had the taxpayers of this country to do with the landed estates of gentlemen in Scotland, that we should be called upon to pay for surveying them? As for the large scale, it had been tried to some extent in the Island of Lewis, and the map of one county would be so large, that it could hardly be got into any room of any gentleman's house. Another objection was, that if a map were made in which every hedge and gate should be marked out, it would be necessary to correct that map every year or two, because alterations were constantly going on in the country. No doubt, the engineers would tell us that, when they had to make a railroad or any other work, the one-inch scale was not sufficient, but let those who needed, for their own purposes, a larger map of any particular locality, procure it at their own expense.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he should be glad to know what was the difference of expense between the six-inch scale and the twenty-six and two-thirds inch scale? He did not suppose there was so much difference of cost between the six-inch and one-inch scales, because it would be necessary for a man to draw his sketch of the survey upon a scale as large as six inches to the mile at first, and it would be afterwards reduced for engraving. He thought a four-inch or six-inch scale quite sufficient for ordinary purposes, and then anybody who wanted a more detailed survey of his own estates might employ a man to enlarge the map.

LORD ELCHO said, that he had read to the House the estimate of Colonel Jones as to the large scale, and that of the Ordnance engineers with regard to the six-inch scale. According to Colonel Jones's estimate, the expense of mapping that portion of Scotland that was proposed to be done on the large scale was 522,000*l.*, and according to the estimate of the Ordnance officers, the expense of mapping the whole of Scotland on the six-inch scale

MR. COWAN said, that the cost to the public of a copy of the one-inch map for Scotland would be 3*l.* 10*s.*, while one of six inches would be not less than 310*l.* A map of Scotland upon the one-inch scale would be thirty-six feet by twenty-one in size, while a six-inch map would occupy a space of 216 feet by 12*f.*, or more than three times the length of that part of the House in which they were assembled. He thought that the previous Government had been led away by one or two petitions, which had been got up in some mysterious manner in Scotland, and he trusted that the present Government would not sanction the expenditure of so large a sum as that which had been mentioned.

MR. RICH said, he hoped that, between doing justice to Scotland and Ireland, some consideration would be given to what was due to England. He must protest against this demand as extravagant, and he trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would resist the pressure which it was attempted to put upon him at a time when all the resources of the country were required to carry on the war.

MR. E. ELICE said, Scotland had been nothing but a scene of experiment for the last half dozen years, and he was extremely glad the question had been brought before the House; for, unless they took it into their own hands, Scotland might wait until the present generation had passed by before it obtained a good and useful map adapted for all purposes. The Committee, after examining many witnesses, were unanimously of opinion that on the score of utility, economy, and public opinion, the one-inch scale was the best to adopt. Their Report was acted upon by the Treasury; but a change of Government afterwards took place, and an agitation was got up, they never knew by what means, in order to petition the Government to reverse the order of the Treasury, and to act contrary to the Report of the Committee. The Chancellor of the Exchequer at that time, without taking a single step to ascertain how far the public of Scotland wished the alteration to be made, at once decided that the country should be surveyed on the six-inch scale. He hoped the House, however, would now arrive at some practical conclusion in regard to the scale upon which the map was to be prepared.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he considered that the House was indebted to his noble

Lord Elcho

Friend (Lord Elcho) for giving hon. Gentlemen a convenient opportunity for expressing their opinions on a subject of very great importance—a subject with respect to which the manner in which it was conducted was not altogether creditable to their administrative system. Almost every step was taken at random and haphazard—sometimes a little forward and sometimes a little backward; but due consideration was never given to the immense extent to which they were about to commit themselves, nor was any deliberate calculation made of the cost to be entailed upon the public. The noble Lord the Member for Totness (Lord Seymour) might lay aside his fears and apprehensions as to anything being done during his (Mr. Gladstone's) tenure of office having a tendency to commit the House to any steps. When he came into office he found the question in a state in which it was impossible to continue. That step which was now complained of had been taken by the Government immediately preceding that to which he belonged, and, as it was supposed, in accordance with the wishes of Scotland; and after such a step had been taken, it was more difficult than at first sight would appear to refer all at once to the Report of the Select Committee. The question raised was a very large one, namely, whether they should prepare a map complete for all purposes, private as well as public, or fall back on the original or more contracted scale which was adopted in England, but was departed from in certain counties in Scotland, and throughout the whole of Ireland. It appeared to them that as the element of cost was the determining element in the case, the rational mode of proceeding was to enter on a course of experiments to such an extent as would enable them to lay before Parliament reliable data for the purpose of ascertaining the comparative cost of the different scales. That had been done, and the Votes of the last and present year were taken with the view of obtaining that knowledge, and placing it before Parliament as rapidly as possible. It was proposed that certain districts should experimentally be surveyed and engraved on the larger scale; but they did not think it safe to take that course, for after having conferred so considerable an advantage and privilege at the public charge upon certain districts, it would be impossible for them to take any other course than to proceed and make a survey over the entire country on the extended scale. That, however, was a question which would require the careful consideration of the House when the proper time arrived.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, in his opinion the twenty-five and one-third inch scale would be the most valuable and useful of the larger scales proposed, though the one-inch scale might be most available for ordinary purposes. There was one reason why he should himself be in favour of the twenty-five and one-third inch scale—that it would enable Scotland to carry out the great object of simplifying the conveyance of land by having a public map available for purposes of boundaries between private properties.

MR. DUNLOP said, he would entreat the House not to prejudge this matter before the materials for deciding upon it were before them. This was not a Scotch question alone, but one affecting the entire country. Within the last few days millions of money had been voted for warlike purposes without opposition; but now that an experiment for a great object of scientific and civil improvement was proposed, hon. Gentlemen started up and objected to it.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he trusted the Chancellor of the Exchequer would adopt that plan which he thought would be most satisfactory both in Scotland and in England—namely, the one-inch scale, which he believed would be well adapted for all useful purposes.

COLONEL BOLDERO said, he would suggest the adoption of a uniform scale of two inches, which had been found perfectly satisfactory in those parts of England where it had been carried out.

LORD SEYMOUR said, it was his intention, when the Resolution for the scientific branch was brought up, of moving the reduction of the estimate by the sum of 53,000*l.*, being the sum taken for Scotland, upon the understanding that the Government would bring in a supplemental estimate for the survey.

CAPTAIN ARCHDALL said, he wished to draw attention to the proposed encampment upon the Curragh of Kildare, and at the same time he hoped that it would be so managed as not to prejudice the training of race-horses now carried on; and also that it would not be allowed to interfere with the private rights which the holders of property adjacent had acquired by usage or custom.

MR. MONSELL said, that, in erecting barracks on the Curragh of Kildare, care would be taken not to interfere with the rights of property, or with the training of race-horses in that neighbourhood. He would take that opportunity of suggesting to the noble Lord (Lord Seymour) the propriety of agreeing to the Resolution for the scientific branch, because, upon whatever scale it was decided to make the map, the money asked for in the estimate would be required. He admitted, with his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone), that this was a question in which the expenditure of millions of money might be involved, and it therefore required the deliberate decision of the House. That decision, however, could be given hereafter by the noble Lord moving a Resolution, pledging the House to the adoption of a certain scale.

MR. ELLICE said, he wished the Vote to be suspended until the House had some positive assurance from the Government. It was a scandal to the Government that Scotland should have been so long left without a map. He hoped that the noble Lord (Lord Seymour) would press that the Vote be diminished by 53,000*l.*

MR. FERGUS said, that several counties in Scotland had been done on the six-inch scale, which the people of Scotland most desired. As to the Highlands, the population would not break their hearts though no map of the Highlands were made during the present generation.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he begged to ask if the hon. Gentleman would produce the papers to which he had on a former occasion referred as to the extent of additional barrack accommodation required? The Votes which the Government proposed for this purpose were large, Aldershot alone amounting altogether to 475,000*l.*, and the total expenditure would greatly exceed 1,000,000*l.* Surely the House ought to have some details before it to justify such a serious expenditure.

MR. MONSELL said, there would be no objection to lay the information upon the table if the hon. Gentleman would move for it.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that an impression had gone abroad that the only breech-loading carbines submitted to the authorities had been those invented by an American and a Frenchman. He had himself understood the hon. Gentleman to say that others had been submitted, and he wished to know if his impression was correct. He was also desirous of asking if it was intended to change the 6-pounder gun of the Horse Artillery to a 9-pounder?

MR. MONSELL said, that 9-pounders had already been substituted for 6-pounders for the Horse Artillery in the Crimea. As to the other question of the hon. and gallant Member, what he had stated on a former evening was, that a large number of breech-loading carbines were sent in, carefully inspected and tried, and his own belief was, from all he had heard, that Mr. Sharpe's and M. Lenoir's were the best. No official decision had yet been arrived at, but he hoped in a very short time that that decision would be given, and steps immediately taken to provide the service with the arm.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he wished to know why so many 6-pounder guns had been shipped for the Crimea when their inferiority had been ascertained at the close of the last war.

MR. MONSELL said, the Ordnance acted upon the directions of the military authorities, whose business it was to decide on the calibre of the guns. He thought the hon. Member was incorrect in supposing a large number of 6-pounders had been sent to the Crimea. Only one 6-pounder battery was sent out, but it certainly was the prevailing opinion at the time that the Horse Artillery should have 6-pounder guns. Experience had led to a different conclusion, and 9-pounders had been substituted.

1st Resolution agreed to.

On the 2nd Resolution, 158,196*l.* for scientific services, including the maps and surveys for Scotland,

LORD SEYMOUR said, as he had intimated his intention to do, he would now move that the Resolution be reduced by the sum of 53,000*l.*, required for the latter purpose.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, with respect to the matter now before the House concerning the Ordnance survey, it seemed to him involved in very considerable doubt. He was informed that experiments were going forward in Ayrshire and in Dumfriesshire with regard to the large scale. These experiments were only to be made to a limited extent, and would be concluded in the month of July. He should think that no portion of the money now voted would be necessary for that purpose. The whole sum voted would not be sufficient for the execution of the map on the one-inch scale, and he should suggest to the House that it should be clearly understood that nothing more should be done regarding the large scale than completing the experiment which was now going forward, and which would be, as he had already stated, finished in July. The House could then consider and decide what course it would adopt.

Mr. Monsell

LORD SEYMOUR: Then was the House to understand from the noble Lord that nothing would be done respecting the larger scale except finishing the experiment?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Nothing further shall be done until further arrangements are effected.

SIR JAMES ANDERSON said, he thought the people of Scotland had great and just reason to complain of the manner in which their country had been treated as to its survey.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he hoped, if the experiments were concluded in June, and the House were sitting, as it generally was till the beginning of August, that no delay would take place in bringing the matter to a final decision.

MR. E. ELLICE said, it was his opinion that nothing should be done on the larger scale, until the subject again came under discussion upon the Estimates next year.

Lord ELCHO said, he saw no reason why the House should not finally determine the question as soon as these experiments were fairly concluded, and, if possible, before the close of the present Session. He was astonished at the course taken by several Scotch Members in opposing the extended scale. Scotchmen generally knew what was to the advantage of their country, and they usually pulled together to secure it. The hon. Member for St. Andrew's rather pooh-poohed these memorials, but among the fifty-nine which had been presented from almost every county in Scotland in favour of the large scale, one was a memorial from the town council of St. Andrew's. It was well known to Scotch Members, though not perhaps so well known to others, that the hon. Member was a Highland proprietor, and the only bit of cultivated land he possessed was a small garden. He thought it rather selfish of the hon. Gentleman to advocate the small scale, to the prejudice of his Lowland friends, who had not the happiness to live in so picturesque and wild a part of the country. He hoped that, before the question came on for discussion, hon. Gentlemen would read the blue book, which contained every information that was required on the subject.

MR. BAILLIE said, he gave the noble Lord all due praise for his desire to promote an undertaking so useful as that of the survey of Scotland, but he at the same time thought the feeling of the House was so much against the great expense of surveying the whole of Scotland on the scale proposed, and seeing that it would only serve more immediately the interests of the landowners of Scotland, that he would suggest to the noble Lord not to press the matter further, especially when it appeared to be the general opinion that any survey on so large a scale ought to be at the expense of the gentleman whose property would be benefited by it.

MR. LOCKE said, the map on the larger scale might be a good thing, but it did not follow that it would be a good thing for the House to spend the public money upon it. He must deprecate any further experimenting upon this subject, the only effect of which had been to prevent the public having a map at all. The Ordnance authorities, after the sort of rebuke which the Committee had administered to them, had systematically attempted to thwart it, for they had been experimenting upon every scale except that which the Committee had recommended.

MR. JOHN MACGREGOR said, he considered that there ought to be one uniform scale for the whole of Great Britain; and the inch scale was very nearly that of the great military surveys of France, Austria, and Prussia.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he must protest against the views advanced by the hon. Member for Inverness-shire (Mr. Baillie), and at the same time he would beg to express his entire concurrence in what has been stated by the Lord Advocate, and in the suggestions made by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), to whom Scotland owed a debt of gratitude for the zeal and the ability which he brought to bear on so truly important a subject.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he was sorry to hear hon. Gentlemen speak of the larger map as if it would be of no use except to the landowners. It might be quite true that the expense of executing the map might be greater than the benefit to be derived from it—that was a completely different question. For statistical and sanitary purposes a map on the large scale would be a national work of the greatest possible importance; and this not only as regarded Scotland, but likewise England and Ireland. He hoped that the experiment would be fairly tried, and that hon. Members would suspend their judgment until they saw the result.

Resolution agreed to.

On the Third Resolution,

COLONEL NORTH said, a circumstance had just come to his knowledge which induced him to ask a question of the hon. Gentleman the Clerk of the Ordnance. It had very recently been stated in another place by the noble Lord the Minister of War, that those enormous Votes which a Committee of the House had lately passed for building barracks in different parts of the country, were not to be acted upon until a reorganisation of the Board of Ordnance was effected. He begged to ask the hon. Gentleman whether he could give the House any information on the subject?

MR. MONSELL said, he would endeavour to answer the question of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, though he begged to state that he had not had the opportunity of hearing the speech to which the hon. and gallant Member had referred; but he could understand that the noble Lord must have stated, in reference to those large works—the new barracks, which had been voted for so liberally—that their construction would not be commenced until the reorganisation of the Ordnance Department. He believed that reorganisation would take place in a very short time, and that there would be no delay in carrying out the works. He thought, however, it was the duty of the Government, even independently of the reorganisation of the Ordnance Department, to take into consideration the very strong feeling expressed by the House with respect to the mode of constructing the new barracks, and particularly to the establishing of day-rooms in them for the use of the soldiers. They would neglect their duty if they attempted to carry out those large Votes without paying due consideration to the suggestions that had been made in the course of the discussions in Committee.

THE COLONIAL DEPARTMENT.

On the Motion that the House resolve itself into a Committee of Supply,

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I wish, Sir, to take this opportunity of calling the attention of the House to the present extraordinary state of the Colonial Department; and, in doing so, not only do I wish to address inquiries to Her Majesty's Government on the subject, but to call their attention to a state of the public business as connected with that department which is not only unusual and extremely unsatisfactory, but which also appears to me to be hardly decorous. Since I made some inquiries on this subject some time ago, questions have been put in another place upon the same subject, and the answers to those questions are so little satisfactory that I feel bound to renew the inquiries, and to ask for a reply from the noble Lord at the head of the Government. When, on a former occasion, I inquired of that noble Lord what were the prospects of a responsible Minister taking charge of the colonial affairs of this country, I was told that the absence of the noble Lord the Member for London would not be so long as I supposed; and I find that the other night, when a similar inquiry was made in another place, precisely the same words were used in reply. Now, I beg to remind the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) that neither the noble Lord who made that inquiry nor myself expressed or, indeed, entertained any supposition on that subject. We wanted to know the supposition of the noble Lord himself. We found the Colonial Department without any responsible Minister to transact the business of that department, and we wished to be informed by Her Majesty's Government how long this state of things was likely to continue. But part of the answer given to the inquiries in another place struck me as being so peculiar that I think it forms an additional reason for calling for some further explanation. If I am rightly informed, the noble Lord who replied to that question stated that it was not the intention of the noble Lord the Member for London, who is now at Vienna, to do more than settle the general principles of a treaty, and that he should not think it necessary to remain until all the details of that treaty were arranged. Now, it seems to me that that was a most extraordinary, and, I must also say, a most unsatisfactory statement. I certainly thought that the general principles of those negotiations had been already laid down. I should have thought that the general principles of any treaty to be now formed, or any negotiations to be entered into, were the simplest and easiest part of the duty of the noble Lord, and that the most important part of that which he had to decide upon—having been sent on a special mission of this kind—was to settle all those details which are so essential and important to the satisfactory arrangement of a treaty of this kind. I can only conclude from the statement to which I am referring that the noble Lord the Member for Lendean finds himself so embarrassed by the two incompatible positions which he now fills that, after having left the colonial business in this country in a state of uncertainty, he is about to return to it without finishing the negotiations he has undertaken. My object, however, has not so much relation to the negotiations at Vienna as connection with the state of the colonial business in this country. Under all circumstances, I believe there never was a moment when it was of more importance that there should be a responsible and an able Minister at the head of that department than the present moment, when the Colonial Secretary is at Vienna conducting a negotiation. I believe such a state of things is not only, as I have said, most unusual, but that, in fact, it is without precedent. I am perfectly aware of the fact that Lord Castlereagh, during the time he was holding the office of Secretary of State, went to Vienna to conduct negotiations, but the House will remember that at that time Lord Castlereagh held the office of Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and that the business on which he went to Vienna was closely connected with the department he conducted and the office he held; but I know no case similar to that which we now contemplate of the business of a great department, at a moment of peculiar interest and importance, left without any representative in Parliament, not even an Under Secretary of State, to answer an inquiry in this House, and having its Secretary of State engaged in the conduct of negotiations at Vienna. I am aware the right hon. Baronet opposite me (Sir G. Grey), who now holds the office of Secretary of State for the Home Department, has intimated that he would give his attention to colonial affairs. I do not wish to disparage the right hon. Baronet's well-known abilities, but I affirm that neither the right hon. Baronet nor any other man is competent to discharge, for any lengthened period, the duties of those two important departments together. I consider that the attempt to do so is to hold out a most false view of public affairs, by leading the country to suppose that one man can duly discharge them, especially at a moment like the present. I beg to remind the House of the threatening—I will not say alarming—intimation which, since the noble Lord accepted the seals of the Colonial Department, we have received from the Cape of Good Hope. I am informed, though I speak under correction, having no official knowledge, that the well-known chief Moshesh, one of the most powerful chiefs of South Africa, and one who is at the head of a powerful tribe, has already given cause for considerable uneasiness. I hear also, for the first time, that there is reason to fear not only the Kafir but the Fingo tribe, hitherto one of the tribes most devoted to British interests. It is too possible that the state of England at this moment, involved as the country is in a great European war, may have become known to the intelligent natives of Southern Africa, and may in some degree have contributed to the course they are supposed to have taken. The House will recollect that we have lately sent a new Governor to South Africa—a gentleman well known in other colonies, and who, no doubt, would be most attentive to his duties in South Africa; but still he has had no experience of the circumstances to which I have adverted, and this I say is another reason, and a strong one, why the exclusive attention of some Minister should be devoted to colonial affairs. Then again, what is the state of the colony of Victoria? In Victoria, if the accounts are true, we have had a proceeding which I can only speak of as an insurrection. Blood has been shed. There has been a struggle—a most anxious and exciting struggle. Between that mixed and peculiar population, which now fills the gold districts and Her Majesty's troops a collision has taken place, and although by the decision evinced by Sir Charles Hotham the disturbance has been put an end to, there remains the fact that the state of Victoria is a most critical one. This is not the only question of interest in Victoria. I again speak under correction, but, so far as I have been informed, I believe a question which has much agitated that district of late, is that of the admission of convicts. The Convict Prevention Bill is still an unsettled question, and there is a strong, and not an unnatural, feeling on the part of the colonists of Victoria with reference to the indiscriminate admission of a large number of convicts from Van Diemen's Land. This, then, is another ground for anxiety, and a most important reason why some Minister should be here to devote his exclusive attention to these serious affairs. I say also it is not satisfactory to have these Australian Constitution Bills hung up as they now are for an indefinite period, waiting the return of the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) from Vienna. These Constitution Bills are part of a bargain entered into by the Government of Lord Derby, with which I had the honour of being connected, whereby certain concessions were made to the colonies, the most important of which was, that they should have the management of the land in their own hands, on condition of improving their constitution. The colonies have performed their part; they have sent home these Bills for altering the constitution, and two years have elapsed and yet nothing has been done on them. I have some doubt whether those Bills ought not to have been proceeded with last year, and I don't know what explanation the right hon. Baronet can give on that point; but two years have passed since the required concessions have been made, and I know, as I have said before, that gentlemen of great eminence in these colonies are now in England at much inconvenience waiting until the Bills pass; and when they call at the Colonial Office they are told that the whole matter must await the return of the Secretary of State for the Colonies (Lord J. Russell) from Vienna. Now, Sir, I have mentioned several important subjects involving questions of high State policy, and requiring the attention of a Minister of State; let me remind the House these are not all. I see before me hon. Members who have been connected with the Colonial Office, and who know the truth of what I say when I state that scarcely a day passes when there do not come despatches from every part of our colonial empire, some involving matters of high State policy, such as I have already adverted to, and other personal questions of local interest—questions of individual right and individual justice—and I do say that Her Majesty's Government ought to be in a position to give such matters attention. The colonies labour under sufficient disadvantage in being at so great a distance from this country, and I think that when they bring forward matters such as those to which I have adverted, they have a right to expect that there should be a Minister ready and willing to attend to them. It is altogether inconsistent with the usual course of public business in this country that there should be no Minister to attend to matters of great colonial importance when they are brought here; and I must say, that I think, when the country

finds one great department of the State, involving interests of vast magnitude, to be thus neglected, that it will occasion feelings of great dissatisfaction. But consider the question in another light—what will be the effect upon the minds of the colonists? Will not they feel justly that this practical suspension of attention to their affairs, and this absence of the Colonial Minister, are in a great degree disrespectful to them? I think that it is natural that such should be the case, and I have reason to believe that it is so; because I know that that will be the light in which some of the most important colonies of the Crown will regard the present state of the Colonial Office. What is the moment when this neglect is exhibited? It is a time when the colonies have come forward and have evinced a most laudable desire to support the mother country in the war in which she is engaged. From one end of the colonial empire to the other assurances have been received by Her Majesty of loyal co-operation and devoted sympathy in the struggle in which this country is engaged; and there could not, therefore, have been a moment more unhappily chosen for taking a disrespectful step towards the colonial empire than the present. I have felt, Sir, it to be my duty to call the attention of the Government to this subject, and I trust that the noble Lord at the head of the Government will give some assurance with respect to it more distinct and satisfactory than he has yet done. We have been told in another place, that the noble Lord the Member for London is expected to return to this country about Easter. But that assurance has been given in a very vague and indefinite manner; and, looking at the nature of the negotiations in which the noble Lord is about to be engaged, I think it extremely improbable that he will be here so soon as Easter. But, even if he should, I contend that the delay which has already taken place, is one which ought not to have occurred. Unless we can obtain a distinct assurance upon this subject, I hope that Parliament will consider it to be its duty to interfere to put an end to this unsatisfactory state of things; but I trust that the First Lord of the Treasury will be able to hold out an assurance, that before long there will be at the head of the Colonial Department, some responsible Minister who can give his undivided attention to the important duties required of him.

Viscount PALMERSTON: Sir, I

must entirely deny the assumption on which the right hon. Baronet opposite grounds his observations—namely, that colonial matters are neglected, or that any slight has been placed upon the important colonies of this country. The right hon. Baronet says there should be some person in Parliament responsible for what they have done, or have not done with regard to the colonies. Sir, there are persons in Parliament so responsible. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department and myself are responsible; and if the right hon. Baronet or any other hon. Member of this House thinks fit to bring forward any charge against the Government for neglect of colonial matters, we are perfectly ready to stand here in our places to justify our course, and to be responsible for the management of them to the country. The right hon. Baronet expressed a very natural curiosity to know what is the particular course which my noble Friend at Vienna is going to pursue in the negotiation with which he is charged—what he is to insist upon—how long is he to insist upon it—what he is to be satisfied with—when he is to come home—or if he is going to break off the negotiation or to conclude it. I am sorry I am not at liberty consistently with my public duty to gratify the very natural curiosity of the right hon. Baronet. [Sir J. PAKINGTON: I made no such inquiry.] The right hon. Baronet made something very like an inquiry. I can only say, Sir, from the communications we have received, that we do not anticipate that my noble Friend's stay in Vienna will be so protracted as the right hon. Baronet expects it to be. But really the way in which this question is put would lead one to think that never was there a case before in which an office was vacant or the holder of an office was absent. But the right hon. Baronet himself gave an instance of a case in which a Secretary of State was very long absent from this country, and although the matters which he had to deal with were connected with the department which he held, yet, allow me to say, that there was a vast number of other important affairs to be dealt with by the department at home, and though no minister was there, the officers of the Foreign Office did not follow Lord Castle-reagh when he went to attend a congress at Vienna or at Paris. Does not the right hon. Baronet recollect the period when one individual held the offices of all the Secretaries of State, and from the beginning of November to the end of December or the beginning of January, was the only responsible person accountable for all the offices? There was such a period, and I think the right hon. Baronet, on refreshing his memory, will find that he was not much disposed at that time to find fault with the arrangement. I deny that any inconvenience is sustained, or that colonial affairs are at all neglected. Any decision that is to be taken, will be taken on the responsibility of my right hon. Friend (Sir G. Grey), aided if necessary by the concurrence of his colleagues, and we stand here responsible for my noble Friend (Lord John Russell), and in his place, and perfectly ready to answer upon any matter in which the management of the Colonial Department may be questioned either by the right hon. Baronet or any other person in this House.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he thought the question before the House was whether such a combination of offices as at present existed was advisable without absolute necessity. If the noble Lord had made out such a case of necessity no person could say anything, for necessity overrides all laws; but the noble Lord merely sought to shelve the question by saying that if the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Pakington) had any charge against the Government let it be brought forward. There was no charge made against the Government; the question was not put in the shape of a definite Motion, and could in no way embarrass the Government. If the Government could not recommend any person to Her Majesty to take this department, the question would be embarrassing; but they had no idea that the noble Viscount was reduced to such an extremity. He would support the right hon. Baronet if he pressed the question by a definite Motion, because he could not see that it would embarrass the Government. It would be small consolation to him if the present state of affairs shook the attachment of some of the Colonies, or caused the loss of others of them, that they should be able to impeach the noble Lord or to inflict condign punishment upon him. If the noble Lord could even be beheaded it would be little consolation to him (Mr. Adderley), or to the country, if the Colonial Empire of England was damaged. The present was a most critical period in colonial affairs, and was the most unfortunate that could have been chosen for a combination of offices. At the close of the last century, when Mr. Dundas was offered the War Office, it was observed by him that he had all work and no patronage. The Colonial Office was therefore thrown in, where there was no work, while, at the same time, it was full of patronage. But that was not the case in these days. The consequence of the junction of the War and the Colonial Departments was a state of such confusion in the office that it had been wittily described by Lord Derby as "the office at war with all the Colonies." As long as the injury produced by this arrangement was confined to the Colonies no alteration was made, but when it was brought home to ourselves by the breaking out of the war it was found necessary to separate the two offices. He was willing to allow that if ever the colonial system of England became what it ought to be, the work of the Colonial Office would be so far reduced as might even admit of its being added to the Home Department, but the Colonies had not yet arrived at that position of self-administration which he hoped they were destined soon to attain. They were only in a transition state at present, but the system of local self-government had been recognised, and when it should be fully carried out, there perhaps would no longer be any necessity for a separate Colonial Department. At the present moment constituent powers were being given to the principal Colonies, but agents who came over with Constitution Bills and Petitions from those Colonies found the Colonial Office shut up. The Constitution Bills of the Australian Colonies were now in the hands of the Government, and it was a matter of paramount necessity that they should pass without delay. He hoped, therefore, that the Government would not wait until negotiations at Vienna, which had nothing to do with them, were completed before deciding what course should be taken with respect to them. He believed that the riots which had taken place at Victoria, and which had produced the lamentable result of the first Australian blood having been drawn by English troops, might have been avoided if there had been no delay in establishing the Constitution of that Colony; but at all events, if the Colony had enjoyed self-government the responsibility of the measure which had led to the rioting would have rested with the Colonial Legislature, and this country would in no way have been implicated in the matter. Again, there was some apprehension of an outbreak in South Africa. Now, if that Colony had been entrusted with the power of local self-government it would, of course, have taken measures for its own self-defence, and this country need not have been under any anxiety about the threatened war. The cause of all the Kafir wars had been the destruction of the local system of self-defence in that Colony. There were other omissions which showed the necessity for the Colonial Minister being at his post. Had the noble Lord been at home, he was sure Canada would not have remained so long without receiving the formal thanks both of Parliament and of the Sovereign for the loyal and patriotic spirit which the Colony had evinced towards the mother country in connection with the war, nor would the offers which parties residing in that Colony had made to raise regiments at their own expense to serve in the Crimea have long remained not only unaccepted, but even unanswered. It might be a matter of sentiment, but it was a matter of the most important consideration, that the Colonies were deeply attached to the Sovereign of this country; that feeling, however, was a sensitive feeling; they were proud of being connected with this country; they were proud of owing allegiance to Her Majesty; but pride is of a sensitive character; the slightest breath that was cast upon this feeling of honourable attachment, calculated to imply neglect or contempt, might convert it into a feeling of hostility and alienation. He was afraid some such construction might be put upon the absence of the present Colonial Minister, and rejoiced therefore to find that the subject had been brought under the notice of the House.

SIR GEORGE GREY: I do not think, Sir, the question raised by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich is whether an indispensable necessity existed for my noble Friend (Lord J. Russell) to accept the seals of the Colonial Department while he was on his way to act as the Plenipotentiary of this country at Vienna; nor do I think that a question is raised on the present occasion as to the permanent union of the Colonial Office with another great department of State, but the question is whether such a degree of public inconvenience arises from the arrangement made for the conduct of the business of the Colonial Department, during the temporary absence of my noble Friend at Vienna, as to call for the interference of this House. Well, then, Sir, that being the question, I am perfectly ready to state that I do not feel myself competent to undertake permanently, or for any length of time, the duties of the two offices which I now virtually fill, and I shall be sincerely rejoiced when I am released from the additional responsibility which has been thrown upon me by the return of my noble Friend from Vienna. When my noble Friend had intimated his willingness to accept the seals of the Colonial Department it appeared to me, so far from that acceptance being looked upon as an insult by the Colonies, that the colonists would hail it with satisfaction; and when he asked me to act for him during the few weeks which would probably elapse before his return, I said that, although I felt the additional responsibility which would be thrown upon me, I thought it was a duty I owed to the country not to shrink from giving any assistance in my power to an arrangement which I believed to be conducive to the interests of the Colonies. When, however, I hear the hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Adderley) state to the House that the whole of the colonial business is at a stand—that, in fact, the office is shut up, and there is no one there to attend to business at all—I must take leave to contradict that statement, and, still more, to say that I do not believe that during the short time the present arrangement has existed any practical inconvenience whatever has resulted. As to the case of such an arrangement being permanent, or, indeed, long protracted, I admit the force of the argument of the hon. Gentleman, but I trust that the absence of my noble Friend will not be of any long duration. If the arrangement had been of a permanent character there might have been some force in the observations which have been addressed to the House; but being only intended to last for a few weeks, I cannot help thinking that they are quite uncalled for. I do not think it advisable now to enter into the subjects of discussion which the hon. Gentleman who last addressed us touched upon, either respecting transportation or with reference to the offer from Canada to send a regiment to the Crimea, I can only say that I do not think that even the ingenuity of the hon. Gentleman can in any way connect that circumstance with the arrangement now existing in the Colonial Office. I will, however, briefly advert to the four cases in which it has been stated that inconvenience has arisen from the present arrangement. First, with regard to the Cape of Good Hope. The letters which have been received from the Governor give only too much reason to apprehend that the peace which had been established with the Kafir tribes was one which could not be considered permanent, unless measures were taken to consolidate the arrangements which had been made, and to provide efficiently for the safety of the Colony, and it therefore became my duty to press upon the Colonial Government the importance of inviting the attention of the Legislature at the Cape to those measures which appeared to be indispensable towards completing the defence of the Colony. Yesterday week despatches were received from the Governor at the Cape stating that he had received intelligence which rendered it incumbent upon him at once to go to the frontier. That intelligence was no doubt, of an alarming character, but, at the same time, it was doubtful and conflicting, inasmuch as persons who possessed equally good opportunities of acquiring information give a different version of the state of feeling among the Kafir tribes. It is, however, impossible to deny that the state of the Colony is critical. It appears, however, that the Governor was on the point of proceeding to the frontier, but he did not think that it would be necessary for him to use the power which he possessed of drawing a regiment from the Mauritius, or that he should be obliged to call upon the home Government for any additional force. I am at present stating the opinion of the Governor, but at the same time it is impossible to say that events will not occur to change that opinion. The Government have had the despatch of the Governor before them, and they have taken it without delay into consideration, and have adopted those measures which appeared to be necessary for strengthening the hands of the Governor. I do not know what my noble Friend would have done had he not gone to Vienna, but I do not think that he could have done more than has been done, nor am I prepared to admit that, acting as I have acted, with the concurrence of my colleagues, any danger or inconvenience has arisen to the public service. The next point to which I come is the state of the Colony of Victoria, and the disturbances alleged to have taken place there. I can only say that the Government have as yet received no official information on the subject of those disturbances. I was surprised that the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Pakington), upon information so imperfect as that which has reached this country, and knowing the patriotic feeling which existed in the colonies, should apply to those disturbances the epithet of "insurrection." I believe, and I judge only from the information which has appeared in the public prints, that the tumult was suppressed in about twenty minutes, not, however, unfortunately, without some loss of life, and I trust that future accounts will show that the affair was not so serious as has been represented; but, however that may be, I ask what, if my noble Friend had been in England, could he have done under the circumstances when the same account which informs us of the tumult also informs us that it has been suppressed, and that peace and order have been restored throughout the district? With regard to the supposed Newfoundland difficulty, I believe that all great questions relating to that Colony had been settled before I gave up the seals of the Colonial Office, and I am not aware that any question remained, except, indeed, one to which the right hon. Baronet has referred. The deputation to which he alluded were the bearers of an application on the part of the late Assembly of Newfoundland, for the removal of the Governor of that Colony, who was appointed by the right hon. Gentleman in 1852. I am bound to say that I do not think that the removal of a Governor of a colony is a question upon which a Secretary of State ought to announce any decision at a private interview. With regard to the Australian Constitution Bills, I had hoped before the present time to be able to submit to the House certain measures upon the subject of those Bills, but the case has not been quite correctly stated. The right hon. Baronet said that those Bills were passed two years ago, and he complained that they were still lying in the Colonial Office.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished to explain that he had not stated that the Bills were passed two years ago, but what he said was, that the arrangements which had been made two years ago had led to these Bills.

SIR GEORGE GREY: It is quite true that the despatch which led to those Bills was written two years ago, but let us see if there is any real foundation for the charge of delay brought against the Colonial Office. Three Bills were passed—one relating to Victoria, another to New

Sir G. Grey

South Wales, and another to South Australia. One of those Bills, and that not the least important of them—the one relating to Victoria—was only received in the month of May last. All these Bills required the most careful investigation, and they were referred to the legal advisers of the Crown, whose Report was not received until after the prorogation of Parliament, so that it was impossible that any steps could have been taken in the matter last Session. The right hon. Gentleman does not appear rightly to apprehend the course which has been adopted. The real state of the case is, that the colonies understood that they were invited by the right hon. Gentleman himself not to confine themselves to the powers conferred upon them by the Act of 1850, but to go beyond those powers, and to pass Bills which, professing to alter Imperial Acts, could not receive the assent of the Crown unless with the previous consent of Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to four Bills, and I may state at once that, in the case of the three Colonies to which I have alluded, I think that the course which was adopted of not confining them to the powers conferred upon them by the Act of 1850, but of permitting them to go beyond those powers, was most inconvenient. In the case of Van Diemen's Land, where no Act had yet been passed, I pointed out the inconvenience of the course which had been adopted in those Colonies, and I suggested that the Legislature of that Colony should confine themselves within the powers conferred on them by the Act of 1850, and since I relinquished the seals of the Colonial Office I have received from the Governor of Van Diemen's Land a despatch transmitting an Act which has been passed by the inhabitants of that Colony in accordance with my suggestion, which he tells me will, in his opinion, work well. In this case, therefore, the assent of the Crown may be given without the consent of Parliament, and the result will be that the Act which was last passed will probably come first into operation. When I said that I hoped to have been able to introduce Bills upon these subjects, I must remind the right hon. Gentleman that it is not an easy thing to introduce a Bill of importance, and to secure the attention of the House to it, at a period when it is engaged in voting the means for carrying on the war, and I do not think that any of the nights appropriated to Government business this Session could have been spared for the consideration of the measures to which I have referred. I can also state that I have been in communication with my noble Friend (Lord J. Russell) on the subject of these Bills, and that he has devoted great attention to the subject. I hope that the result of this discussion will be to remove any impression that the Colonies are being neglected; and I can only add that, although the present arrangement could not, in my opinion, be justified as a permanent one, still, for a brief period, no inconvenience will be felt in consequence of it.

MR. LOWE said, he was desirous of offering a few observations on a remark made by the right hon. Member for Droitwich, who had said that he had entered into a compact with the Australian colonies. The right hon. Baronet had not said what that compact was, but he gave the House to understand that the form of constitution to be submitted to the House was in a great measure the result of a compact which he had entered into with the Colonies when he was Colonial Secretary. Now, he (Mr. Lowe) considered that it would be most injurious if the compact which the right hon. Gentleman seemed to have entered into should be carried out; and when the proper time came for so doing he believed that he could show the House conclusive reasons why such a compact should not be sanctioned. At present he would confine himself to explaining why he thought that the right hon. Gentleman should not have entered into the compact to which he had referred. In 1850 it had been the pleasure of the House, contrary to his (Mr. Lowe's) opinion, to delegate to the Australian Colonies, unversed as three out of four were in the ordinary functions of self-government, the powers of a Constituent Assembly, the power of forming their own constitution. He objected to this, because he did not think that the Colonies were at that time sufficiently advanced to effectually carry out the powers so delegated, and the result had confirmed this impression. The policy of the Act of 1850 was this—the House washed its hands of the question of the colonial constitutions, and left to the Legislature of the Colony the power of choosing that which it might deem best, preserving to Her Majesty, but not to that House, the power of assenting to, or of disapproving thereof. He thought that, after this Act, the attitude of that House towards the colonial Legislatures on the subject of their future constitutions ought to have been one of rigid impartiality; it ought to have abstained from expressing any wish with reference to the constitution of the Colony; because, in the first place, by the expression of such a wish, or by the use of any influence to carry it into effect, they were contravening the spirit of the Act of Parliament; and, secondly, they were by so doing throwing upon the Government of this country a responsibility which ought to devolve on the colonial Legislature. Unhappily, the right hon. Member for Droitwich did not take this view of the case, but in 1852 as Secretary of State for the Colonies, he addressed a despatch to the Governor General of Australia, in which he stated that it was his opinion that the Upper House in the Legislature ought to be nominated by the Crown. He would not now discuss the propriety of such a nomination, as the question was one which Parliament in 1850 had delegated to the Colonies, but it appeared to him (Mr. Lowe) the right hon. Gentleman had misconstrued the Act of 1850, and mistaken his duty as Colonial Minister, when he offered to give the Colonial Legislatures absolute dominion over the waste lands of the Colonies if they would consent to the Upper House being nominated by the Crown. He would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman and the House what possible interest they could have in preventing the Colonial Legislatures from adopting a form of government which seemed to them best suited to their local circumstances, and why should they give their dominion over their waste lands to induce them to do so? What would the right hon. Gentleman have effected even if he succeeded in fixing on the necks of the colonists that which was detested by the majority—namely, a nominated Upper House? Why, the result would be that, instead of the unpopularity of such a step devolving on the colonial Legislature, it would devolve upon the Home Government, and the policy of the Act of 1850, which was to relieve the Government of this country from such a responsibility, would be evaded. He, for one, protested against the House of Commons or the Government being in any way bound by what had been done by the right hon. Gentleman. He would not at present anticipate discussion on this question, but would enter fully into it whenever it should be submitted for their consideration; but, in the meantime, he begged the House not to consider the question prejudged or prejudiced by any step which had been taken by the right hon. Gentleman. He also begged the right hon. Gentleman (Sir G. Grey) who for a time would hold the seals of the Colonial Office to avoid the example set him by his predecessor, and to deal with this question in a spirit of impartiality, and, whether his opinions were in favour of a nominated or elected Upper House, not to let that weigh with him as a grain of dust, but to look at the will of the colonists and to abide by it if he thought it expressed by the decision of the Legislature; but if, on the other hand, he should feel satisfied that the Legislature had been induced, either by the right hon. Member for Droitwich, or by other circumstances, to come to a decision disapproved by the majority of the colonists, then he ought not to allow himself to be led away by such a decision. These Colonies, under the inducements held out to them by the right hon. Member for Droitwich, and not availing themselves of the power given in the Act of 1850, had sent to this country long Acts, in which they had given to themselves powers hitherto not possessed by them; had dealt with the most difficult questions of the Royal prerogative and the relations of the Colonies to the mother country; had given full retiring salaries to public officers, who, in pursuance of the wish expressed by the right hon. Member for Droitwich, had voted for a nominated Upper House; and had also given pledges and guarantees to persons having very dubious titles to vast quantities of the public land. The House would not, if the request of the Legislatures were complied with, have to go through these Bills clause by clause, but would, by a short Bill, have to confirm them; therefore, the moderate request which would be made to the House would amount to this—it would, because the Colonial Legislature had, in excess of its powers, passed a Bill of enormous length and perplexity, be asked to renounce its right of dealing with the many subjects it contained, and to give validity to them all in a lump. He earnestly, therefore, entreated the Government and the House not to be persuaded by the clamour or declamation of any persons who might be sent by the Colonies to so far forget their duty and dignity as to delegate to others their powers and responsibilities by consenting to pass in a lump seventy or eighty clauses of these Acts, merely because they had been passed by the Colonial Legislature. The right hon. Member for Droitwich talked of contracts between this Government and the Colonies. He begged that his (Mr. Lowe's) experience in these matters might have some weight, and entreated the right hon. Gentleman to avoid all contracts between the Imperial Government and the Colonies. If he thought that there were matters over which the Colony ought to have authority let him concede them—if it were deemed advisable, as he (Mr. Lowe) thought it was, that the colonies should have dominion over the waste lands, let it be given them; but it should not be given as conditional on what the Colonies should do. The right hon. Member should avoid making this House a party to maintaining the Legislature against the opinion of the majority of the Colonists, and still less should he involve it in giving pledges of retiring salaries or guarantees of permanent possession to persons holding in some cases 1,000,000 acres of land a-piece. He could assure the House that, unless it acted with the greatest circumspection in this matter, unless it fully asserted its own dignity, unless it avoided involving itself in any guarantees, and unless it kept clear of interference with the Colonies, it would be sowing the seeds of endless confusion, bickering, and disturbance, which would drive them ultimately to draw the sword against their fellow-subjects, or oblige them altogether to surrender their Australian Colonies.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he hoped he might be allowed to express his regret, that the hon. Gentleman did not hear more distinctly what he had said upon this subject. The hon. Member had entirely misunderstood not only his intentions, but the expressions which he had written. When the proper time arrived, he hoped he would be able to give a clear version of his acts as Colonial Minister, which could not under any circumstances warrant the construction put upon them by the hon. Member.

MR. JOHN MACGREGOR said, he very much objected to the interests of the Colonies being neglected to suit the convenience of any Government. He believed the negotiations at Vienna would be so long, so tedious, so uncertain and contradictory, from day to day, that the most extraordinary difficulties would attend the conferences. That was well understood in France, where the Government did not entertain the opinion that they would lead to a speedy peace. Under these circumstances, the absence of the Colonial Secretary at Vienna showed either that there was a great dearth of men in the party with which the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) was connected, and from which he had formed his Government, or that there was a determination that the great offices of State should be filled by no other persons than those who had occupied them for the last twenty or twenty-five years. He must deny that it was impossible for the colonial Governments, as they were now constituted, to fulfil the duties expected of them by the colonists, and furthermore he apprehended that the present state of things was attended with considerable embarrassment and peril. His experience of the Canadians induced him to believe that they would be ready to conclude that they were now treated with the same contumely and insult which had led to the separation of the old American colonies. No motives of convenience and no Cabinet arrangements could justify any such neglect of the colonies as was evinced by the present arrangements of the Administration.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, he held that the present was an anomalous and extraordinary situation, resulting from the peculiar exigencies of a crisis almost unprecedented, but he thought the experience of the noble Lord the Member for London peculiarly qualified him for the management of our colonial empire. He hoped that an idea so mischievous as that of a return to the former system of transportation would never find a place in the breast of any English statesman. That system offered a premium on crime in this country, whilst it was odious and despicable to the colonists. He was afraid the noble Lord would find that the ticket-of-leave system could not be persevered in; and if it were, it would produce a complete change in the manners and customs of this country and the rules of its Government.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS—ETON.

MR. EWART said, he would only for a very short time detain the House, if they would allow him an opportunity of doing justice to one of the greatest institutions of this country, by making a statement not without its interest to the country in general. The other night the state of our public schools was under consideration. It was felt at the most extensive of those schools, Eton, that justice had not been done to amendments which had been there accomplished, and, therefore, he now felt it due to that ancient foundation, where he had the happiness and honour to have been educated, briefly to recapitulate those amendments which had been made. The classics alone were formerly taught there. There were now added seven mathematical masters, forming a part of the regular system of the school. Facilities were given for military students by instruction in fortification. Ancient and modern history formed a part of the terminal examinations, as well as of periodical compositions. Modern languages (though they did not form a part of the system of education) were encouraged as objects of study, by frequent prizes. The scholars who went from Eton to King's College, Cambridge, underwent a thorough previous examination; the elections were entirely free; and an extensive library, containing 7,000 volumes, had been opened for the self-instruction of the school. He (Mr. Ewart), as an old Etonian, felt gratified at these unquestionable improvements. He only hoped they would be carried further, and he thanked the House for giving him an opportunity of doing justice to the efforts of an ancient foundation to which he was attached by deep and undiminished feelings of reverence and affection.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of Supply.

SUPPLY—COMMISSARIAT ESTIMATES.

(1) 2,351,199*l.*, Commissariat.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, that in moving the estimate for the Commissariat Service for the year 1855–56 it would not be necessary for him to detain the Committee for more than a few moments, but some explanation would be expected from him with regard to these Estimates, because the total amount of this Vote, although inconsiderable as compared with the large sums which had recently been under the consideration of the Committee, showed a large increase upon the sum voted the preceding year. The amount voted for Commissariat service last year was 600,000*l.*; the Committee would now be asked to vote fourtimes that amount, 2,400,000*l.* The fact was that the sum of 600,000*l.* represented merely the Commissariat charge for that portion of our army which was in the Colonies, and that item was very much the same as last year. There had been a slight reduction in the establishment of officers in the colonies, but this was more than counterbalanced by the increased price of provisions for the supply of the troops there. In some colonies, as New Zealand, this increased cost had led to the necessity of discontinuing the stoppages in aid, made from the pay of the troops. A similar sum of 600,000*l.* was required for the Commissariat service of our army at home. At this time last year those troops were fed in a different manner to that in which they were now supplied. The soldiers in the United Kingdom formerly paid for their own provisions, provided these provisions did not exceed 6*d.* the ration a-day; but where a ration cost the soldier more than 4*1/2d.*, it left him an amount of pay insufficient to enable him to buy his breakfast and evening meal, and an arrangement was consequently made, by which the Government fixed the stoppage to be taken from the pay of the soldier at 4*1/2d.* So long as the soldier was liable to pay 6*d.* for his ration, the Government had no particular interest to enter into contracts for him; but, as soon as the stoppage from his pay was fixed at 4*1/2d.*, it became the duty of the Government to attend to the supply, and to see that fair market prices were charged for the meat; and as the Commissariat Department superintended that business for the Colonies, it was thought proper that the same department should be intrusted with this duty at home. The duty of feeding the troops in the United Kingdom, therefore, now devolved upon the Commissariat. The number of the regular army in this country was 40,000, and of the Militia 65,000, and the cost of provisions for them was about 500,000*l.* The remainder of the Vote, 1,200,000*l.*, represented the cost for the army in the Crimea. The whole sum of 2,400,000*l.* was divided into several parts, the first of which was the cost of the Commissariat division of the War Department, and the pay of the officers and clerks of the Commissariat, as well as of the persons employed under them in the different colonies, and, in short, wherever we had troops to be fed. The officers of the Commissariat branch of the War Department were few in number, and, considering that it had had an accession to its business by having charge of the feeding of the troops in the United Kingdom, and also by having had heavy duties thrown upon it connected with the army in the East, this division of the office was by no means in excess. With regard to the Commissariat officers and clerks abroad, the items in Votes 1 and 2, described as arising at the seat of war, alone required notice. The total increase in the two Votes for pay of Commissariat officers, clerks, and persons under them, was 109,000*l.*, of which 91,000*l.* was due for the expenses of those officers employed at the seat of war. There were 101 Commissariat officers in the Crimea, with 225 storekeepers and other subordinates connected with them, making a total of 326 persons employed out there by the Commissariat branch. No class of public functionaries were better paid than the Commissariat officers; but they were required to be very trustworthy persons, a large discretion being unavoidably reposed in them connected with the disbursement of the public money. Vote 4 was for the transport service. The transport service to be performed by the Commissariat in the colonies would be the same for the coming year as it was for the last; but a very large sum—238,250*l.*—was taken in the present Estimates for the transport service at the seat of war. This service having broken down last winter while in the hands of the Commissariat, a corps had recently been organised for the express purpose of undertaking the duty. Colonel M'Murdo, the head of the corps, had left England, and every effort was being made to purchase draught animals for his service in different parts of the Mediterranean, as well as to send out as quickly as possible the persons who were hired in this country to be formed into this transport corps. A large sum was, nevertheless, taken in addition for the transport service to be performed by the Commissariat, the reason being that the item was introduced prior to the decision being arrived at for forming a special corps to discharge this duty. No doubt a considerable portion of the sum would be saved; but it could not be omitted from the Estimates altogether, because the Commissariat would still have business to transact connected with the inland transport at Constantinople, Smyrna, and different ports of the Black Sea. Moreover, the persons employed in constructing the railway from Balaklava to the camp would be paid out of this Vote. The establishment at work upon the railroad, at the rates of pay now allowed to the men, would cost about 50,000*l.* for the whole year; and, although the special duty for which they left this country might be completed in much less time than he had named, it was still possible that the services of the engineers and labourers might afterwards be found useful in other quarters. The head of the Commissariat in the Crimea wished a waggon-train to be raised from Ireland before he was aware of the intention to form a special transport corps, and a considerable number of persons had left this country who, until they were handed over to Colonel M'Murdo to act under his orders, would also have their pay defrayed from this Vote. Vote 5, included 23,000*l.* for losses by negotiation of bills in connection with the Commissariat Department, 20,000*l.* representing the loss on Commissariat transactions at Hong Kong. This large loss was occasioned chiefly by the difference in exchangeable value between the dollar and the rupee, but gains were constantly accruing from the same cause, which were regularly paid into the Exchequer. The only coin current at Hong Kong, for instance, was the dollar, and when bills were drawn there they were cashed in rupees, the value of which when paid to the soldier was only 1*s.* 10*d.* each, whereas the charge to the Government under arrangement with the East India Company was 2*s.*, causing a loss of 2*d.* per rupee. This was entirely a profit and loss transaction, and the present vote was taken for the losses incurred during a period of several years. Vote 6 included the cost of provisioning the troops in the United Kingdom and at the seat of war. The Government had estimated the cost of provisioning about 40,000 regular soldiers at home, and 65,000 militia, and had stated the sum requisite for that purpose in the different columns of the Estimates. With regard to the troops at the seat of war, a great addition had been made in the rations issued to them. The regulated ration had only been 1*lb.* of meat and 1*lb.* of biscuit per day, but the present daily ration issued to the soldier, and issued, he believed, with great regularity—the great defect having existed in the conveyance between the store and the camp—was 1*lb.* of salt meat, or 1½*lb.* of fresh meat, 1½*lb.* of biscuits, 1*oz.* of coffee, 1¼*oz.* of sugar, 2*oz.* of rice, and 1-32nd part of a gallon of rum. The next Vote amounted to 20,000*l.* The collection of large bodies of the militia in particular localities, where they would have to be provisioned, would enhance the prices of articles of consumption in the surrounding neighbourhoods; and but for this Vote, which was intended to compensate the contractors for the loss they might thus sustain, the contracts for supplying the men with food could not be fulfilled. The remaining Votes were for the non-effective service—34,000*l.*—and included half-pay of Commissariat officers, pensions to their widows, and compassionate allowances.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, he thought that, as the present was the first occasion on which these Estimates had been framed under the new arrangement, that was the best opportunity for making any observations on the transfer of the Commissariat business to the department of the Secretary of State for War. The business hitherto carried on by the Commissariat and the Treasury was of two kinds—one really military and the other purely banking and financial. No doubt every item of expenditure which was strictly military ought to be under the superintendence of the Minister of War, but he was afraid that the effect of the minute by which the Commissariat had been transferred from the Treasury to the War Department, would be to place the banking and strictly financial business of the Commissariat in the hands of the Secretary for War. It would be a great misfortune at the present moment to give that Minister any single thing to do which could be done equally well by somebody else, and which there was no inherent necessity for him to do; and, moreover, there was no particular reason why that functionary should be a good judge of such matters as banking and finance. In the Colonies, too, the Commissariat had much business to transact—such, for instance, as conducting the expenditure necessary for the convict establishments—which had no reference whatever to military matters, but which, under the new arrangement, would have to pass through the hands of the War Minister instead of being referred directly to the Treasury. He was afraid, therefore, that if this minute was carried into operation as it at present stood, the effect would be to introduce great confusion into the public accounts. It must be remembered that since the war great alterations had been made in the mode of keeping the Commissariat accounts in the Paymaster General's Office and also in the Audit Office, and he very much doubted whether the arrangements for checking the public accounts in time of peace would be sufficient for the large expenditure required in a time of war. Great difficulties and confusion would arise, and Parliament would cease to have that control over the expenditure which it at present possessed. He would suggest, therefore, that a Commission should be appointed to consider whether some arrangement could not be devised by which, while the whole of the military expenditure was transferred to the War Department, the Treasury might still retain a superintendence over the civil part of the Commissariat accounts. The thing was done very well at the Admiralty, and might be done at the War Department with proper care.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that this Estimate would bring the amount of the Votes for military purposes during the ensuing year up to very nearly 40,000,000*l.* He was very sorry he had not urged the propriety of referring the Estimates to a Select Committee, though of course it was now too late to make such a Motion. As the case stood, they were voting immense sums for the Army, Navy, and Ordnance Estimates, entirely in the dark, without any means of judging whether these demands were really necessary or not. He did not altogether differ from some of the conclusions of the right hon. Baronet who had just spoken, but he must say he thought it would be much better to consolidate military offices of different kinds under one guidance than to keep them apart, for then there would be no means of combining operations or of checking expenditure. Of course the Secretary for War would have a financial department under him; but he would be the sole person responsible to Parliament, and that was what they wanted. He was surprised to see 280,000*l.* for transport service in the present Estimate, after having voted between 5,000,000*l.* and 8,000,000*l.* before for that purpose. Facts of the most astounding character had come to light in the evidence already given before the Sebastopol Committee. From the statements of the witnesses, it appeared that Captain Christie, the captain of the port, had kept one of the largest steamers employed in the transport service in port for four months, merely to act as a lodging for himself.

MR. STAFFORD said, he must object to reference being made in debate to the proceedings of a Select Committee whilst still sitting.

MR. CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member for Lambeth was not in order.

MR. WILLIAMS said, he would bow to the decision of the Chair, but he wished to know why the price of rations had been reduced from 8*d.* to 4½*d.* per diem! He presumed it must be to benefit the soldier. He did not think that the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the War Department had satisfactorily explained why so large a sum of money was taken for transports when they had already voted so large an amount for the establishment of the land transport corps. In conclusion, he must complain of the want of such information as would enable the Committee to form a satisfactory judgment with respect to the propriety of the various items included in the Estimates. No efficient check would ever be placed upon our expenditure until the various Estimates were submitted to Select Committees. He believed that much unnecessary expenditure had been incurred for want of such a check.

MR. WILSON said, the right hon. Baronet (Sir F. Baring) had referred to the transfer of the Commissariat from the Treasury to the War Department. The right hon. Baronet must be well aware that the duties of the Commissariat officers were of a very varied character and connected with all departments of the Government; they had to perform duties for the military, the naval, and the civil departments. Their duties were both financial and administrative, and they combined the functions of bankers and merchants. Their accounts came home to the Audit Office; they were there adjusted, and the various items placed to the charge of the different departments. There was a large independent fund, under the control of the Commissariat, called the Commissariat Chest Fund, amounting to 1,200,000*l.*, by means of which all their operations were carried on. An annual account of the fund was laid before Parliament, and it was the duty of the Treasury to see that it suffered no increase or diminution. The management of that fund would still be kept in the hands of the Treasury, but each department would be responsible for the expenditure of the sums voted for their several purposes; that was the only arrangement that could be made.

LORD SEYMOUR said, that the object of the Government should be to consolidate under one head all the departments which were military ones; but not to load the purely military departments with matters which did not properly belong to them. That, he apprehended, was his right hon. Friend's (Sir F. Baring's) view of the subject. Now, he did not think that this object had been satisfactorily attained by the arrangement which had been adopted by the Government. He feared that the Treasury would not, under the present system, retain the proper control which they should have over the large fund referred to by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Treasury, while, on the other hand, embarrassing duties would be thrown upon the War Department. If any confusion should arise from these arrangements, he must protest against that House being in any degree made liable for it. The Treasury had taken six months to effect the separation of the various departments, and he (Lord Seymour) must confess that their proceedings in this particular case were not very satisfactory. The arrangement which had been effected tended rather to increase than diminish any difficulty which had formerly existed. Complaints had been made upon every side of the working of the Commissariat Department; and yet, notwithstanding those complaints, that was the department which hon. Members were desirous of seeing copied in the administration of the army. There was no promotion by purchase or by seniority in the Commissariat; but a man entered the service after undergoing an examination, and then underwent one or two years' probationary service. Promotion was given, not by seniority, but by merit, and therefore the Commissariat met in every respect the requirements of hon. Members; but, notwithstanding all these advantages, the Commissariat Department had failed more than any other. He observed in the Vote a sum of 282,000*l.* for the land and inland water transport service; and it appeared that in that Estimate was included the sum required for the railway at Balaklava. He regretted that the expenditure connected with the railway had been given in a separate item. Another point to which he wished to call the attention of the Government was, as to the necessity for securing to the troops a more frequent and constant supply of fresh meat, or, at all events, giving them vegetables when it was unavoidable that they should have salt meat. This was a very important matter in connection with the health of the troops.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he observed that 600,000*l.* and odd was taken for the Commissariat expenses last year, while for the present year 2,393,000*l.* was demanded, and he wished to know whether the sum of 600,000*l.* and odd paid the whole expense last year, or whether there was then an excess of expenditure, for defraying which money was to be applied from the Vote of the present year? When the present Votes were passed the House would have voted about 39,000,000*l.* for war purposes, and some explanation ought to be given of the mode in which it was proposed to provide for the proper distribution of such vast sums. He also thought that the Under Secretary for War should explain the way in which the vast masses of provisions had gone, or were intended to go to their destination. There was a conviction on the public mind that a number of conflicting authorities were engaged when a ship was to be sent off with Commissariat stores. Was it true that under the old system the ammunition was put on board by the Ordnance Department, the drugs by the Medical Department, and the eatables and drinkables by the Treasury? Could the Under Secretary for War make it clear to the Committee that a shipload of provisions would arrive at its destination in proper order? The Government had sent out 21,000 tons of provisions and no end of fuel, and yet the soldiers had been forced to eat their rations raw—the fact being that those vast stores had never been properly distributed. The hon. Gentleman ought at least to show that something had been done to prevent a recurrence of those terrific blunders. When the goods were put on board the transports, some one ought to be put with them to be responsible for their safe delivery. As it was it appeared to him to be a mere chance if the stores ever reached their destination. All those circumstances to which he had adverted seemed to point to a want of arrangement in detail.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, that the difficulties which had arisen in connection with the transport of provisions and stores to the East were not so much in the part of the journey by sea as in that from Balaklava to the camp. The transport by sea was under the superintendence of the Admiralty, who had just established a Transport Board for the management of this service, and for facilitating its satisfactory conduct. He thought that a great deal of the confusion complained of in the loading, despatch, and unloading of the sea transports had arisen from their cargoes being contributed by various branches of the Government. Matters would be very much simplified by the loading of each ship being exclusively under one department, and that, too, the one which furnished its whole cargo.

MR. WILSON said, that, with reference to the observations of the hon. Member for Evesham (Sir H. Willoughby), the expenses of the Commissariat for the year 1854-5 would not be completely defrayed by the Vote of £50,000*l.* taken last year. The extra expenditure would come out of the vote of credit of £3,000,000*l.* voted by the House last year; an account of which would, in due time, be laid before the House. The experience which had been obtained by the Government in the course of the last campaign had enabled the Government to frame an Estimate which they expected would cover the whole Commissariat expenditure for the present year. The Treasury would still retain the same check which they possessed before over the Commissariat expenditure.

MR. LAING said, he objected to the unsatisfactory form of the accounts; some sort of detail should be given. He found one vote of over £1,500,000*l.* for provisions, forage, fuel, and light. The number of men to be provisioned for that, in each locality, should be stated. If such a statement was given every year they would be able to compare the cost per man at any station with the corresponding localities, and with the cost at the same place in previous years. They would thus have the best possible check on the expenditure. The cost of the principal items in each locality, as beef, bread, &c., ought also to be stated. He wished likewise to call the attention of the Government to the important question of provisioning the troops by contract; in all cases where large numbers of men were collected together in private enterprises, it was found most advisable to contract for the supply of their provisions. All large shipowners now contracted for the supplying of their crews, and the same system was adopted in emigrant ships. Several most respectable firms were engaged in the trade, and if the Government had placed the supply of the troops in their hands, he would venture to assert there would have been no deficiency of fresh meat in the Crimea. One of the firms he referred to had a large establishment at Galatz, for the purpose of purchasing cattle in the Danubian Principalities, and could easily have supplied the army. He thought this matter deserved the most careful consideration, and he would suggest that after the Estimates were passed, it should be referred to a Committee of business men upstairs to determine how far the contract system could be adopted. He had no doubt it would be found to work well and economically. With regard to the rations, he thought that too much salt meat was issued; if a remedy was not applied the most fatal consequences would result in the hot weather. He would suggest that tea should be served out instead of coffee; the latter, being a stimulant, was not suited for localities where diarrhoea and dysentery prevailed. He would also suggest that as large a quantity of vegetables as possible should be sent out. A mode had lately been adopted of compressing them, which rendered their transport very easy. The neighbouring countries could also furnish a large supply of oranges and other fruits, which would be very useful for the troops.

MR. BAILLIE said, he wished to know whether any explanation had been given to the House why the army had for so long a time been rationed almost exclusively on salt meat? Any amount of fresh provisions might have readily, with the means of transport which we possessed, been obtained from Sinope, Asia Minor, and other ports.

MR. WILSON said, that ample arrangements were made for a supply of fresh provisions from the coast of Asia Minor, and why it should have failed so much of late he was unable to state; but he saw from accounts in the public papers that the difficulty of transport was very great, and the difficulty of feeding cattle far greater. It also appeared that great numbers of the cattle had died. With regard to the contract system there could be but one opinion, that in every possible shape and form in which that system could be brought to bear it should be adopted. Competition by open contracts was supported by all their experience, whether the end to be attained was economy or efficiency. He admitted the principle most fully, and as far as it could be carried out it had been carried out. At the Commissariat stations throughout the world, nothing was purchased by private contract or bargain, but everything by public contract; and so rigid were the rules of the service, that when the accounts were sent in to the Audit Board they had to be accompanied by the advertisements in the newspapers to show that the transactions were made public, and also the tenders themselves, to prove that the lowest tender had been accepted. How the principle could be extended further by rationing the army at so much per head he was not prepared to say; that was a most important point, and it was one well worthy the consideration of the Government.

MR. PEACOCKE said, he wished to know what was the precise position of the Treasury clerks who had been attached to the Commissariat Department in the East, and whether they were to form a permanent portion of the latter branch of the public service? There was another point to which he was anxious to advert for a moment. They had been told that the troops were to be supplied with fresh meat only once or twice a week. Now, he was sure that the country would receive that intelligence with regret. He had been informed that fresh preserved meat could be supplied to any amount at a cost of not more than from 2d. to 3d. per lb. beyond that of salt meat, and he had no doubt but that the public would readily submit to that increased charge. With respect to the remarks which had been made regarding coffee, he believed every medical man was of opinion that the very best species of food that could be given to men threatened with scurvy was cocoa.

MR. WILSON said, that in consequence of the pressure of business, it had been found necessary to employ a number of Treasury clerks temporarily in the Commissariat Department, but it was intended that the Commissariat service should be entirely distinct from the Treasury. One gentleman connected with the Treasury, Mr. Blackwood, who had been selected to proceed to the Crimea in the Commissariat Department, had discharged his duties in a manner which had elicited high encomiums from those who were acquainted with his arrangements.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he believed the army would gain a great deal by the transfer of the Commissariat from the Treasury to the Minister of War. Last year when the expedition to the East had been undertaken he had been led to apprehend that the business of the Commissariat would be greatly mismanaged, from the fact that it was to be intrusted to the same gentleman, Sir Charles Trevelyan, to whom had been committed the duty of presiding over the supply of provisions in Ireland during the recent famine in that country, and that apprehension had since been completely realised. He found that the same reckless waste of money, the same outrageous audacity, which had marked the administration of the funds appropriated to the relief of Irish distress, and the same wretched confusion, had prevailed in the two cases, and the consequence had been the destruction in Ireland of 2,000,000 of the population, and in the East the destruction of our army. There was no soldier who would not congratulate himself on his escape from that baneful influence. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War had spoken of the space between Balaklava and Sebastopol as if it had been the source of all the failure of our Commissariat system in the East; but it should be remembered that at Varna, where there had been no such obstacle to be overcome, great deficiencies in the provisioning of the army had likewise been experienced. He had heard an anecdote which would afford a curious illustration of the mode in which the business of the expedition was managed. In the Jason, on its departure from Balaklava, there had been a number of sick on board, but there had been no medicine for them and no dietary; and yet a friend of his in the ship at the time had observed that the doctor appeared to keep as regular accounts as he would have done in the best supplied hospital on shore. On his questioning that gentleman as to the real nature of the unnecessary labour which he thus seemed to assume, he had been told by him that "he prescribed every day the articles which he would give if he had been supplied with them, and he also prescribed the dietary he should order if it could be obtained." The articles, however, had no actual existence, and yet the entries of the doctor would, perhaps, be produced on some future occasion in proof of the ample amount of medicine and comforts with which his patients had been supplied. Among the Estimates he found a sum of 238,000*l.* for the inland transport service, and he wished to know what was the nature of the charge which that sum was to defray? It could not be the cost merely of constructing the railway, for he took it for granted that that cost could not amount to more than 100,000*l.*, if it should even reach so high a sum. There was another Vote of 743,000*l.* for the rations of the troops, from which there was to be a deduction of 209,000*l.*, which he supposed would be charged to the soldiers. He was anxious to know how much of that deduction was to fall on the troops in the Crimea, and whether any portion of it would be imposed for the unroasted and unground coffee with which they had been supplied. He should also be glad to know whether the soldiers would have to pay the cost of the transport of the articles which had been forwarded to them from different parts of the country; and he was further desirous of being informed whether the hospital stoppages would be made in the case of men suffering from disease in the same way as in the case of men suffering from wounds. The Government were at present establishing a land transport corps; he rejoiced at that circumstance, and he believed that that step should have been taken when they had first entered on the expedition. They had an example which ought to have guided them in that matter. In the year 1826, when the expedition to Portugal had been undertaken by Mr. Canning, a transport service had been organised for its use by the Duke of Wellington, and between 5,000 and 6,000 men had been employed in that service. That valuable precedent, however, had, unhappily, been disregarded last year.

LORD SEYMOUR said, he considered the observations of the Secretary to the Treasury required explanation. He understood the hon. Gentleman to say that the contract system was to be universally applied, even to the army in the East. The system might do very well in this country, with its large mercantile population, but would fail if they attempted to make contracts at Varna, at Constantinople, or in Asia Minor. The Armenian or Jew who took the contract might disappear, and there would be no possibility of enforcing the penalty. He thought a good deal of the misfortunes which had occurred during the last six months might be traced to the contract system, and he wished to know whether in the purchases made in the East, the Commissariat had been required by the Treasury up to December last to proceed upon that system?

MR. J. L. RICARDO said, he doubted very much whether the system of contract, as the Secretary to the Treasury termed it, or the system of tender, as he termed it, was the best, even in this country. Large companies usually added a very important proviso to their advertisements—that the lowest tender would not be accepted. That was not the custom in the case of the Government, and they had seen many contracts, such as the contracts for the clothing of the army and for the provisions of the navy, carried out in the worst possible manner. He believed the most respectable houses would not tender for contracts with the Government, because they would not compete with men who were willing to name the very lowest price, with the intention of furnishing a very inferior article. The hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Laing) suggested sending out tea to the troops, and he thought the worst thing the Government could do, if they adopted that suggestion, would be to ask for tenders, which would have the effect of immediately running up the price. They had much better go to such a house as Travers's, and say they wanted so many thousand pounds of tea at a certain price. He believed a firm of that standing would undertake to furnish what was wanted to those who wanted it, and they might be sure to have the very best article. If the Government had made a contract with a respectable house they would not have had the soles of the boots coming off in the trenches in the manner which had been so often described. Another advantage was, that if the Government dealt with proper parties there would be no necessity for examination of the goods furnished, or for another contract to convey them to the place where they were wanted. He hoped the Treasury would not be misled by the traditions of times when great peculations prevailed, not only among contractors, but among high officials. That could not possibly happen now, and therefore it was worth while to consider whether they could not adopt a better system than that of tender.

MR. WILSON said, his observations had no reference to the army in the East, and hon. Members would at once see the great difference between an army in the field and forty or fifty commissariat stations all over the world, where the number of troops was stated and stationary, and the contractors were amenable to the laws of the colony. His observations referred only to those establishments, and he did not mean to imply that the army in the East was to be fed by contract, because it required little consideration to perceive that such a mode would be most inefficient and unsatisfactory. The hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent (Mr. J. L. Ricardo) differed from the noble Lord the Member for Totness (Lord Seymour) because the noble Lord approved the contract system in highly civilised communities; and as the hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Laing) justly observed, they had practical experience of it in the conduct of railway companies, who not only performed their works, but received a large portion of their supplies, by contract. It was very easy to point out blots in any course they might pursue. Every system was in some respects defective; but what would the country think if all these naval and commissariat purchases were managed by public officers dealing with private individuals without the check of publicity? There would be innumerable complaints and suspicions, and, perhaps, sometimes well-grounded suspicions. If there was nothing wrong, it would be impossible to satisfy the public; and, though he admitted the contract system should be conducted with great care, to see that the goods delivered were not of inferior quality, he did not understand how a system of private bargain would prevent improper practices.

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON said, that suspicions, complaints, and fearful results, had already followed the system of accepting the lowest tender. He particularly alluded to the intrenching tools, which, from the time of the Peninsular war until now, were always singularly bad. The same might be said of the shoes and clothing supplied on that principle. We had been too much swayed by a false economy in these matters, forgetting that everything depended on the quality of the articles supplied. This question of supplies was not to be disposed of by a few phrases about contracts or no contracts. He wished to corroborate what had fallen from the hon. Member for Wick with regard to the importance of vegetables in checking scurvy. When he was at the Poor Law Board, during the failure of the potato crops, it was found that farinaceous food, even with fresh meat, without a supply of vegetables, produced scurvy in some of the workhouses, and that was no question of salt meat. So that even if preserved fresh meats were supplied to the troops, care should be taken to keep up the supply of vegetables.

LORD LOVAINE said, he must congratulate the country on the Commissariat service being transferred to the War Department. He considered that the system of appointing the Commissariat from civilians alone was not the best, and he would recommend the plan pursued in the Indian army—namely, that large numbers of the Commissariat officers should be selected from the army itself. He thought the subject worthy the consideration of the Government.

MR. ROCHE said, he must maintain that the system of contract and the acceptance of the lowest tenders was the most advisable, and would be found to answer best, provided there was a proper system of inspection. If any other plan than taking the lowest tenders were to be adopted, it would at once lead to an impression that contracts were only to be obtained from the Government by indirect means and influences, and Members of Parliament would be besieged by persons endeavouring to make them use their political or personal influence to obtain contracts; and the effect would be that all confidence in the Executive would be destroyed.

COLONEL BOLDERO said, the Committee would remember that on a former occasion he asked a question of the Secretary of the Treasury respecting certain cargoes of porter which had been sent from this country, and after having arrived at Constantinople were sent back again in consequence of there being no officer appointed to receive them there. The hon. Gentleman did not at the time answer the question; but on the 26th of last month he took the opportunity of doing so, and stated that in one case a vessel was sent to Malta, but when it arrived the troops had left that place, and that vessel was subsequently sent on to Varna; another vessel had, in the same way, after having been first sent to Constantinople, been sent to Varna, and subsequently to the Crimea; another vessel landed her cargo at Scutari, where it was used; and the fourth of those vessels carried her cargo to Varna, and it was consumed there. The hon. Gentleman also said that there was no foundation for the rumour that any action for non-performance of contract was pending against the Government, although, of course, the claims made by the contractors for the additional length of voyage were under examination. This was the answer of the hon. Gentleman as reported in the Times of the 27th of February, and which, he believed, was quite correct. Now, what were the facts? With regard to the first vessel the answer of the hon. Gentleman was correct; but the Government had to pay demurrage to the amount of 1,935*l.* He would pass over the second vessel for the moment. The third vessel was loaded in London in the month of June last, and she was discharged on the 14th of December at Scutari, for which the Government had demurrage to pay. That vessel never went to the Crimea at all. The fourth vessel was discharged at Scutari, for which demurrage was also paid. With regard to the second vessel (the Jane Cockerell), which was of 387 tons, and engaged at 25s. per month per ton, she left England in March last, and at the beginning of December was still at Constantinople with her cargo on board. He had seen the brokers of these four ships, and had ascertained from them the day on which they started, the day on which they broke bulk, and the day on which they returned. It was obvious, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman had misinformed the House when he said that all the four vessels had broken bulk. On a previous occasion he (Colonel Boldero) also stated that there was a claim made for demurrage which was disputed by the Government. The amount claimed was only small, about 120*l.* or 130*l.* The contractor had had a correspondence with the Treasury for several months, and they refused to pay him. Then, with regard to the supply of porter, none had been sent out to the Crimea since July last, for it appeared in the evidence before the Sebastopol Committee on Friday that the chaplain, who was then examined, never saw any, even in the hospital; and he saw by the evidence of a distinguished officer that the Guards suffered more than any other regiment, because they could not get their usual beverage—porter; the “navvies” had remonstrated from the same cause, and Government, he believed, were now sending out a supply for them. He thought, if it were considered necessary to send a supply to civilians, our fighting men ought not to be neglected. The East India Company’s troops had received the most essential benefit from a good supply of porter; it was a national beverage, and, without pretending to a chemical knowledge of its composition, he believed it to be conducive to health. He should, therefore, like to know why the Government had set their face against sending it out? Two other ships had been sent out by philanthropic persons with porter of which nothing had been heard, and he wished to know how it had been disposed of?

MR. WILSON said, he was sure the hon. and gallant Gentleman did not intentionally wish to misrepresent him. The question he put was, whether any porter had been sent out to Constantinople, and, in consequence of no one being there to receive it, it had been returned; and whether an action had been brought for demurrage in consequence. He (Mr. Wilson) promised to inquire into the matter, and on a subsequent occasion informed the hon. and gallant Gentleman that nothing of the kind had taken place, but at the same time he did say that demurrage had been claimed for detention of ships, or in some instances for prolongation of voyages. He believed some 110*l.* had been claimed. He was not aware what had been done in the matter, but would make inquiries. With regard to one of the ships which the hon. and gallant Gentleman said had gone to the Crimea, he (Mr. Wilson) stated that one had gone to the Belbek to supply porter, but had been ordered back to Scutari; probably that was the one which the hon. and gallant Gentleman thought had gone to Constantinople. He did not believe that any cargo of porter was detained at Constantinople, but he would make inquiries. With regard to the supply of porter to the troops in the Crimea, it must be remembered that porter formed no part of the rations, but had only been sent out and placed at the disposal of the Commissariat to sell to the men at the cheapest possible rate. He admitted that the supply of porter to the East India Company’s troops had proved an excellent substitute for spirits; and, having been instrumental in making the change, he was glad to hear that the hon. and gallant Gentleman approved it.

MR. A. STAFFORD said, that the answer of the Secretary of the Treasury was like all other answers received from that bench. Everything was admitted. Some matters were referred to other departments, and inquiries were to be made with regard to others. In this case the hon. Gentleman admitted that no considerable quantity of porter had gone out, and that there had been a charge for demurrage. He did not consider that any reference to the evidence taken before the Committee upstairs was necessary, for, as the inquiry went on, each day showed a more astounding revelation than the preceding, and proved that the departments were totally incompetent to perform the most ordinary transactions. The noble Lord the Member for Totness (Lord Seymour) said he wished the charge for the railway at Sebastopol to be kept a separate charge, but he despaired of seeing anything kept as a separate charge in the Crimea, for the accounts there were in such a state of confusion that the soldiers who came home invalided were unable to receive the pay that was due to them, so that, if they obtained a furlough, they had no money to pay the expenses of their journeys to see their families unless private charity intervened. This was the third time he had called attention to this hardship, and he should be delighted if the Under Secretary of War were able to contradict it. If this statement could not be contradicted, he would ask the War Office to violate routine a little, and let the poor wounded soldier have so much of his own money as would enable him to visit his family. All eulogies of the valour of the soldier would pass for less than nothing so long as the War Office refused him this reasonable request. He found, too, that the food supplied to the troops on their return home was unequal and of the worst kind. He had known invalids ordered home from the Crimea compelled on their voyage to eat salt pork that was rancid and biscuits swarming with maggots. This was a disgraceful part of a disgraceful system, and he would ask the Under Secretary of War to have it remedied, and see that these brave men were not persecuted by the Commissariat up to the moment of their return to this country. It was desirable, also, that some specific statement of the Government arrangements relative to the hospitals of the East, should be laid before the House. On the bringing up of the Report, he should ask the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Peel) to specify the arrangements for the hospitals at Smyrna, Rhodes, and Abydos. Last November, when he was at Smyrna, he wrote to the War Office to say that the French were establishing an auxiliary hospital there, and suggesting that a similar establishment should be formed for English soldiers. Good official reasons, no doubt, were found for rejecting that proposal, but now that Smyrna became unhealthy the Government had commenced an hospital. The Government had neglected the matter during the months from November to February, and now in March, when the hot weather was about to set in, and all the unhealthiness of the climate was about to develop itself, the Government had determined to open an hospital. He trusted

the hon. Gentleman would be prepared to show on what grounds this hospital had been opened at this period of the year, and on what authority it was to be proved that the atmosphere would not soon become dangerous to health and life.

GENERAL PEEL said, he had not been over-sanguine as to the results of the appointment of the Committee upstairs, but he had hoped that hon. Members would wait until they made their Report. He heard garbled statements of the evidence made day after day to the House. Now, would it not be far better to wait until the Committee had reported the evidence? The Committee were examining with great care into the subject, and he hoped that the House would have confidence in their Committee.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he trusted that no hon. Member would be precluded by the fact that an inquiry was going on before a Committee from stating to the House important and pressing matters which had immediate practical results. The appointment of the Committee would do great harm if it had any such result.

PRICE'S INDEMNITY BILL.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he begged to move for leave to bring in a Bill to release William Philip Price, Esq., M.P., from any disability he may have incurred by reason of a contract for sending wooden houses to the army in the Crimea. Persons standing in the position of contractors with the Government were by law disqualified from sitting in that House, or from voting at the election of its Members. In the case of Mr. Price, however, no benefit had resulted from the contract, and it had proceeded entirely on public grounds. There was nothing in his position, therefore, contrary to the spirit of the Act of Parliament.

MR. APSLEY PELLATT said, he wished to know if there was any precedent for the course which the hon. and learned Gentleman proposed to take?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that there were a great number of cases in which the House had interfered to relieve individuals from disabilities, which were not in reality contrary to the spirit of the law.

CASE OF MR. CARDEN.

LORD BROUGHAM rose to put a question to his noble Friend opposite, the President of the Council. He said it had been universally stated in the newspapers that a person named Carden, who was tried last year in Ireland for one of the worst cases of abduction, committed under aggravated circumstances, that had ever been brought to trial within his recollection and who, upon being convicted of the offence, was sentenced to two years' imprisonment with hard labour, had, in consequence of certain representations made to the Irish Government as to the state of his health, after remaining six months in gaol, had the sentence commuted, and the remainder of the term of imprisonment dispensed with altogether, upon the condition that he should leave the country, and during the eighteen months, or so much of his sentence as he had not already undergone, remain abroad. This condition, it appeared, was enforced under recognisances so heavy that in the case of any poor man committing a similar offence it would be impossible to find them, so that in such a case the conditions upon which the commutation was allowed would in effect amount to a continued imprisonment during the whole term of the sentence. The question he wished to ask—and he did so without the remotest intention of casting even a shade of suspicion upon the conduct of his noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant, who had commuted the sentence, his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland, who had advised such commutation, or the very respectable medical gentleman who had given the certificate upon which those high authorities had acted—the question he wished to put was whether the facts as stated were correct, and if so, whether the Home Office had been consulted in the matter, and whether Mr. Carden had been released with their concurrence?

EARL GRANVILLE believed the circumstances under which the commutation

of the sentence had taken place had been accurately described in the reports to which the noble and learned Lord had alluded. Very strong representations had been made to the Lord Lieutenant in reference to the state of Mr. Carden's health; whereupon a medical gentleman, whose character stood very high in his profession, was sent down to see Mr. Carden, and to report as to what might be the probable effect of further confinement upon his health—whether, in fact, it would be likely to endanger his life. His answer was in the affirmative; and upon that answer the Irish Government decided upon ordering Mr. Carden's release upon the conditions stated by his noble and learned Friend. That decision was come to without any reference to the Home Office here, and he (Earl Granville) was unable to give any further information upon the subject. If, however, further explanation was considered necessary, his noble Friend the late Lord Lieutenant of Ireland would be in his place shortly, and would no doubt be prepared to answer any question that might be put to him.

LORD BROUGHAM had intended to move for the production of the report upon which the Lord Lieutenant had acted; but as the arrival of his noble Friend from Ireland was expected shortly, he would decline making any Motion until he was present.

EXCHEQUER BILLS (£17,183,000.) BILL.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

EARL GRANVILLE, in moving that this Bill be read a third time, begged permission to repeat an explanation which he had already given to his noble Friend (Lord Monteagle) in answer to two questions which his noble Friend had put to him with regard to the change in the issue of deficiency bills last year. What he stated in reply to his noble Friend, and which he wished now to repeat in reference to the first question, was, that the law officers of the Crown had been consulted on the subject, and had given an opinion favourable to the course which his right hon. Friend the late Chancellor of the Exchequer adopted. With regard to the second question, he had stated that the correspondence which had passed between the authorities of the Bank of England and Mr. Gladstone was of a private nature. He had since, however, ascertained, that though that was in the main correct, and that the correspondence in question was generally of a private nature, there was one paper which bore something of a public character.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 3<sup>a</sup>.

LORD MONTEAGLE : I have to thank the noble Earl (Earl Granville) for the explanation which he has been so obliging as to give, on the subject of the correspondence between the Bank of England and the Chancellor of the Exchequer respecting the issue of deficiency bills, and the legal obligation of making provision for the payment of the dividends due to the public creditor. Now by that explanation it appears that at least one part of the correspondence is in all respects liable to be called for in Parliament. In relation to the entire, I must, however, be permitted to repeat, what I stated on a past occasion, when I formally referred to the subject in this House. Whilst I am not disposed to deny that letters may occasionally pass between the Bank and the Finance Minister which are essentially private, and which cannot, with propriety, be produced, yet on general grounds, where the question brought into discussion is a proposed alteration in the mode of providing for the interest of the debt, or in the mode of dealing with the public revenue, and where the parties to the correspondence are the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the one hand, and the Governor and Deputy Governor of the Bank, on the other, I can hardly imagine any class of letters more distinctly public and official. Neither can I well imagine any practice more dangerous, or more subversive of that responsibility which a Minister owes to Parliament, than an alteration in the mode of carrying on the public service, which shall attempt to convert what is strictly public into a private communication, by a mere change of the form in which that communication is carried on. With respect to these particular papers, if my noble Friend shall, on reconsideration, assure me that the letters cannot be given without prejudice to the public interests, I must bow to his authority, and rest contented. But if, as I am inclined to believe, it should be found that neither the Bank of England nor the Chancellor of the Exchequer can raise, or persevere in an objection to the production of these papers, I respectfully suggest that the Government itself should lay the whole, or at least some extracts, before this House.

I shall now proceed to a subject of far greater importance, the Bill on the table

authorising the issue of 17,183,000*l.* in Exchequer bills. I do so, however, with an apprehension, or, indeed, I might say a conviction, that such subjects rarely excite, or receive, attention in your Lordships' House. Of this an example somewhat striking and memorable has this evening been given, proving but too clearly that financial measures, though affecting large public interests, are at times permitted to slip through this House without notice or observation. Within the last three minutes a Bill which practically imposes 400,000*l.* or 500,000*l.* duties on what is now a necessary of life—I allude to tea—has passed through without either notice or explanation. I allude to the Tea Duties Decline Suspension Bill, on which not one word has been spoken, though both our traders and all consumers must feel its effect. This Bill not only increases our taxation to the extent of nearly 500,000*l.* sterling, by suspending the reduction of the tea duties, but indicates likewise an important deviation from our established free commercial policy. Yet this Bill has never been opened or explained by the mover, nor has it been commented on by one single Member of this House.

I shall not, however, dwell further upon this instance of our carelessness, or indifference, but shall proceed to observe on the Bill which we are now asked to read a third time. This measure has been treated with equal unconcern, though the millions to which it relates might have been expected to excite some degree of attention. From what cause does this proceed ? I shall be told very possibly, and not unnaturally either, that what is before us is nothing more than the ordinary Bill for giving authority to exchange the Supply Exchequer bills, of last year, for an equal sum to be now issued in the usual course. Such, I confess, was my own first impression. But, on considering the Bill, with more attention, I soon discovered that such was very far from being the case. The proposed law is very different from the ordinary annual Act. It involves other and much more important principles ; it affects the past and present, and casts light upon the future. It negatives a principle which we were last year urged by the Government to recognise and to adopt. It affirms the very opposite principle which we were then authoritatively commanded to reject. So far from quarrelling with this result, I most willingly accede to it, as being entirely consistent with the argument I last year ventured to urge on your Lordships. But, though I rejoice to find my principle laid down, and acted on, in this Bill, I think it would have been but fair and right that our attention, and that of the other House of Parliament, should have been called to so distinct a change of policy. Such a measure should not have been carried through Parliament without some explanation from the Government to inform the public to which of two opposite systems it was their intention in future to adhere.

The ordinary unfunded debt, as your Lordships can hardly fail to be aware, consists of the Supply Exchequer bills, annually voted, which are renewable twelve months after date, subject to a specified rate of interest occasionally raised or lowered according to such conditions as the Government think it right to impose. So long as the amount of the bills is unchanged, and the rate of interest is not varied, the annual Act of Parliament excites no attention. But the case is different when it is proposed to alter the amount of the capital, or the rate of interest. This is still more true where any proposed change involves a matter of principle. This is done in the Bill now before the House, as I shall undertake to prove. It has been done silently. The fact has hitherto escaped observation.

In order to make my argument intelligible, it becomes necessary that I should refer to the Parliamentary proceedings of the last Session. On the 6th of March, when the first attempt was made to provide funds to meet the expenditure of the war—an attempt which subsequent experience has proved to have been wholly inadequate to the magnitude of the emergency—Parliament agreed to increase the income tax by an addition of one-half of its then existing amount, becoming due in the next six months. This increased income tax was estimated at 3,250,000*l.* But, inasmuch as it was shown that this sum would not come into the Exchequer till towards the close of the year, it was necessary to provide Ways and Means to meet the immediate wants of the State. The proposition made was as follows—

"I propose that you should agree to double the first half-yearly payment of the income tax, and that you should make provision for the interval which must elapse before the tax can be actually levied, by the issue of Exchequer bills, which issue of Exchequer bills is to be within the amount of 1,750,000*l.*, and which bills, if issued, will be paid off out of the growing produce of the revenue."

It was thus that a temporary advance was to be obtained for the purpose of discounting the future produce of the increased income tax. At the same time a great and most important principle was laid down, in terms the most unqualified. Comparing the principle of raising money by loans, or by increased taxation, it was held that the difference between right and wrong was hardly more clear and distinct than the difference of principle between meeting the exigencies of war by new taxes, or by resorting to our public credit. Parliament was asked, "Is it right that we should ourselves make a resolute endeavour to defray the charges of this coming war, or would it be just, would it be manly, would it be worthy of the wealth and power of England that we should charge these burdens on posterity? There is, both in Parliament, and throughout the country, a strong opinion that, to resort to the money market would be a course not required by our necessities, and therefore not worthy of our adoption." It was also added, "the system of raising the funds necessary for war by loan, is to practise a systematic deception on the people." Yet it was under the circumstances so described, that it was found necessary to raise the sum of 1,750,000*l.* by Exchequer bills, to meet the immediate expenses of the war. But, as I have already shown, this was intended solely as a security for a temporary advance, and was made repayable out of the increased income already voted; the distinction between this temporary accommodation and a more permanent borrowing was laid down in the most distinct terms, and by a statement refuting, by anticipation, any possible charge of inconsistency, in the issue of these bills.

"The Bills which the Government will be authorised to raise (1,750,000*l.*)" observed the Finance Minister, "are in reality what other Exchequer bills falsely purport to be: they are Supply Exchequer bills. The mass of unfunded debt still passed by the name of Supply bills, though it has ceased to have any reference to Supply at all, and in fact constitutes a debt which is permanent in itself, but the obligation of which is renewable from year to year. When you confer, under the regular sessional Act, authority to raise so many millions by Exchequer bills, you do it with a view of replacing them, when due, by other Exchequer bills. But these are Exchequer bills quite of a different class. These are to be raised simply in anticipation of supplies, for which you will have given authority, and when the supplies come in, these Exchequer bills will be paid off out of these supplies, and no more will be heard of them."

was carefully drawn between the use of credit for a short period, provided for by securities chargeable on the current income of the country, and payable within a few months, and what was described as the permanent debt, created by Exchequer bills, renewable from year to year. The 1,750,000*l.* was designated as coming within the first definition; the ordinary Supply bills, as belonging specifically to the second class. The engagement made was that the 1,750,000*l.* were to be paid off out of the growing produce of the revenue, and no more heard of them. It was not till after a careful comparison between the amount of ordinary Supply bills outstanding, and the amount of 17,183,000*l.* provided to be renewed under the Bill now before us, that I found, that without notice or explanation the 1,750,000*l.* had been slipped into what was described as the permanent debt, and in place of being paid off, were proposed to be renewed. This was an undeniable departure from the principle laid down in the last Session. It was an abandonment of the engagement of meeting the expenditure by supplies raised within the year. It was the adoption of the opposite principle so unequivocally condemned. Parliament had been appealed to, as I have shown in stringent terms, to adopt the principle of providing our Ways and Means by the year's taxation, yet without one word in justification of the altered resolve, this Bill has added the 1,750,000*l.* to the permanent debt, and totally altered the nature of the short securities which originally had been issued, and the engagement under which they were authorised.

I have already stated that these proceedings will tell on the future, as well as on the past, and the present. Permit me to explain my meaning. This sum of 1,750,000*l.* is not the only debt we have contracted, under circumstances somewhat similar. We must remember the power granted of issuing 6,000,000*l.* of Exchequer bonds, in three series of 2,000,000*l.* each, and which it was expressly stated were to be paid off in the successive years 1857, 1858, and 1859. We have obtained a sum of 5,375,000*l.* by the issue of these bills, and this sum has been applied to the public service. When it is now seen how the sum of 1,750,000*l.* is dealt with, can any very confident expectation be entertained that the Exchequer bonds will not, in like manner, be added to the permanent debt hereafter? If so, what becomes of our boast of meeting the war expenditure out of our current income? Parliament had been assured, most positively, that these bonds were not to form part of the national debt; indeed, doubts were expressed whether they represented a loan at all. At the time this assertion was made, I took the liberty of warning your Lordships against it, as a sophism and a fallacy. I ventured to state, that in adopting the principle of obtaining money by the issue of 6,000,000*l.* of these securities, and at the same time disclaiming the notion that we were contracting a debt, or dealing in a loan, we were taking a course which could not be justified on the principles of common sense. To protest against all borrowing, whilst we were driven to bring in aid of our income above seven millions of borrowed money, was indeed an endeavour to enjoy the pleasures of vice and the honours of virtue. We were either deluded ourselves, or were endeavouring to delude others. But have we succeeded? I anticipated then what has since occurred, that these novel securities would not be absorbed in the ordinary open stock market. I anticipated that they were likely to be taken up by moneys belonging to the sinking fund or the savings banks. I considered that it was hardly justifiable to use those extraordinary resources, in order to give an artificial circulation to securities rejected by the Stock Exchange. I have never stated that those proceedings were contrary to law. Where the circumstances were so exceptional as to justify the step, the course was defensible. But it became so only when the real interests of the public were at stake, and not when taken for the maintenance of an injudicious financial experiment. To what was all this likely to lead? When these Exchequer bonds came to maturity, if not before that time, they would probably be found in the hands of the Commissioners for the National Debt, or for the Savings Banks. Of both these bodies the House is aware that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is the directing member. He will have to decide between going to the House of Commons and recommending a continuance of the income tax, to the repeal of which Parliament is pledged; recommending other new, and, perhaps, unpopular taxes, or funding these very securities and thus converting them into permanent debt. If these alternatives were presented to Parliament, and Parliament were driven to provide for the expenditure of the Russian war by taxation, or by a funding of securities issued many years before, there would be little doubt that a funding of these bonds would be resorted to, and justified by the precedent of the Bill now before us. I beg to remind your Lordships that I am not so much condemning these possible arrangements as being, in themselves, wrong, as from their being utterly irreconcilable with the declaration that our annual expenditure either had been, or could have been, met by our annual income.

I must further call your Lordships' attention to the peculiar impolicy of disclaiming the use of credit on behalf of a State like England. We are invited to cast aside the weapon in which we are strongest, and to abandon what constitutes our greatest financial superiority. Ours is, as I believe, the wealthiest country in the world. Our commercial spirit, our increasing powers of production, the amount of our capital, and the rapidity of our annual accumulations, place us at the head of all civilised nations, in these respects. But great as is our national wealth, our public credit is immeasurably higher. The fidelity with which we have performed our engagements, our scrupulous maintenance of public faith, give us a much greater relative strength in Europe, than all our capital, and all our trade, and I may even add, than all our industry. Our force may therefore be expressed by our realised wealth, multiplied into our power of credit. Yet it is the latter advantage which we were called upon to condemn, or to cast aside. Far is it from being my meaning, that on all occasions, where our means prove deficient, or our expenditure is excessive, we should be justified in resorting to loans. It would have been absurd, if we had resorted to credit for the erection of this splendid palace in which we meet. I only wish to protest against the doctrine, that in a real national exigency, when the wants of a country greatly exceed its resources, we can afford to undervalue credit. It behoves our Government and the Legislature, at such periods, to consider most carefully the course which it is right to take, free from prejudgment or dogmatism. Where the amount of additional revenue required, demands the imposition of new and oppressive burthens, I respectfully submit, that it may be infinitely wiser, even in relation to the interests of remote posterity, that the money required by the State, or a competent part of it, should be raised by a permanent, or, perhaps, what might be still better, a temporary annuity, rather than to crush the resources of industry by over taxation. If it could be shown that we might succeed in raising, by taxes levied within the year, all that we required, but that in so doing we should press destructively on the springs of industry, and destroy their force and elasticity for a period of ten, fifteen, or twenty years, is it not obviously better, that at least a portion of the money required should be borrowed on loan, and the pressure be lessened and diffused over a longer period, instead of meeting the whole exigency by concentrated and ruinous taxation? Permit me to take an illustration from private life. We are continually, and I believe very justly, congratulated on the rapid progress in our agriculture now developing itself throughout the United Kingdom. Parliament has a right to claim credit for the encouragement it has given to these improvements, by liberal grants, and by provident legislation. But, let me ask, on what principle have we proceeded? We have encouraged the tenant for life to improve his estate, by borrowing money, for the repayment of which the reversioner is also pledged. If the new doctrine were admitted, and the life tenant were never to improve, except out of the current income of the estate, if credit were made to him as a sealed book, the result would be that the most material agricultural improvements would be checked, would be brought to a standstill, or would be very imperfectly executed. Of all the parties interested, the reversioner would be the greatest sufferer by this misapplication of a principle, sound only when confined within reasonable limits. What is true of an individual, is true of the State. If it is just to tax the reversioner of a landed estate for banking out, or diverting a flood that would destroy its fertility, it is also just to cast on our posterity a portion of a national burthen, to be expended in checking the overflow of barbarism, the bursting torrents of an invading army, or any casualty which endangers our liberties and national security.

Will your Lordships indulge me if, on this subject, I refer to the authority of a late eminent statesman and sound philosopher (Leon Faucher), unfortunately lost to his country, and, I may say, to Europe. That eminent man has enriched the literature of France, by three very remarkable Essays published in the Re-

ous des deux Mondes, a short time before his decease. They form a valuable practical treatise, on what he describes as Les Finances de la Guerre. The first of these Essays is devoted to the Finances of England and of France, the second to the resources of our present formidable enemy, Russia; and the third is a rejoinder by Léon Faucher to a reply published on behalf of the Government of St. Petersburg. The first of these Essays contrasts the opposite principles adopted by England and France in 1854; the French Government having successfully resorted to a loan, whilst our Chancellor of the Exchequer had unequivocally condemned, and declared his solemn resolve to eschew, the practice of borrowing money. I regret to have to substitute for the clear and accurate diction of M. Faucher a loose and improvised paraphrase of my own—

"The reasoning of Mr. Gladstone," he observes, "supported, as it is, by the double authority of Mr. Mill and of Mr. McCulloch, is very far from being unanswerable. The British Government undertakes a moral and courageous enterprise in endeavouring to support the war by the means of sacrifices which tax-payers impose upon themselves, avoiding the tempting downward path of loans: it is the duty of Governments to preserve the resources of futurity intact, when they can do so; but we must not exaggerate the consequences of this doctrine, nor exalt it, without having regard to circumstances, into an unbending principle. It is here that a just estimate of facts and of experience casts a light upon political reasoning. At times war has for its object a present advantage, and at times it proposes to secure the greatness or the repose of future generations. In this last case, a loan is just; there would neither be equity nor prudence in meeting the expenditure of the struggle by taxation."

This I consider to be the common-sense view of the case, but it is irreconcilable with the official declarations made in the House of Commons last year. We are also told that the authority of Mr. Pitt is against us; and that, after having adopted the principle of borrowing in the earlier part of his Administration, that Minister had condemned his former conduct on the authority of his later experience. I cannot help thinking that the name of Mr. Pitt is here somewhat indiscriminately and rashly used, and his financial system dealt with and condemned imprudently and unwisely. It is not for me, with my Whig opinions, to defend Mr. Pitt's general policy; but as a finance Minister, more especially in relation to his commercial views, I cannot but recognise in him a mighty genius. His system of loans does not, however, appear to me to be rightly understood, either by Sir Henry Parnell, Mr. McCulloch, or by those who now condemn it. I confess I differ altogether from the conclusions at which they have arrived, in censuring loans made in a low-priced stock. Where Mr. Pitt's policy was more questionable was, in the preference too generally given by him to permanent, rather than to terminable annuities. He did not see that borrowing on a terminable annuity is the safest, if it be not the only sinking fund, that can be relied on. I doubt whether any one familiar with the history of those times, and who carefully considers the budgets of Mr. Pitt, can justly charge him with an indisposition to propose adequate taxation. But let us turn to the opinions expressed by Mr. Pitt in 1797, on proposing the property tax, at the very period designated as that of his financial penitence and reformation. His declaration was as follows—

"Whatever objections might have been fairly urged against the funding system in its origin, no man can suppose that after the form and shape which it has given to our financial affairs, after the heavy burthens which it has left behind it, we can now recur to the notion of raising in one year the whole of the supplies which a scale of expense so extensive as ours must require. If such a plan be evidently impracticable, some medium, however, may be found to draw as much advantage from the funding system as it is fit, consistently with a due regard for posterity, to employ, and at the same time to obviate the evils with which its excess would be attended. To guard against the accumulation of the funded debt, and to contribute that share to the support of the struggle in which we are engaged which our ability will permit, without inconvenience to those who are called upon to contribute, appears to me essentially necessary; and the great object of such a practical scheme must be to allot fairly and equally to every class that portion which each ought to bear."

Giving due weight to this authoritative declaration, it is somewhat strange to find Mr. Pitt appealed to, at any period of his life in support of the unqualified condemnation of the loan system, so rashly vented upon in the last Session.

An equal liberty seems to me to have been taken with the name of John Stuart Mill, and his judgment has been carried far beyond its just meaning. Mr. Mill I consider not only a man of the highest authority, but almost a purist on these points; yet, from the language he has used, it appears that he does not consider the question between loans and taxation to be quite so clear, or so easily disposed of, as was suggested last year. He observes—

"When Government loans are limited to the overflowing of the national capital, or to those accumulations which would not take place at all, unless suffered to overflow, they occasion no privation to any one at the time, except by the payment of the interest, and may even be beneficial to the labouring class during the time of their expenditure by employing in the direct purchase of labour, as of soldiers, sailors, &c., funds which might otherwise have quitted the country altogether."

I entreat my noble Friends to consider carefully the words of Mr. Pitt and Mr. Mill, before they again claim them as auxiliaries on their side of the question.

What is now to be considered is, however, not so much the abstract question of science, as the practical resolve required under existing circumstances. The time is approaching when a provision must be made for the present year. We are now engaged in one of the greatest struggles in which this Empire has ever been involved. We are bound carefully to consider, first, the probable amount of our war expenditure—the excess of that expenditure above our existing ways and means. We have next to decide in what manner that deficiency is to be provided for. However inconsistent the present Bill may be with the declarations of the Government in 1854, I hail it as an important indication of an altered policy. I gladly accept it, instead of complaining of the change. I thank those who have sufficient courage to announce the abandonment of a former erroneous decision, and I augur well for the results of an improved policy.

Had there been any disposition to revert to the doctrines laid down last year, and to apply them to the present, I should have trembled for the consequences of so rash an experiment. The necessary Ways and Means could not have been provided by taxation, without inflicting a grievous wrong and injustice on the industrious population of this country. It would also have cramped our resources and lessened the popularity of the war; and in conducting a war its popularity, or in other words a confidence in its justice and its necessity, is an important element towards its success.

It is necessary to ascertain what will be the amount of the provision required for the services of the year. This for the present cannot be stated by a private Member of Parliament like myself who has no means of judging beyond the Estimates already presented. But even those incomplete Estimates lead to formidable results. In 1817 the Finance Committee laid before the House of Commons a model Estimate of the Supply Votes required for a peace establishment. That Estimate scarcely exceeded 17,000,000*l*. The Supply Estimates for 1854 reached 39,000,000*l*. By adding to the Votes already passed for 1855, the further sums which may be required for the disembodied militia, the packet service, the miscellaneous and extraordinary expenditure, I am inclined to assume that the Supply Votes of the present year will amount to upwards of 50,000,000*l*. In this calculation it should be remembered that no provision is included for the interest of the funded and unfunded debt, the civil list, the judicial or diplomatic services, and several other charges on the Consolidated Fund. Therefore, without knowing more than the probable amount of the charge of the year, and knowing only the existing income, it is of the utmost importance that all uncertainty should be removed without delay, and the public speedily informed on what principles it is meant that the Ways and Means should be provided for. The Bill before us is important in this respect, as it must be considered an indication of a policy differing from the principles laid down by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Whatever course may be adopted for the present year, there is one principle which I earnestly hope may be steadily adhered to. Whether we are called on to raise money by increased taxation or by loan, I sincerely hope that we may not be induced to repeal or abandon any part of our existing revenue. That course would be still more unpardonable where no adequate reason can be stated to justify the sacrifice. What I specially allude to is a suggested repeal of the stamp duty on newspapers. I earnestly deprecate such a measure as unwise and uncalled for, even in more favourable times, but without excuse or justification at a moment when we are compelled to submit to increased taxes, or, to a loan. I myself reduced the duty on newspapers from 4*d*. to 1*d*. But the circumstances are very different at the present moment, from what they were in 1836–37. At that time the heavy amount of this duty produced, as all inordinate taxation does, an organised system of smuggling, and the laws were openly set at defiance. The duty was then nearly four times its present rate; and, therefore, the reduction of duty which I then made was politic, and has been most successful. Increased production has gone on from year to year. The number of stamps issued in 1834 was but 32,400,000; in 1851, it reached 104,212,000; and in 1854, 121,621,000. The duty likewise is augmenting annually, amounting in 1854 to 486,665. Now, I confess I feel some curiosity to hear what sufficient reason can be assigned for the abandonment of an improving revenue, which the parties primarily concerned, namely, the proprietors of newspapers, men who bring into their business not only a capital of wealth, but a greater capital of knowledge and intelligence, so far from condemning, or even complaining of, ask Parliament to continue and maintain. We cannot afford to place at risk 400,000*l.* or 500,000*l.* a year of the national income, especially at a moment like the present, when we are compelled to suspend, for a time at least, the reduction of the tea duties, a boon promised to the people of England, and one which the whole body of consumers would have understood and appreciated. If the exigency of the present time is to be successfully met, sacrifices of revenue like this should not be countenanced. I venture to exhort your Lordships to hold by the existing revenue; the present is not the time to lessen our resources. If called upon to do so, let it be from some worthier motive than a desire to acquire a mistaken and ill-merited popularity. If you should entertain any proposal for reducing taxation, let it be in some instances where increased consumption, consequent upon a reduced impost, may make good the first loss.

Above all, I take the liberty of entreating the Government, whatever their line of policy may be, to avow it fearlessly and to abide by it manfully. It will not do any longer to proclaim one principle, and then to act on another. Let them not follow the example of last year's finance. It is not politic to pursue a tortuous policy in what concerns our public credit. If they think it better to raise the money required for the war by annual taxation, let it be recommended by them. Let the measures be proposed to Parliament and fairly argued. If, on the contrary, as I expect, they require a loan, let them go into the money market boldly and openly, and make the best bargain they can. Let them do so simply and on a principle intelligible and avowed, and not be led away by some ingenious but delusive novelty. I need not add that I am ready to support the present Bill, though I could much have wished that the departure from the policy of last year had been more frankly and unhesitatingly avowed in justification of the change.

I have to apologise for the length of time which I have occupied your Lordships. My excuse must be, a deep sense of the importance of the principle which I trace in the present Bill on the conduct of our finances, on the success of the war, as well as on the general interests of the Empire.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he thought it was quite unnecessary for the noble Lord to make any apology for bringing forward a question which was of such great importance, and in respect to which he was from previous experience so competent to instruct the House, but he (Earl Granville) had hardly thought that when he had to ask their Lordships to give their consent to a Bill to enable Government to raise Exchequer Bills to an amount not greater than that which had been issued for the last forty years, it would have been necessary for him to have come prepared to answer these objections on the part of the noble Lord. He was confirmed in this opinion by the noble Lord's having, in his eloquent speech of an hour's length, in reality brought forward no argument against anything contained in the Bill, but had simply confined himself to one of his efforts in that long and continued discussion between himself and a right hon. Gentleman in another place—the late Chancellor of the Exchequer—in which the only fault was, that the interested spectators had to wait so long a time for each reply. He (Earl Granville) had had no idea that it would be necessary for him to come down to the House ready prepared on these points, and, therefore, he had had no opportunity of consulting Hansard on the subject. He collected, however, that his noble Friend assumed that the right hon. Gentleman the late Chancellor of the Exchequer had laid it down as an inflexible rule never to have recourse to a loan, and that there was the same difference between taxation and a loan as between right and wrong. Now he (Earl Granville) believed that the principle laid down by his right hon. Friend was sound, and that he saw this evil in having recourse to a loan—an evil which had been forcibly pointed out by a noble Earl (Earl Grey) last night—that it had a tendency to make Government and Parliament more lavish than they otherwise would be in the public expenditure. It was calling upon posterity to pay that which was required for the necessities of the present generation, and it was relieving the people from the moral pressure which should exist to induce them—not to give up just war—but to consider how far they were justified by principles of justice in carrying on war. He believed that all political economists agreed in the general maxim that by these loans trade and labour were injured by the diminished capital available for the accommodation of trade and manufactures; and he could not help thinking that the illustration of the noble Lord was a very strange one, for it appeared to him that there was very little analogy existing between the case of a landowner borrowing money at 3, 4, or 5 per cent for the improvement of his estate, which improvement he hoped would increase at the rate of 9, 10, or 11 per cent, with the country spending money in the most unproductive manner in which it was possible, in a pecuniary point of view, to disburse large sums of money. He believed that these principles were likewise laid down by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone), and, if his recollection did not fail, he had listened by the side of the noble Lord to one of the speeches of his right hon. Friend, in which he distinctly guarded himself against the supposition that he would never have recourse to loans or to borrowing money. The question was rather one of time and of degree; and he could not admit the authority of M. Leon Faucher, able as the documents were which the noble Lord had quoted, or that the condition of France was perfectly similar. At the end of the late war France had comparatively no debt, whilst the debt of England was enormous; and, if he was not mistaken, the debt of France had been much increased in time of peace before there was a question about war at all. The noble Lord had stated to the House a practical application of his economical doctrine; but it was impossible for him (Earl Granville) to anticipate what the present Chancellor of the Exchequer might propose to his colleagues, or to say what those colleagues might support, or might think fit to propose to Parliament; and he must decline giving any information with regard to the Newspaper Stamp Bill, to which the noble Lord had referred. All that he would say was this—when the noble Lord talked of disasters for the future with respect to financial difficulties,

although he (Earl Granville) did not undervalue in the slightest degree the pecuniary losses which would be entailed by the war, yet, looking at the general state of the country, notwithstanding the pressure which he owned did exist at the moment, looking at the present price of the funds, and having confidence in the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, he believed it would be found that the measures which he would propose would not be likely to lead to the disastrous consequences pictured out by the noble Lord. He had nothing further to say, for he certainly was not aware that any objections would be offered to the Bill, since last year or the year before last an amount of Exchequer bills had been granted which was certainly equal to the amount for which Government were now asking.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he must be permitted to observe that the noble Earl who had just sat down had not given the slightest answer to what had fallen from the noble Lord (Lord Monteagle). His noble Friend had made no attack upon Her Majesty's Government for having now departed from the system which had been laid down last year, neither had he imputed to the late Chancellor of the Exchequer that he had laid down, without qualification or reserve, certain doctrines that, under all circumstances and at all times, the exigencies of the year must be provided for out of the taxation of that year. The charge, if it could be called a charge, was not with respect to the future, but with respect to the past and present, that without any intimation having been given, either in the House of Lords or in the House of Commons, that such a change was contemplated; a change of policy was contemplated or involved in the Bill which was now passing through the House, whereby the declaration of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer was distinctly and positively falsified, inasmuch as that at the time when he professed to be providing for the service of the year out of the revenue of the year, he was at that very time practically adding to the permanent debt of the country. This was the objection of his noble Friend; and all the answer which the noble Earl professed to give was, that he was not prepared at the present time to state what would be the Budget of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, or in what manner Her Majesty's Government proposed to deal with this part of the question. The noble Earl said, that the amount of Exchequer bills which it was proposed to renew did not very considerably exceed the amount which had been renewed in former years. That, however, had nothing to do with the question. The question was, whether in this Bill they were not confounding two descriptions of Exchequer bills; and, by so confounding them, practically falsifying the declaration of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer made in the course of last year. The ordinary amount of Exchequer bills annually renewed being somewhat about 16,000,000*l.*, the present measure proposed to renew 17,000,000*l.*, whereas it was expressly stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the excess was required only in anticipation of the revenue, and that when the ordinary Exchequer bills came to be renewed these would not be renewed, but that they would be paid off when the revenue came in and would never be heard of any more. But by the present Bill these bills were now confounded with the ordinary Exchequer bills, and an increase in the whole amount of those Exchequer bills was created without any explanation being given, and without the attention of Parliament being called to it. They were practically negativing the principle of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer. He said, "I propose to raise money, and I intend to provide for the service of this year out of the revenue." But what did he do? He anticipated the revenue, and when the time came to pay off those bills, issued in anticipation of the revenue, they were now asked to renew those bills again, and the consequence was that the permanent debt of the country was increased. With regard to Exchequer bonds, also, it was said no debt would be created. It might just as well be said, that when a young gentleman who had just come of age, and was spending double his income, and raising money by bills, and renewing them as they fell due, he had as much right to put himself forward as a model of prudence and frugality, declare that he did not owe a shilling, but lived within his income. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer did nothing more nor less—he issued bills at a certain number of years' date, and when the time arrived for paying or renewing them, in either case they constituted a practical addition to the debt of the country. The noble Lord, therefore, had justly complained that the Government were increasing the debt, while concealing the fact from the country; and that they were confounding two classes of Exchequer bills, which ought to be kept entirely distinct, for the purpose of making that permanent debt which the late Chancellor of the Exchequer declared to be no debt at all. His noble Friend and the country had a right to ask, whether it was intended to adhere to the principle which had been announced in another place, of defraying the expenses of the war by the taxation of the year, or whether the Government were in this very year to depart from that principle, to incur what they must incur, and revert to that principle to which they must ultimately have recourse; namely, that where there were great national exigencies and enormous expenditure to be incurred for a permanent national object, it was right to take that course which all former Governments had taken, of throwing a portion (he would not say the whole) of that burden upon posterity, instead of taking impracticable measures to provide for that expenditure within the year—dealing with national loans, in the shape of permanent renewals, or something of that description—spreading it over a great number of years, twenty, thirty, or forty years—and thereby not adding to the permanent debt of the country, and overwhelming England with a mass of taxation it would be impossible to pay. The complaint of his noble Friend was, that the Government were departing from the principle they had laid down in Parliament last year, and endeavouring, at the same time, to conceal it; and he called upon them to state openly and broadly, whether they intended to abide by that principle, or frankly and honestly to avow the intention of departing for the future from that which he had himself always considered, under circumstances like the present, to be an absolutely impracticable principle.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, the noble Earl prefaced his remarks by stating that he felt himself very incompetent to deal with this question. If that be the position of the noble Earl, much more so is it mine on this occasion; for I entered the House without having had any previous knowledge that I should be called upon to address your Lordships, or any previous information on the subject now under consideration. I have only a recollection—a pretty distinct recollection to be sure—of certain discussions which took place last year on this matter, and a recollection of certain speeches made by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, to which I have referred since this debate began. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) says that my noble Friend (Earl Granville) has answered none of the arguments or complaints of the noble Lord behind me. I have listened carefully to the speech of that noble Lord, and I am sure that no other answer is required to those arguments and complaints than a corrected statement of the facts on which the noble Baron founded his arguments. I understand the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) to say that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had laid down an absolute principle on the subject of providing for the expenses of the war; that he had stated that under no circumstances would he have recourse to a loan; and that he considered the distinction between providing for the war by loan and providing for it by taxation, to be a distinction almost of the nature of that between right and wrong. That must have referred to the general question of supporting this war by loan, as compared with supporting it by taxation. As far as regards the principle of the right hon. Gentleman he was prepared to say that the Government to which he belonged had strictly adhered to it as regarded the financial Budget of last year. They proposed a very large increase of taxation, which was readily acceded by Parliament, and on that taxation we have hitherto been proceeding in meeting the expenses of the war. But, then, as to the question of the Exchequer bills which the right hon. Gentleman asked for in March last, the answer I make to the complaint of the noble Baron is, that he has totally misrepresented—I have no doubt perfectly unconsciously and quite unwittingly—but he has totally misrepresented the language held by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on that occasion. The noble Earl opposite says that the mere amount of the Exchequer bills has nothing to do with the question. My noble Friend behind me had informed the House that those bills in 1854 were less by 1,000,000*l.* than they were this year. The noble Baron found in that fact evidence of the tortuous policy pursued by the Government. That was the language used by the noble Baron in speaking of the arrangements of the Government. He said he had found out the evidence of the tortuous policy of the Government, inasmuch as he had discovered that in the previous year there were only 16,000,000*l.* of Exchequer bills, and that this year there was an addition of upwards of 1,000,000*l.* in the sum now asked for. Then, what right had the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) to say that the mere amount of the Exchequer bills has nothing to do with the question? I think that my noble Friend, if he will refer to the terms in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed this issue of Exchequer bills, will see that he had totally misrepresented Mr. Gladstone's view of the case. This is put in the very speech in which he objects most strongly to the principle of defraying the expenditure of the war by a system of loan. He says—

"I am therefore perfectly desirous that the Committee should understand, when the authority has been given to raise 1,750,000*l.* by Exchequer bills, that I now ask that as an authority that will only be exercised to such an extent as may be found convenient for the public service. I do not expect that it will be found necessary to exercise that power to the full extent, but probably it may be found necessary to exercise it in part; but, if it should be exercised to the full extent, and if every farthing I ask for authority to issue should be issued in consequence, I wish the Committee to understand that the unfunded debt, after the full exercise of that power will only stand at the point it stood at twelve months ago. At that period the unfunded debt amounted in round numbers to 17,750,000*l.*; at the present moment the unfunded debt amounts in round numbers to 16,000,000*l.*, large purchases of Exchequer bills having been effected from various sources, chiefly by the National Debt Commissioners, during the last year, and 400,000*l.* having been exchanged for permanent Exchequer bonds."—3 Hansard, xxxi. 384-5.]

Mr. Gladstone therefore contemplated as a possible event the issue of the full sum he asked for, whereas it seems to me that the amount of Exchequer Bills Mr. Gladstone asked for has not been issued. The amount now before your Lordships' House is 17,183,000*l.*, whereas, if the full amount asked for had been issued it would have been 17,750,000*l.*, so that the sum is less by upwards of 500,000*l.* than that which the Chancellor of the Exchequer considered might be the possible issue. But that is really not the question. There was a verbal dispute, carried on in speeches, as to whether comparatively small sums, raised in the meantime under temporary emergency, were of the nature of a loan or not. I always thought that the arguments used on this point were of a somewhat technical nature, and that the country did not attach to the dispute any importance whatever; but it was a dispute carried on between the noble Baron and the Chancellor of the Exchequer in several speeches:

The Duke of Argyll

I hope, however, that the dispute will now be brought to an end. The great question is this—did the Government lay down last year any great principle with regard to the expenditure of the war—any principle from which they have departed? I deny that they did so. What Mr. Gladstone said was that it would be wrong to rush into a system of loans at the outset of the war, that it would be unworthy of the dignity of this country and of our great resources, at the outset of the war to resort to a “system of loans;” and he asked Parliament to assent to a very large amount of additional taxation. That taxation was granted, and it seems to me a most trifling dispute whether 1,000,000*l.* or 1,500,000*l.*, which Mr. Gladstone temporarily borrowed, hoping he might afterwards be able to repay it, has since, in consequence of unforeseen events, acquired the character of a loan or not. Even if you proved that it has acquired the character of a loan, and even if you have added to the funded or unfunded debt, there is no ground for charging my right hon. Friend with departing from his principle—which was to raise the expenses of the war in the outset by taxation and not by loan. But I am in no difficulty as to divining the real object of the speeches that have been made in your Lordships’ House to-night. These speeches are of an anticipatory character, and have been made with a view to extracting from the Government some declaration of their intentions as to the Budget of the present year. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) wished to know whether we are to adhere to, or depart from, the principle laid down last year for the future conduct of the war. My answer is, that there was no abstract principle laid down last year with regard to the future conduct of the war, which was expected to be of invariable application. My right hon. Friend said the contingencies of war might prevent Her Majesty’s Government from adhering to any principle in the conduct of it; but even if the noble Earl could establish that that which Mr. Gladstone did not believe would prove to be a loan has nevertheless really proved to be so, that in no respect supports the accusation he has made, that we have covertly departed from any principle we had originally laid down, or have been guilty of any “tortuous policy.”

EARL GREY: My Lords, I cannot agree with the noble Duke who has just sat down, that this is a trifling dispute. It seems to me to be one of a very different character. It is a discussion as to whether, in the matter of taxation at the commencement of a war, Her Majesty’s Government have dealt with Parliament in a fair and candid manner, and have shown the foresight we have a right to expect from Gentlemen occupying their positions. I am bound to say that I think the explanation just given by the noble Duke, the Lord Privy Seal, fails altogether as a reply to the arguments employed by the noble Baron. The noble Duke states, that Mr. Gladstone in his speech last year expressed a hope that he should not be forced to issue those Exchequer bills at all. No doubt he did; but that is perfectly consistent with another part of the same speech, quoted by my noble Friend, in which he distinctly assured Parliament, that if he did issue them, they would be paid out of growing supplies. My noble Friend has quoted the passage, in which it appears to me that that was distinctly promised. That statement having been made, and power to issue these Exchequer bills having been granted last year on the understanding that they would be paid off out of growing supplies, and that we should hear no more of them, I do not think it was a fair and candid course for Government, without saying one word to Parliament on the subject, to confound them with the ordinary Exchequer bills. I cannot say that, in my opinion, that was a candid course to pursue towards Parliament. But further than that—upon this whole subject of paying the expenses of the war within the year, I think the conduct of Government towards Parliament has not been of a fair and honest character. My noble Friend near me never accused Her Majesty’s Government of having adopted the principle of paying all the expenses of the war within the year. No man ever said so; but what we were told was this—and I must say I was under that impression until lately—that the taxes imposed had been sufficient to pay the expenses of the war, and that the sums the Government then saw they were entitled to would be amply sufficient to defray the expenses they were then incurring. But the fact turns out to be this—that so far from that being the case, what with Exchequer bills which were to have been paid off but which have been renewed, and the Exchequer bonds which have been issued, and which was said were neither more nor less than bills at four years date, while the Government were professing to incur no debt at all they were virtually, and to all intents and purposes, placing upon the country the burden of a debt of which I cannot state the actual amount, but which I am certain is not less than 6,000,000*l.*, and which perhaps exceeds 7,000,000*l.* That is not what we were told, and in these matters I hold the opinion that fair and honest dealing with Parliament is of the utmost importance. Whatever Her Majesty's Government are doing, let it be stated clearly and distinctly. Do not let us have the statement that we are to have no debt, and then draw these bills which in a year or two are to be renewed; but let us be told clearly and distinctly what our circumstances are. I think there is this further objection to the course; that if we had been plainly told what our situation was, and if that situation had been dealt with, it is very probable, in my opinion, that the difficulties of the country might have been provided for upon better terms than they actually will be. As in the instance of that young gentleman coming of age of whom the noble Earl opposite spoke, if he had looked his difficulties in the face and raised a mortgage upon his estate at once, he would have made a better bargain than by drawing bills at four months, which he was constantly obliged to renew, and upon which he was paying a large interest. So it is with the country. If you had looked your situation fairly in the face, and had provided money openly either by loan or by taxation, I think you would have obtained the amount you required upon better terms than you can hope for under the new expedient, which I think has been most unfortunately adopted. Though I do not profess to understand these subjects very much, still I think the statement of my noble Friend near me (Lord Monteagle) so clear that I cannot resist the conclusion that he has made out his case. There is one point, however, on which I do not altogether agree with my noble Friend. I quite agree with the noble Lord that it is sometimes quite impossible to avoid incurring debts in time of war; but I certainly more nearly coincide with the idea of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, that a very large proportion of the funds should be raised out of the revenue while the war is in progress, and that as much of the burden as possible should be borne by the present generation.

VOL. CXXXVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

Motion agreed to: Bill read 3rd accordingly, and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, March 13, 1855.

MINUTES.] NEW MEMBER SWORN.—For Forfarshire, Viscount Duncan.
PUBLIC BILL.—1<sup>o</sup> Vacating of Seats in Parliament.

TORQUAY DISTRICT CHURCHES BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. R. J. PHILLIMORE moved, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. His ground for making the Motion was, that although the Bill came before the House as a private Bill, the subject with which it professed to deal was more of a public nature; and, although it professed for its object to provide church accommodation in Torquay, the first nine clauses were precisely the same as those of the Public Church Building Acts, and where the other clauses differed from those Acts they were intended to override those Acts. The patronage it conferred upon Sir Lawrence Palk and his heirs was most objectionable, for in return for their giving a stipend to the incumbents of the churches, which might be unlimited in number, they were to be the patrons of the churches, and the subscribers were to have no voice in it. Another provision enabled the levying of church rates in respect of every church erected—and, as he had stated, they might be unlimited in number—and another provided that the expenses of obtaining the Act should be provided for by mortgaging the pew-rents. He thought it a most unnecessary and objectionable Bill.

MR. HADFIELD seconded the Amendment, and said he had lodged a petition in the Bill Office against the Bill, signed by 5,000 of the inhabitants of Torquay.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. BOUVERIE proposed to the House to adjourn the consideration of this Bill till Thursday next, in consequence of the absence of the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir J. Y. Buller), who had charge of the Bill. The Bill was brought in at the instance of Sir Lawrence Palk and his son, who had large estates in the neighbourhood of Torquay, and who thought it was desirable to build an additional church there; and they proposed to settle a rent-charge of 150*l.* a year as a stipend for the minister of the new church. There was, no doubt, a great similarity in the Bill to the Church Building Acts; but there was this difference, that the stipend of the minister having been provided for, instead of the first charge on the pew-rents being for the stipend, this would be appropriated to pay the interest on the mortgage on which the money for building the church was raised. He moved that the debate be adjourned till Thursday next.

SIR J. SHELLEY said, that church accommodation was greatly needed at Torquay, and supported the Motion for the adjournment of the debate.

MR. R. J. PHILLIMORE expressed his readiness to assent to the discussion being adjourned to Thursday, out of courtesy to the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon.

MR. HADFIELD thought the Bill so objectionable, that he should press the House to a division.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 119; Noes 55: Majority 64.

THE FAST DAY—QUESTION.

SIR J. WALMSLEY said, that some days since he presented a petition, praying that the fast day might be postponed from the 21st instant to the 6th of April, in consequence of the severe distress existing among working people in the metropolis and other places; but as no attention had been paid to it, he begged to ask whether the practice of withholding on fast days and holidays a day's pay from all persons in the employment of Government who are paid by daily wages was to be adopted on the fast day appointed for the 21st of March; and, if so, whether it was the intention of the Government to stop a day's pay from the salaries of all official men, or only from the wages of persons holding inferior situations.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he had made inquiries on the subject of the question of the hon. Gentleman, and he was informed that it was not the practice in the departments of the Admiralty, Ordnance, Board of Works, Post Office, or Custom House, to stop a day's pay of the workmen on any fast day.

PAY OF ARMY SURGEONS—QUESTION.

MR. LESLIE begged to put the following question to the Under Secretary for War—that as medical men, civilians, were now being sent out by the Government at fabulous salaries, he begged to ask—

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Gentleman in putting a question must not state an opinion, or use such words as "fabulous" salaries, and those words must be struck out of the question.

MR. LESLIE then begged to ask whether it was the intention of the Government to raise the salaries of the army surgeons that are now employed in the army in the East, and hospitals at Scutari?

MR. PEEL said, it was not intended to increase the rates at which the medical men connected with the army in the East were paid. It was true that their daily pay was not so large as that of the civilian medical officers who had been sent out; but it should be recollect that, on the other hand, the army surgeons, when they ceased to be actively employed, received half-pay, which was a privilege that the civil medical men now employed would not have.

MARRIAGE LAW AMENDMENT—

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER OR A DECEASED WIFE'S NIECE.

MR. HEYWOOD rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law as to marriage with a deceased wife's sister or a deceased wife's niece. The hon. Member said that he had presented six petitions signed by clergymen of the Church of England, resident in and near the metropolis, who ought to be good judges on the subject, praying for an alteration in the law of marriage, which prohibited a widower from marrying his deceased wife's sister. He believed that if the statute of 32 Henry VIII., which dealt with the question of prohibited degrees, were to be recognised by the Judges as determining the law, these marriages would be considered perfectly legal. In 1835, a great alteration was made in the law, when an Act passed the Legislature whereby it was declared that all such marriages as had up to that time taken place in the prohibited degrees of affinity should be deemed valid; but that all marriages contracted after the passing of that Act between persons standing in similar relationship, should be deemed illegal and void. He believed that the origin of that Act was to meet the desire of the late Duke of Beaufort to have his marriage with his deceased wife's sister legally recognised. The circumstances of that case and others rendered it most urgent that such an Act should have been passed, and he was sure that no Member of the Legislature who assisted in passing that Act would have done so if he had believed he was sanctioning an immoral proceeding, whether it occurred before or after 1835. The only difficulty in the matter was, that the canons of the Church of England disapproved of such marriages, and the law was modified to meet the objections taken on this ground. But what had been the practical effect of the passing of that Act? It had been found that so far from these marriages having ceased since 1835, they had rather steadily increased, and it had been ascertained that one in every thirty-three widowers who married again, married his deceased wife's sister. There had been no less than 12,000 of those marriages since 1835. Twenty years had elapsed since 1835, many of the children of such marriages had grown up, and there would be great difficulties in regard to family property, from the uncertainty of the law. The simplest way in which these difficulties could be overcome was to continue Lord Lyndhurst's Act of 1835, with reference to the two cases of a deceased wife's sister and a deceased wife's niece, and legalise all these marriages subsequently made against which no decision had been taken. He did not believe the legal prohibition had, or would have, the effect of stopping such marriages. He was convinced that the general feeling of the country was in favour of their being allowed; and he believed a large number of the ladies of this country were very much of opinion that men should be allowed to please themselves as to marriage with a deceased wife's sister. He knew, in his own neighbourhood, a lady of large property who had told him that, if she died, there was no person she would so much wish her husband to marry as her sister; because she was persuaded that no one would ever take so much care of her children. The evidence of Cardinal Wiseman, who was at the head of the Roman Catholic community in this country, showed, that he was continually granting dispensations for this particular kind of marriages, and he declared, as the reason for his doing so, that it was impossible to hinder such marriages, and that if he did not grant the dispensations, the parties would simply cohabit without marriage. And he (Mr. Heywood) believed that was very largely the case, particularly among the working classes. It often happened in London and elsewhere that a family of working people inhabited only one room; and here, if the wife died, and her sister came to take care of the children, she and their father living in the same room, they did not consider themselves as brother and sister, and their natural feeling would arise without regard to the artificial prejudices that might prevail amongst persons of a higher class. Then with regard to those of the richer classes who might be desirous of such a connection, they had every facility for marrying on the Continent or in America. The laws of Germany and those of the United States did not hinder such marriages; and there was a place near Dusseldorf which was a kind of Gretna Green for persons who wished to marry their deceased wives' sisters; he believed the cost of such marriages was about 30*l.* a-piece. It had not yet been settled by the law courts whether such a German marriage was legal or not; but he believed that in the case of any English parties bond fide resident abroad, there was no doubt of its legality, although, if they had gone abroad merely for a day or two, some doubt might exist. It was a great anomaly that Great Britain should differ from almost all other civilised nations of the earth in this matter of marriage. Whether this were to be attributed to our insular position or to the influence of the clergy, he did not know. But amongst the clergy themselves, he believed, there was on this subject a great difference of opinion, and the clergymen of large and populous parishes, having seen the effect of the present law, were generally found to be in favour of its alteration. The enforcement of this prohibition on other religious communities against their own conviction was a downright act of tyranny. The Jews, for example, had from all times sanctioned marriage with a deceased wife's sister; and the authority of their ancient legislators indicated a near kinswoman as a person with whom marriage was most desirable. He need scarcely cite to the House the well-known instance of Ruth and her kinsman Boaz. The Convocation of the English clergy, who, in 1603, had declared all marriages made within the degrees prohibited by Archbishop Parker's table, in 1563, to be incestuous, were mistaken in their interpretation of the laws in Leviticus, which were supposed to relate to marriage. Dr. Adler, the Chief Rabbi of the Jews in England, stated in 1848, that marriages with deceased wives' sisters were not opposed to the Jewish law. Dr. Adler said—

"In all the countries of civilised Europe, where the law of the land offers no impediment, marriages of widowers with their deceased wives' sisters very frequently take place. From the experience which I myself have had during the twenty years that I held the office of Chief Rabbi in Oldenburg and Hanover, I can affirm that the marriages in question were frequent, and that they have almost invariably proved happy. Even here in England, prior to the passing of the marriage Act of the 5 & 6 Will. IV., such marriages frequently occurred."

He (Mr. Heywood) believed that, in keeping up this prohibition, they were going directly against the Book of Leviticus, and against the clear interpretation of the Pentateuch ; he seriously considered that it was, in a way, fighting against God, to maintain this wicked and unholy law, forbidding the marriage of a man with his deceased wife's sister. He would next refer the House to the opinion of Dr. Schwartz. The Rev. Dr. Schwartz, Ecclesiastical Counsellor, Superintendent, and Chief Clerical Professor of the University of the Grand Duchy of Saxe-Weimar, writes—

"Public opinion in the country of Weimar, and in the whole of Thuringia, regards such a marriage as unobjectionable, and only aims at abolishing the necessity of asking permission for each individual case, and at the introduction of perfect liberty in reference to such matters. That the same may be obtained in England, the land of liberty and of order based upon a respect for the laws, is my sincere wish."

In the United States of America there was only one State of the Union, Virginia, which did not allow these marriages ; and when the Book of Common Prayer was revised after the establishment of American independence, there were two portions of the Liturgy which the American episcopalians wished to leave out—the Athanasian creed and the passage in the Apostles' creed about the descent into hell, upon which a correspondence took place with the Archbishops of Canterbury and York ; but there was no dispute about the omission of the table of prohibited degrees, which was, in fact, no part of the Prayer Book whatever, and had no Parliamentary authority, and was not to be found in the United States' Prayer Books. He would read to the House an extract from a letter written by Judge Story, of the Supreme Court of the United States, with respect to the state of public opinion in North America on the marriage law relating to the sister of a deceased wife—

" Cambridge, Massachusetts, United States,
August 4, 1842.

"Dear Sir—There is not the slightest doubt, and never to my knowledge has been, in Massachusetts, that the marriage of a man with the sister of his deceased wife is perfectly lawful, and valid, and scriptural ; indeed such marriages are very common among us, and among all sects of Christians.

"I recollect, at this moment, two between Episcopalians within the circle of my acquaintance, and I mention these only as it has been supposed to be against the canon law of the Church of England to allow such a marriage. By many persons connections of this sort are deemed the most desirable, especially where there are children of the first marriage. The same rule prevails (as I believe) in all the New England States, and in by far the greatest number of the other States of the Union. I do not now recollect but a single exception, that of Virginia.

"Many years ago, I had occasion to consider this very question, as one of professional curiosity and learning. I was then of opinion and still continue to be, that there is not the slightest foundation for any such prohibition in the Scriptures ; and that wherever it exists it has its foundation in some positive municipal law, or in the canon law as promulgated by the Romish Church and thence transferred into the canon law of the English Church. . . . Many persons are of opinion that the whole doctrine had no better or higher origin than in the practice of the Romish Church to grant dispensations in such cases. Of the correctness of this opinion I do not pretend to judge ; for I have never deemed it a matter of the slightest importance ; so offensive would any such prohibition be deemed in Massachusetts, that I am satisfied that if our Legislature were to attempt to introduce it, it would be met with universal indignation, and, a fortiori, any attempt of any religious sect to make it a part of its own law as unscriptural, would be deemed an usurpation of authority utterly un-Christian and illegal.

"I well remember to have had a long conversation with my lamented friend Judge Livingston on this very subject near the close of his life, in which he maintained the same opinion with great earnestness and ability.—Believe me, with the highest respect, yours truly,

"JOSEPH STORY."

Sir William Jones, the distinguished Orientalist, and one of the most accomplished Hebrew scholars of modern times, in a letter to John Alleyne, Esq., in 1774, thus expressed his opinion on the proper interpretation of the laws relating to the uncovering of nakedness in the 18th chapter of Leviticus, explaining, that in Hebrew, covering nakedness referred to marriage, and uncovering nakedness to illicit intercourse between the sexes—

"I have read over the 18th chapter of Leviticus in Hebrew, with a view to discover the true meaning of the words which you desire me to interpret; and I have examined all the passages that I could find, in the historical and prophetic parts of Scripture, in which the same expression occurs. The phrase of 'uncovering the nakedness' is literally translated from the Hebrew. It is surprising that the chapter before us should ever have been taken for the law of marriage, since it is apparent that all the laws contained in that chapter relate only to the impure lusts and obscene rites of the Egyptians and Canaanites, to the abominable customs and ordinances, as they are called, of the idolatrous nations, who were extirpated by the chosen people. These doings are enumerated with a special law against each of them; and, lastly, the general command is resumed—'Defile not yourselves in these things, for in all these things are the nations defiled which I cast out before you.'

"Mr. Fry, the author of a pamphlet, which you justly commend, makes an observation, which I think decisive, that the phrase of 'concealing' the nakedness, not of 'exposing' it, is constantly used in Scripture for the nuptial rite. I turned to the passage in Ezekiel, where that vehement poet, or rather orator, is describing the covenant with the Jewish nation, which covenant is very often, we know, expressed by the allegory of a marriage. His words are—'Thy season was the season of love; I spread the border of my mantle over thee, and covered thy nakedness;' that is, I married thee. What is conclusive evidence, if this be not? And if this interpretation of Leviticus be just, what will become of the canons and rubrics on the Levitical degrees?"

He was aware that many persons would be startled by the assertion that one of the canons of the Church of England might be erroneous; but that was no reason why they should not inquire whether that canon had been drawn up in accordance with correct data or not; and if they found it was not, why they should not alter it. This was a practical question, in which the welfare of a large number of people was involved. Many couples were living in such a marriage, whose marriages were legally void. As he understood there was a great deal of prejudice on this subject in the northern part of this country, he was perfectly willing to leave Scotland out of the scope of this Bill. It was strange, however, that the people of Scotland, the disciples of John Knox, should adhere to this prohibition, which was a relic of Romanism, and one of the worst dogmas of the Middle Ages. If the origin of the prohibition were to be traced back, it would be discovered in the Greek Church of the fourth century after Christ, when Basil, Bishop of Cæsarea, made an order against such marriages, and seven years' penance was ordained for every one who disobeyed it. The Roman Church had followed the Greek, and the English the Roman. But he would remind the House of the saying of Lord Denman, in the case of O'Connell and others v. the Queen, that no number of repetitions of erroneous opinions made that doctrine right which had been originally founded in error. Lord Denman said—

"I am tempted to take this opportunity of observing, that a large portion of that legal opinion which has passed current for law, falls within the description of 'law taken for granted.' If a statistical table of legal propositions should be drawn out, and the first column headed 'Law by Statute,' and the second 'Law by Decision,' a third column, under the heading of 'Law taken for granted,' would comprise as much matter as both the others combined. But when, in the pursuit of truth, we are obliged to investigate the grounds of the law, it is plain, and has often been proved by recent experience, that the mere statement and restatement of a doctrine—the mere repetition of the 'cantilena' of lawyers—cannot make it law, unless it can be traced to some competent authority, and if it be irreconcilable to some clear legal principle."

He (Mr. Heywood) contended that in the prohibited degrees of marriage, there ought to be a distinction drawn between consanguinity and affinity, and, that with regard to these collateral cases of a wife's sister, or a wife's niece, and, in his opinion, of a brother's widow also, it was open to us to alter the law. But the Bill he would now propose related merely to the subject of a wife's sister or niece. The first clause repealed so much of the Act of 1835 as rendered any such marriage void or voidable. The Bill was not to extend to Scotland, and there was to be perfect immunity given to all registrars and clergymen or others officially concerned, who might have any conscientious objections on the subject. No clergyman or registrar would be liable to any action or penalties for his refusal to perform such marriages. He trusted that the House would consent to the introduction of his Bill; for it was necessary that there should be a speedy decision of this question, as the present state of the law was a great injustice and cruelty to many persons thus connected with each other, and who were either married, or who were sincerely attached to each other, and desirous of being married. He now moved for leave to bring in the Bill.

MR. HANKEY seconded the Motion.
• Motion made, and Question proposed—

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law as to Marriage with a deceased wife's sister or a deceased wife's niece."

Mr. Heywood

SIR F. THESIGER said, he should oppose at the very threshold the introduction of this Bill. The question was not a new one; it had been fully discussed on several previous occasions, and the whole merits consisted in the principle involved. He was in hopes that the last experiment which was made in this direction would have discouraged any further attempt in favour of the alteration of the law now proposed. In 1851, a measure similar in its character to the present was brought forward in the House of Lords; and, notwithstanding that it was supported in a speech of great power and ability by Lord St. Germans, after considerable discussion, only sixteen Peers could be found to vote in its favour. He therefore was surprised and deeply regretted that the hon. Member should have thought fit again to agitate a matter which undoubtedly stirred the feelings and prejudices of a large class of Her Majesty's subjects, for he was satisfied that, even if he should succeed in obtaining for his proposal a temporary success, there was no chance of the measure being carried successfully through its further stages; and it was most undesirable to agitate a question of this kind when the only result of that agitation would be ultimate failure. The hon. Member had adduced no new argument on the question, and the matter remained precisely as it was when it was brought forward in that House in 1850. All the facts were to be found in the report of the Commission of 1848. The hon. Member had said there was now a general feeling in favour of the measure, and that he had presented petitions from several clergymen who were advocates for it. He had also stated that the great majority of Roman Catholic and Dissenting ministers did not oppose an alteration of the law in this respect, and that the ladies were advocates for it, and particularly anxious that the men should in this matter have the fullest opportunity of pleasing themselves. He fully admitted that this was a woman's question, and he thought that the opinions of the women of England ought not to be disregarded in legislation with respect to it; but his (Sir F. Thesiger's) experience certainly did not bear out the views of the hon. Gentleman; for so far as his experience went, he believed that the opinion of the women of England was directly opposite to that stated by the hon. Member, and wherever he had had an opportunity of testing their feelings upon the subject, he had found them invariably opposed to an alteration of the law; and on the former occasion 11,000 women of England presented a petition to the Queen against the Bill. Disregarding for a moment any consideration of the question in a religious point of view, he would ask what was there to guide the House on the mere question of expediency? The whole question, as he said before, was involved in the report of the Commissioners of 1848, and he thought the hon. Member had come to very erroneous conclusions both with regard to the report itself and the evidence upon which that report was founded. The House would remember that some time ago a number of persons interested in obtaining an alteration of the law, some of whom had violated it, and others, who were more scrupulous, but who desired such an alteration, had associated themselves together and endeavoured to impress on the public mind that a great grievance existed from the state of the law of marriage in this country; they engaged active and intelligent agents, who distributed themselves in the most populous districts of the country, and, by inserting letters in the newspapers and in other ways, produced an impression in the public mind that a multitude of persons were oppressed by the law. At all events, they succeeded in obtaining a Commission composed of persons extremely eminent in station, character, and ability; but it appeared to him (Sir F. Thesiger) that the members of that Commission permitted themselves in some degree to become the instruments of those persons who were desirous to change the law. Of course, it was natural that all persons who felt aggrieved should seize the opportunity to narrate their grievances to the Commissioners, while those who desired the continuance of the law, not feeling it to be their peculiar duty to oppose the alteration, verified the common saying that what was every man's business was no one's, and in consequence the evidence was to some extent partial and incomplete. Notwithstanding that, it appeared to him that the statements in the report were entirely at variance with the statements of the hon. Member for North Lancashire (Mr. Heywood). The tone of the Commissioners was extremely mitigated and moderate, but they admitted that great diversity of opinion existed. As far as Ireland was concerned, he was prepared to show that not only was the proposition contrary to the reasonable and moral convictions of the Roman Catholic clergy, but most revolting to their feelings; and with respect to Scotland, the opinion of the clergy was decidedly against it; while the Commissioners admitted that in the United Kingdom divers opinions were maintained, but that the prevalent feeling of the laity was against marriages of this description, which, however, was attributed to their not having fully entered into the consideration of the merits of the question. The hon. Gentleman had adverted to the condition of the poor in this respect, and had argued the question as though it were a poor man's question; but, considering the way in which this agitation commenced, and the parties who instigated it, he (Sir F. Thesiger) felt convinced the House would never have heard anything about it if it had been only a poor man's question. The very report which had been referred to was opposed to such a statement. The Commissioners said, that from 1835 down to the time when evidence was given before them, there had been 1,634 of these marriages in the five populous districts in the north and west to which the instigators of this agitation had recourse, and out of these only forty were found to have taken place among the lower classes. It was true, they added, that they had reason to conclude that such marriages were at least as frequent in that class as in any other, and perhaps much more so, as the affinity was less observed and more difficult to be traced; but what right had the Commissioners to draw that conclusion? They had no evidence to that effect; on the contrary, the evidence before them would have warranted them in saying that such marriages among the lower classes were uncommon. But then it was said that there were in the whole kingdom about 12,000 of these marriages, and probably 60,000 innocent persons who were petitioners to the House for an alteration in the law by which they were now affected. The hon. Member had arrived at these numbers by a calculation of a very extraordinary kind, for he had taken the reported result of the five districts referred to by the Commissioners, and by applying that proportion to the whole of the country he in that way arrived at the conclusion he had stated. But several incumbents of the most populous parishes had declared that very few marriages of this description took place in their parishes—in some not one for years. Therefore he (Sir F. Thesiger) did not think this calculation a very sound one, and did not believe these violations of the law had been so frequent as the hon. Gentleman had suggested. But could the House be called upon to interpose for the protection of persons who had deliberately offended against the law, and who, by so offending, had necessarily involved innocent persons in the consequences? It had been alleged that these persons had erred ignorantly; but this he utterly denied. The persons who appeared from the blue book to have married in this manner were well educated, and knew what the law was; some of them had gone abroad for the purpose, as they supposed, of evading the law, while others acted in open defiance of it; all, however, it was clear had their misgivings and scruples about the morality of such marriages. He thought, then, the House ought not to have any compassion for persons who had deliberately violated the law in this way, and that it would afford the worst possible example if they passed an Act retrospectively affecting their condition, even for the sake, as was observed, of the innocent persons who stood affected by the present law. The hon. Member had referred to two or three points which required some answer. In considering this subject, the first and most important point was the religious question involved in it; and here he did deeply deplore that there should be such a distressing diversity of opinion. It was alleged that no prohibition was contained in the Levitical law against these marriages, but his opinion was entirely opposed to that statement. His own impression, after careful consideration, was, that the precepts upon the subject of marriage contained in the 18th chapter of Leviticus formed part of the moral and not the ceremonial law of the Jews, and were binding at all times and upon all persons. The hon. Member had, however, adopted the argument, and pressed the authority of Sir William Jones, that this chapter did not refer to incestuous marriages at all—that it was, in point of fact, a warning and prohibition against illicit intercourse; but, if so, the hon. Member must be of opinion that a licence was given to the Jews to indulge their passions as they pleased, provided they kept clear of the limit of the degrees of consanguinity contained in this chapter; and in that opinion he did not think many would be found to unite. Those who opposed the alteration of the law had never contended that any prohibition of the marriage with a wife's sister was contained in the 18th verse, but the prohibition was found in the previous prohibition with respect to a brother's wife. However difficult the 18th verse might be of interpretation, it was never rested upon as any ground for saying that the marriage with a wife's sister was expressly prohibited. Various interpretations had been given of the prohibition contained in that verse, but in his (Sir F. Thesiger's) opinion, whether any or none of those interpretations were correct, no fair conclusion could be drawn from the words of that verse, so contrary to the spirit of all the preceding ones as to lead to the supposition that a permission was intended to be given to the marriage with a wife's sister. He apprehended that there would be little difficulty in showing that the marriage law of the Jews was binding upon Christians. The mode of teaching under the Gospel dispensation was entirely different to that under the Jewish; the law of marriage was placed upon a higher and holier footing, and a more important and sacred interpretation was given to it than under the Jewish dispensation. He had no doubt in his own mind that the whole of the prohibitions contained in the 18th chapter of Leviticus were binding upon Christians, and, if possible, in a higher degree than they were upon Jews. Without resorting to tradition, he was desirous of considering what had been the opinion of persons anxious to obtain the meaning of Scripture and its binding force upon their consciences as to the divine law upon this subject; and he found beyond question that in the early ages of the Church and down to the sixth century the uniform opinion entertained was that the law contained in the 18th chapter of Leviticus was the divine law upon the matter, and that that law was not to be confined to the express prohibition contained within it. At a later period corruptions crept in, and prohibitions were introduced which were not to be found in the Scriptures; nevertheless, this particular prohibition was uniformly maintained from the earliest period down to the end of the fifteenth century, when for the first time an unfortunate departure from the rule of the Church took place, a dispensation having been granted by Alexander VI. to Emanuel, King of Portugal, to marry the daughter of Ferdinand, King of Spain, Emanuel having previously been married to her sister. Down to that time there had been dispensations granted by the Church with respect to marriages, but they related only to marriages prohibited by the ecclesiastical law, but this was the first time the divine law had been departed from. The departure was subsequently followed by a dispensation, granted by Julius II. to Henry VIII., to marry his brother's widow, in which case the dispensation was undoubtedly a dispensation against the positive law of God. And what were the consequences? Clement VII. refused to decide against that dispensation, and the Roman Church was placed in the difficulty of being called upon to decide that the Levitical law of marriage was not binding upon the Christian, or that one of their Popes had dispensed with the law of God. They took the course of deciding that the Levitical law, was not binding, but they did so in a hesitating manner, the language used at the Council of Trent sufficiently showing how extremely guarded was the expression of opinion upon the subject. It was merely insisted that the Pope possessed the right of granting dispensations in certain cases; but no law whatever was laid down with regard to a wife's sister, though it was stated with regard to an inferior degree of affinity that dispensations might be granted. Thus matters stood at the time of the Reformation, and he believed he was correct in saying that the Reformers, who professed to be guided by Scripture only, were unanimously in favour of the Levitical law, including the prohibition of marriage with a deceased wife's sister, being applied to the Christian Church. When, therefore, the hon. Member said a complaisant Parliament made the law accord with the inclinations of Henry VIII., it should be remembered that Parliament only adopted the opinions and conclusions of the Reformers. He quite admitted that the canons were not binding on the laity, but they were binding on the clergy; and the hon. Member endeavoured to meet that objection by proposing to exempt the clergy from any consequences for refusing to celebrate marriages which they believed to be contrary to the divine law. The law continued in this state down to the year 1835, before which time many persons, undoubtedly with a full knowledge that they were committing a breach of the law, had contracted marriages of this description. The law of Henry VIII. declared such marriages invalid if they were pronounced so by an ecclesiastical judge, but not else. To evade the law, a friendly suit was sometimes kept alive during the existence of the parties; when one of the parties died, the marriage could not be dissolved by the Ecclesiastical Court, because it was already dissolved by death, and so the children were rendered legitimate. That was not a state of things which could be permitted to continue, and the Legislature was induced to pass the Act of 1835. He very much regretted that that course should have been adopted, for he thought it was a compromise which ought never to have been tolerated—it was calculated to beg an important question. But certainly it fixed the law in future, and so far it was a considerable advantage. From that time it was declared that marriages within the prohibited degree of affinity and consanguinity should be null and void. No person could thenceforward have been mistaken on the point, and there were no longer any means of evading the law upon any contrivance. He assumed that it was after careful consideration that the Legislature had come to that conclusion. But the hon. Member now wished to repeal a portion of that Act; for he was not yet bold enough to say that with respect to all the degrees of affinity an alteration should be made. The removal of the prohibition to marry a deceased wife's sister was the real question, the wife's niece being introduced merely because it was unreasonable to admit the nearer degree and exclude the more distant. But if the hon. Member was convinced there ought to be perfect freedom of marriage, why did he confine his measure to a deceased wife's sister and a deceased wife's niece? They were referred to the state of the law in Protestant Germany and in America, and told to imitate the example of those States with respect to the law of marriage. In his (Sir F. Thesiger's) opinion, infinitely more moral feeling was induced by adhering to the strict law than by adopting the liberal and enlarged notions which prevailed in America and in Germany. In many of the States in Germany marriage between an uncle and a niece was not prohibited; on the contrary, marriages in which semi-paternal relationship existed between the parties were by no means uncommon. He did not understand that the hon. Member was prepared to go that length; but where would it end? If they once extended the limits, the only rational termination was to do away with all degrees of affinity, and leave only those of consanguinity. The hon. Gentleman said, he would not extend his new law of marriage to Scotland. Why not? If it was a question of principle, why should Scotland be excluded? Were there no sisters-in-law in Scotland? The reason of the hon. Gentleman could be easily understood. He was desirous to carry his measure, and he knew that the feeling in Scotland was so unanimous, and so strong against having those restrictions which were imposed on marriage in that country relaxed, or the marriage law enlarged, that if he had included Scotland in his measure it would certainly be rejected. He (Sir F. Thesiger) trusted the Members for Scotland would not be deceived by this, because, if the hon. Gentleman carried his Bill, he did not see how it was possible to refuse extending it to Scotland. The hon. Member proposed to introduce into his Bill a provision which should exempt clergymen from any penal consequences upon their refusal to celebrate marriages of this description. Could anything more strongly indicate the feeling of the hon. Gentleman, that clergymen of the Church of England might conscientiously entertain the notion that these marriages were prohibited by the divine law? But if the hon. Gentleman really and sincerely entertained the opinion that there was nothing in the divine law to prohibit a human law of this description, let the hon. Gentleman be consistent, and enforce his law upon all persons indifferently—because every man was bound to obey the law. The hon. Gentleman, therefore, showed his weakness, and a distrust on the subject of these marriages not being prohibited by the divine law, when he proposed a clause of this nature. The hon. Gentleman had entered very little into the moral and social bearings of the question, or as to what the effect of such a law would be upon the purity and happiness of the people. A wife's sister was probably the best guardian that could be chosen for the infant children of her deceased sister; and therefore, for the security of the happiness of the family, it was necessary that there should be an opportunity afforded to the brother-in-law of making the sister of his deceased wife the guardian of her children. But how was this guardianship to be secured? The hon. Gentleman had not ventured to enter upon this most important part of the subject, neither would he (Sir F. Thesiger) trouble the House with any remarks upon it. The whole matter was one of so delicate a character that he would gladly avoid the discussion altogether. His objection to the measure was upon the ground that it would be contrary to the divine law; that it would deeply affect the happiness and the comfort of numerous families throughout the kingdom; and that for one instance in which it would be gratifying to the feelings of individuals, it would introduce domestic discord and discomfort into thousands of families, and would be completely destructive of all those finer feelings of affection which at present existed in the relationship of a man and his children with his wife's nearest kin. He did, therefore, most earnestly hope that the hon. Member would feel there could be no use in further agitating this question. He had himself entered into this discussion with extreme reluctance. It was almost impossible fairly and fully to discuss the subject without entering into questions of such delicacy as every one must be anxious to avoid. He had, however, endeavoured to present his views to the House without approaching any such topics; and, having done so, he felt that it was absolutely necessary to resist the introduction of the Bill.

MR. BOWYER said, that it might be useful for the full consideration of this important question to revert to what was the law on the subject at, and before, the time of the Reformation. It was quite clear that these marriages with the wife's sister were not void, and never were void, at common law. They were only voidable as contrary to the ecclesiastical law, and in the ecclesiastical courts, and not in the temporal courts. If the question of the legitimacy of a person, the issue of one of these marriages had been raised in a temporal court—in an action of ejectment for instance, the temporal court would have affirmed the validity of the marriage. Before the Reformation the ecclesiastical law allowed such marriages to take place by dispensation of the ecclesiastical authorities; but at the Reformation the authority of the Holy See was put an end to, and with the exception of a power reserved to the Archbishop of Canterbury, to grant certain dispensations, the power of dispensation was wholly abolished. The result was, that the lawful celebration of these marriages came to an end; they were, however, allowed by the Church of Rome, and their lawfulness was admitted, even by the Anglican Church, for they had been discontinued, simply because the dispensing power had ceased. It was quite clear, then, that there was no authority in law in favour of this absolute prohibition, because the practice of the Church from the earliest time showed that though the Church did not allow these marriages to take place without dispensation, the Church did not hold the marriage to be contrary to the law of God. Our Church never dispensed with the divine law, and by granting dispensations for these marriages, the Church declared that they were not contrary to God's law. Then came Lord Lyndhurst's Act, which was a species of compromise intended to meet the particular case of a noble family, in which a marriage of this sort had taken place; but the law, as it existed, after the passing of that Act, operated as a great hardship upon the Roman Catholic population of this country, because, while marriages with a deceased wife's sister were practically allowed by their religion, the State stepped in and prohibited them. He (Mr. Bowyer) was of opinion that the argument that these marriages were contrary to the Levitical law, was given up in substance on the present occasion. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir F. Thesiger) had certainly added nothing to what had been said before on that portion of the subject, and had, indeed, rather weakened what had been previously urged in support of it. The hon. and learned Gentleman argued that the Levitical law was part of the moral law, and that, therefore, it was binding now; but this position was contrary to the common law of England. For the common law, before the statute of Henry VIII., allowed marriage dispensations within the Levitical degrees. Suppose that the hon. and learned Gentleman were right in his view, that the Levitical law prohibited these marriages, and that it was binding as part of the moral law, he must go further, and must accept another portion of the Levitical law—that which said that if a man left a widow without children his brother should marry her and raise up seed to him. The hon. and learned Gentleman had ingeniously endeavoured to convince the House that these marriages were contrary to the Levitical law; but, in reality, he had not insisted upon the argument, but had left the question open as a matter of opinion. By the law of the Roman Catholic Church and of the Anglican Church, these marriages were valid, with a dispensation, because they were regarded as being prohibited only by an ecclesiastical law, and not by the law of God. There was little authority for maintaining the prohibition, and there was no doubt that restriction upon marriage was, as a general principle, unsound. In England, a large body

There was little authority for maintaining the prohibition, and there was no doubt that restriction upon marriage was, as a general principle, unsound. In England, a large body of Dissenters considered that these marriages were not contrary to the law of God, and the prohibition was a hardship on those people unless it was shown that such prohibitions were necessary, and they ought to be allowed perfect freedom to contract them. In the Roman Catholic Church, marriage with the wife's sister was forbidden by the ecclesiastical law, but it was not a prohibition of the divine law, and they, therefore, permitted them to be contracted by dispensation, leaving it to the ecclesiastical authorities to decide in each case, whether they should be allowed or not. The Church of Rome never assumed the power to dispense with the divine law; it could only dispense with the ecclesiastical law; and the Church of Rome had always exercised the power of dispensing with the prohibition of marriages of this sort. As to the social and moral part of the question, he (Mr. Bowyer) was not satisfied with the arguments that had been used to show that the welfare and purity of society required that in every instance these marriages should be made void, and he would, therefore, vote for the first reading of this Bill.

MR. E. BALL supported the introduction of the measure, on the ground that what was not expressly prohibited in God's Word must be taken to be permitted, and in no case did he find any prohibition with respect to the marriage of a man with his deceased wife's sister. His hon. and learned Friend below him (Sir F. Thesiger) had entirely failed to show any such prohibition; and, looking at the question in a moral and religious view, he (Mr. Ball) saw no objection to the introduction of the present measure. Indeed, to justify the principle affirmed by this Motion, he could cite a mass of the highest authorities in the Church of England, persons whose lives corresponded with the doctrines they taught, and whose views on this question were in accordance with the views of those who advocated the removal of the present restrictions. Among those names were those of Archbishop Whately, the Bishop of Norwich, the Bishop of St. David's, the Bishop of Lincoln, the late Bishop of Landaff, and he might go on naming a long list of illustrious divines and holy men who had concurred in those views. Then, again, among those who were revered by the great body of Dissenters, and who were favourable to the adoption of a measure like the present, the name of Dr. Chalmers stood pre-eminently forward.

Mr. Bowyer

True, Scotland had been named as generally unfavourable to the adoption of such a measure; but why was it so? Because the Scottish Church was opposed to it, and the doctrines of that Church being inculcated into the minds of the children of the nation rendered them unfavourable to marriages of this description. But no such doctrine was inculcated by the catechism of the Church of England, and, therefore, the children of this nation did not grow up imbibing the like prejudices; therefore he could well conceive that the measure, although advantageous to this country, might not be suitable to Scotland. Another name he would cite in its favour was that of Dr. Adam Clarke, a man of profound learning, of immense ecclesiastical research, and whose admirable commentaries upon the Holy Scriptures had rendered his name celebrated throughout the empire. He, too, was favourable to the abolition of the present restrictions; and he (Mr. Ball) would complete the list of illustrious men whose opinions were favourable to a change of the law in this respect by adding that of a man who was held in veneration by hundreds of thousands, nay, perhaps, millions of his fellow countrymen—the great Wesley, a man than whom no one led a purer or more pious life; and also the name of Professor Lee. He believed it was a mistake to suppose that the people of England generally were not favourable to the proposed change in the law, for it was no argument in support of that view to say that only 1,634 marriages of this kind had taken place in eleven years after 1835 in the five populous districts of the north. The House must recollect that the hon. and learned Gentleman himself answered that argument by stating that those marriages were in violation of the law, which was quite sufficient to account for the smallness of the number. Neither were they to estimate the importance or value of a measure by the circumstance that on its first introduction but few had supported it, and that when the question was before the House of Lords not more than sixteen Peers could be found to support it; for if that had been the principle upon which the House had always acted many of those great laws which were the boast of this country, and had contributed so much to the advancement and happiness of the people, never would have passed the Legislature. Let them look at the mode in which the question was viewed by the vast proportion of the human race.

He did not believe he was saying too much when he asserted that four-fifths of the population of the whole civilised world were permitted to marry the sisters of their deceased wives. Another reason in favour of such marriages was to be found in the fact that at present, in some instances, the children of the first wife were very badly treated by the second wife; but it was repugnant to the dictates of human nature to suppose that the sister of a deceased wife would do otherwise than treat her own sister's children with affection. So far from the removal of the present restriction being unfavourable to morals, he believed it would have a tendency to advance them, and believing that such marriages were not only not repugnant to, but were in strict accordance with, the law of God, he had no hesitation in giving the Motion his support.

MR. M. MILNES said, he did not certainly expect, when he heard his hon. and learned Friend opposite (Sir F. Thesiger) give so large and interesting a discourse upon this matter, to hear him complain of its having been brought forward on a previous occasion. He (Mr. Milnes) was of opinion, that if the House required information on the subject, his hon. Friend behind him had done well in bringing forward this Motion. He looked upon this question as one of vital importance to a large proportion of the British people. The greater number of the marriages which had been contracted in spite of the restrictions of the law occurred in the north, and the evils consequent thereupon were gradually on the increase. The frequency of those marriages had been in no degree lessened by the refusal of the Legislature to legalise them, and it really seemed as if the people in favour of these marriages were determined to say to the Legislature, "If you choose to go on imposing this cruel restriction upon us, we will go on breaking the law until you alter it." He entreated hon. Members who opposed this Bill, to ask themselves whether it was not a grave event, when they saw the law deliberately violated, not by men of reckless habits or wild dispositions, but by men of grave and sober thought and deep religious feelings, belonging not to the lower orders of society alone, but to the most respectable and intelligent of the middle and higher classes. Surely it was not wise in the Legislature to allow such a state of the law to continue. The House could not, it was clear, stop these marriages by any refusal to recognise them, because the parties to these marriages believed that hon. Members belonged to a class of society which might be disagreeably affected by the abolition of this limitation, while to the class who required the repeal of this law it was almost a matter of life and death, involving as it did the happiness of themselves and their children. It was, therefore, the duty of statesmen to deal with this question as a practical difficulty, and not to consider it merely in a theoretical point of view—and the only way to deal with it practically, was to revise the law altogether. The advocates of this change in the law had no wish to interfere with the religious convictions of the hon. and learned Member and those who thought with him; but on the other hand, the hon. and learned Gentleman had no right to say to those who wished to see the law altered, that they were wrong and he only was right, and so deprive them of the right of private judgment, which the freedom of our constitution conceded to all classes whether high or low. He regarded the present Bill as another step in the religious liberty of the people of England, and as such he trusted it would be confirmed by the House.

MR. R. PHILLIMORE said, he had no wish to enter upon the religious or theological part of the question; but he rose simply to protest against the doctrine which had been laid down by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Bowyer) that, previous to the Reformation and the reign of Henry VIII., the common law of England knew nothing of the illegality of these marriages. He said, indeed, that they were only dealt with by the ecclesiastical courts; but nobody knew better than the hon. and learned Gentleman, that the answer to his argument was this, that the common law of the land fully recognised the authority of the ecclesiastical courts, and left such matters to their judgment and authority. The hon. and learned Member might as well have argued that the common law of this country knew nothing of equity, because there was a separate jurisdiction to take cognizance of equity cases. The hon. and learned Member also pressed the question on the House as a Roman Catholic grievance, and said it was a hard case to prohibit these marriages, because the Pope could grant a dispensation to enable a man to marry his brother's wife, while Parliament stepped in and declared such a marriage illegal.

But let the House look to the consequences, if such an argument were allowed to prevail—they had heard of such things in the Roman Catholic Church as a Papal dispensation, permitting a man to marry his own niece; and if the hon. and learned Gentleman's argument were maintainable, it might be said that the law of the land prohibiting such marriages was a grievous restriction upon the ecclesiastical liberty of Roman Catholics, since here was a marriage which the Church of Rome would allow its members to solemnise, while their hands would be tied by an Act of Parliament—that they were restricting them by an Act of Parliament from doing that which was sanctioned by their own ecclesiastical authorities. With regard to the measure itself, if he wanted any argument against its introduction, he should find it in the limitations which the hon. Member (Mr. Heywood) had himself introduced. The hon. Member excepted half the kingdom from the operation of the Bill; so that, if the Bill passed, that which would be a valid and proper marriage in England would be invalid on the ground of incest in Scotland. What prospect could there be of harmony between the two countries when a journey of twenty-four hours by railway would make a marriage valid if solemnised in one country, and invalid if celebrated in the other? Why should a marriage lawfully celebrated at one terminus of a railway have no force or legality at the other? Then the hon. Member laid down another still more objectionable exception, and proposed that all clergymen, Dissenting ministers, and registrars who objected to these marriages, should not be obliged to marry parties under this law. There could be no stronger argument against the expediency of the law than these exceptions. Hon. Members talked of the cruelty of our legislation towards those who had broken the law, but they ought also to have some consideration for those who had kept the law. What misery, jealousy, and wretchedness, would not be carried into the hearths and homes of the greater number of families in the kingdom if this law were carried out, and inflicted, too, because a few persons had violated the law. They were told that parties went to Dusseldorf, as they used to go to Gretna Green, to solemnise these marriages; but every lawyer in the kingdom whose opinion was worth anything knew that these marriages were invalid. He challenged any lawyer in that House to express a doubt as to the status of the children who were the issue of these marriages. He did not wish to see that assembly turned into a religious convocation, and no case had, in his opinion, been made out for disturbing the present relations of families. Without referring to scriptural or theological grounds, he thought that the House, on grounds of expediency and policy, and even of justice, ought not to sanction the further progress of a measure originally excited by the reprehensible agency of the rich canvassing the poor. Such an attempt to disturb the marriage law of the land was, he thought, unhallowed; and the House would exercise a wise and judicious discretion in not assenting to the introduction of the present measure.

MR. BOWYER explained that he had not asserted that the question of the validity of these marriages came within the jurisdiction of a temporal court. He was aware that such matters were exclusively confined to the spiritual courts; but what he did say was, the question of the legality of the marriage might come before a temporal court in trying the question of the legitimacy of the issue.

MR. SPOONER said, he confessed he rose on this occasion with considerable difficulty to address the House, because he felt himself compelled to differ from many of his friends around him, whose opinions he held in great respect, and to whose judgment he was always willing to submit when he conscientiously could do so. But he had always supported an alteration of this law—not exactly such as was proposed by the hon. Member for North Lancashire, nor upon all the grounds urged by that hon. Member—but such as had been proposed in 1850. He should certainly vote for the first reading of the Bill, without pledging himself to all its details. He was not going to enter into the legal arguments used by the hon. and learned Member who had just addressed the House, but merely to allude to an observation that was made by that hon. and learned Gentleman. It was assumed by that hon. and learned Member—an assumption which he was sure the Member for North Lancashire would not admit—that the great majority of the country was against him, and that he was merely advocating the cause of the minority. The hon. and learned Gentleman said, what misery would they inflict upon families—what social intercourse would be broken up by effecting such a change in the law as was proposed ; and the hon. and learned Gentleman drew a doleful picture of what might by the consequences to the higher and more civilised grades of society. Now, he (Mr. Spooner) admitted that there was a feeling amongst the higher classes against this Bill, and it was with pain and difficulty he felt himself constrained to act against those opinions. He could not, however, but yield to what he thought was his conscientious duty. He believed that the law as it stands has a most demoralising influence upon the middle and lower classes of society. He admitted that this was not a proper place to enter upon a theological argument. He was never willing to enter upon such unless he was forced to it ; but if a law exists which is alleged to be against the law of God, which he believed this to be, the strongest reasons that could be given for the repeal of such law must be drawn from a consideration of theological subjects. He believed that the law as it now stands is decidedly against the law of God, and he had certainly very high authority on the subject. He would take the verse in Leviticus, which the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk seemed to think had nothing to do with the question, as one ground upon which he formed his opinion that the restriction now imposed by law is against the law of God. Now, what is the verse to which allusion was made ? "Neither shalt thou take a wife to her sister to vex her . . . . during her life." Now, what is the only construction that could be put upon that ? Why, that after she was gone the husband had a perfect right to marry a sister of his deceased wife. It was a matter beyond all doubt, and he could not conceive any other conclusion at which they could arrive. He knew that some nice distinctions had been taken upon this question, and they were told that it was not meant to apply to a marriage between a man and his deceased wife's sister, but intended to prohibit polygamy. Why, polygamy was not forbidden at that time ; on the contrary, it was allowed.

MR. WALPOLE : It was not allowed.

MR. SPOONER said, he was sorry that his right hon. Friend had not turned his attention to the subject, and informed himself upon the point. Our Saviour says— "It was not so from the beginning, but Moses, from the hardness of your hearts, suffered it to be."

MR. WALPOLE : that applies only to divorce exclusively.

MR. SPOONER denied that it applied only to divorce. In the Book of Deuteronomy there were instructions to the husband who had married two wives as to how he was to conduct himself towards them—that he was not to show favour to the one and neglect to the other. And it goes further to show how the inheritance was to be disposed of between the families arising from the two marriages. In the face of such facts, to tell him (Mr. Spooner) that polygamy was not allowed, proved that his right hon. Friend had not looked well into the subject. The House could not, therefore, put the construction upon the text—that it was directed against polygamy. He contended that no other construction could be put upon it than that after the decease of the wife the husband might take in marriage her sister. What did Archbishop Whately say upon the point ? He said this—

"As no real and strong case has been made out of the important advantage to the public arising from such restriction, I take my stand upon the broad ground, and the general principle, that every restriction of the kind is an evil in itself. The proof lay with the advocates for restriction to show its necessity."

He (Mr. Spooner) agreed in that doctrine ; that unless they could prove that this restriction in respect to marriage was commanded by the Holy Word of God, they had no business to legislate in favour of such restriction. There was, no doubt, a great prejudice against the proposed change amongst the higher classes ; but he thought that their fears on the subject were greatly exaggerated. He thought that if the restriction were removed their prejudices would be very soon removed also. But he knew the effect of the law upon the labouring classes of this country. He did not hesitate to say that there was no more fertile cause of demoralisation than the existing law amongst the middle and lower classes of society. They had been told that after all there were very few of such marriages. There were, in fact, more than they were aware of. In large parishes persons went to the clergyman, who had not the means of inquiring whether the parties were within the prohibited degrees of relationship, and were married. In the registry there was nothing whatever to show that they were guilty of a breach of the law. Dr. Hook, a rev. clergyman who was held in great respect, was at one time of his life averse to this alteration in the law, but having seen how badly it worked amongst the labouring population, he was now an advocate for the change. The petition presented that night by the hon. Member for North Lancashire was signed by the rectors and incumbents of the largest parishes, because they were witnesses of the demoralising effects of the law. In the manufacturing districts how did it operate? A man, for example, was set up in trade and lived comfortably, with a small business; he had his house well furnished, and one or two children. Well, then, it pleased Providence to remove his wife, and he had not the means of paying for a governess or other person to take care of his children. Whom does he naturally look to but to the sister of his deceased wife as the best guardian of his children? Did the House think it probable that those parties could continue to live together, joining in all their meals, and in the care and education of the children, without either contracting such a hatred as to cause a separation, or such an affection for each other as to induce them to seek for marriage? Parties were married in the way he had stated, and many of them knew not that they were really violating the law. Well, what misery might be the result? The parties perhaps in a short time quarrelled, and the husband finding it out that they were illegally married, he deserts the wife, leaving her to take care of herself; and the children become illegitimate. Now there were many such cases to be found as he had just described. He submitted that they were not justified in keeping up such a restriction unless it could be proved that it was in accordance with the law of God. What had Parliament done in 1835? Not merely a Resolution of this House, but an Act was passed, many of the Bishops assenting, which declared that all such marriages as had taken place should be considered legal. Now would the bench of Bishops have been a party to such a Resolution if they thought it was contrary to the Word of God? He warned the House not to reject this measure, but rather to enter into a full investigation of the subject. He believed that they would be doing more mischief by rejecting this Bill than by any other step they could possibly devise. It is said the law is settled, but let them consider the doubt that was hanging over such marriage, if even solemnised in a country where it was legal. Let one who was able go abroad and contract a marriage of that kind, and come back, and then try to escape the doubt which hung over such a marriage—a marriage that was open to be questioned on the ground that they had gone abroad to avoid the law of this country, and had returned without ever obtaining a domicile in the foreign country. Then followed disputes about the property. The law was not settled, and never would be settled until they put an end to this restriction, which he believed to be contrary to the law of God. The question of the clergy and of our canons was alluded to. The clergy were not bound to subscribe at ordination to any canons which had reference to this subject of marriage, but as many of them might entertain conscientious scruples as to solemnising marriages between parties within the prohibited degrees—which, when they were ordained, the law did not permit them to do, but if the law was altered, as contemplated by the Bill, they might be compelled to do—such clergy ought to be protected and left to the conscientious discharge of their duties, and should not be subjected to pains and penalties in respect to the celebration of such marriages. With regard to the marriage of the niece of the deceased wife, he wished to guard himself against being supposed to have consented to that alteration. He grounded his claim for the removal of the restrictions against the marriage with a deceased wife's sister on the fact of there being an express permission given in the Book of Exodus to such a marriage. He differed also as to exempting Scotland from the operation of the Bill. If they had no right to impose such a restriction in England, neither had they a right to impose it in Scotland. He hoped that the House would allow the Bill to be read a first time, with a view to giving the whole subject a fair consideration.

MR. DRUMMOND said, that the object of the hon. Member who had just sat down was, as he (Mr. Drummond) heard him, to inculcate and promote private morality; and he set about his task by advising the House to set the law of God at defiance. The hon. Gentleman went on to say that there was a vast majority of the people in favour of his views. So that the question of settling an important principle was to be decided by counting noses. This was not an argument usually employed; for every single sect, however small, was in the habit of saying to itself, "Fear not, little flock; it is thy Father's good pleasure to give thee the kingdom;" and except from the hon. Gentleman, he had never heard that the multitude of those who agreed to it was to be taken as the test of a theological proposition. But it was not to answer the arguments of the hon. Member for Warwickshire that he rose. The hon. Member who opened the discussion stated the true history of this question. There never was a doubt on the mind of the Church as to the true meaning of the passages upon the subject which had been quoted from Scripture. So said an hon. Member. It was very true that from the third to the fifth century for the first time the question of dispensation began to be raised, and the Pope prohibited as much as he could. In so doing the Pope had acted most wisely, for the more he prohibited the more grist was brought to his mill in the shape of money for dispensations. "But," said an hon. and learned Gentleman, who ought to know better, "the Church," by which he meant the Papacy, "never dared to say a word against that which it believed to be the Word of God." The hon. and learned Gentleman must, however, know that the law of his Church, as described by a great authority, was papa potest legem Dei mutare. The hon. and learned Gentleman should also recollect that there was another passage from the same writings, in which it was clearly stated that the Pope could make vicia those things which other people supposed to be virtutes—and virtutes what other people supposed to be vicia. It was notorious that the prohibition against these marriages had been set aside in every direction. Had they never read the history of Spain? Had they never read of the Kings of Spain marrying their own nieces? Why, almost the whole of their history, especially after the arrival of the Bourbons in the country, had been one continued history of incest, for which they had paid enormous sums to obtain dispensations. The reason that permission was given to the Jew to marry his brother's wife was, that under the Mosaic economy the land was divided into twelve portions, and no person who belonged to one tribe could acquire land that belonged to another tribe. They were obliged to keep the land in the possession of the tribe to which it pertained; and it was to preserve the succession in that tribe that a man was bound to marry his deceased brother's wife. The hon. Member who had last addressed the House, instead of arguing as he had done—why did he not get rid of the prohibited degrees, and marry his grandmother like a man?—or his niece, for perhaps his niece would be much better worth marrying than his grandmother; that is, if you mean to set aside the Word of God as a thing that is utterly unworthy and contemptible in your new code of morality. Then let him act like a man, and not stand snivelling there between the canting Methodist on the one hand and the honest old infidel on the other.

MR. J. BALL begged to remind the hon. Member (Mr. Drummond) that the quotation he had made in support of the power of the Pope came from that eminent writer Cardinal Bellarmine, and that when it was sought to canonise that individual the very text which the hon. Member quoted was produced against him as erroneous doctrine, and on the ground of that text the canonisation was refused.

MR. DRUMMOND: That is all perfectly true, and the very next year it was altered in this way—papa non potest legem Dei mutare nisi cum causa.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT said, he viewed with regret the renewal of the Motion now brought upon the attention of the House. To pass the measure into law would, in his opinion, unhinge society. He was well aware of the deductions drawn by its supporters from the practice, law, and opinions of other countries, but he could not believe that the introduction of the code of morality of other countries would conduce to the happiness, the sweet confidence, and the sanctity of that which we in England called by the word "home." He held that this Bill, if carried, would produce the greatest social miseries. He believed the Word of God was against such marriages, and that with the abolition of polygamy, the new system of equality was established between the sexes. He should therefore oppose the Bill.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I wish to state that, having paid great attention to this debate, I shall certainly give my vote in favour of the introduction of the measure. I think that this is not a question of the law of God. I hold that Parliament settled that question by the Act of 1835; for of course it can never be supposed that Parliament would have legalised all marriages which up to that period had been proscribed, if Parliament had been of opinion that there was such a fundamental objection to those marriages. It certainly appears to me that this case is one to which you may apply the quotation, Nil prosunt leges sine moribus—that is to say, that laws are of no avail if the moral feeling of the country does not go in unison with the law. Now, it seems to be established and admitted that the moral feeling of the community at large is not with this law—that the law, in fact, is not obeyed, and that a great number of persons, not conceiving themselves to commit any moral offence, do contract these marriages, although they are prohibited by law. That is not a state of things which ought to exist, and, not being of opinion that there is any moral objection to the contracting of these marriages, and, believing that the law as it stands is the cause of a great deal of misery and social evil, especially among the middle and lower classes of the community, I shall with great pleasure give my vote for the Motion.

MR. WALPOLE: I protest against the assertion of the noble Lord—this is the first time that I ever heard of a person—especially of a person in the noble Viscount's position—express the opinion that an Act of Parliament can determine what is the law of God.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I did not say that an Act of Parliament can determine what is the law of God. What I said was, that it was clear that Parliament did not conceive it to be a question of the law of God.

MR. WALPOLE: Then, understanding now what the noble Viscount says, will he allow me to set him right on the second point—with reference to what the Act of Parliament intended to do? The Act of Parliament made no declaration of the kind. It simply said that the marriages that had been contracted should not be avoided in the parties' lifetime; in other words, all it said was, that such marriages should be placed on the same footing that marriages celebrated before that Act were placed on, if either of the parties were dead. That is exactly what the Act did, and it did it for this purpose—conceiving that there had, up to that time, been a difference of opinion as to the execution of the law, it said that children should not be legitimatised in consequence of those marriages, when the Legislature itself was, for the first time, dealing with the question in that particular point of view. It had been always considered and stated by the highest authorities of the law in the other House of Parliament that, instead of the Act recognising what the law of God was in this particular, it left it open to the ecclesiastical courts of this country to punish the parties by ecclesiastical censures with reference to such marriages, although it legitimatised the children; and it did not go one inch, I believe, beyond that point. Then the noble Viscount gives as the second reason for which he supports the introduction of the Bill—I hope he will not support it in its further stages—the old maxim, Nil pro-sunt leges sine moribus; that the law is disobeyed, and you cannot enforce it, and that, therefore, being inconsistent with the feeling of the country, you can no longer maintain the law. Will the noble Viscount consider the consequences of such an argument as that? Will he bear in mind that, according to the Report of the Commissioners upon this subject, there were marriages on marriages consummated contrary to the law, marriages between brothers and brothers' widows, marriages with a mother and daughter in succession, and marriages, I am sorry to say, which led to even more incestuous intercourse than these? If once we admit the doctrine that persons having violated the law of the land—which I believe in this instance, also, to be the law of God—is a sufficient reason for altering the law, I see nothing whatever that is to keep the bonds of society together. I could not refrain from entering my protest against such a doctrine; and I would urge upon the noble Viscount not to pursue this subject further. I would implore him to consider what effect it will have upon the country if this question of marriage—a most solemn, a most sacred, a most interesting question to the whole community—should be constantly ventilated in Parliament and agitated out of doors—contrary to the feelings, as is admitted by the hon. Member who brings forward this Bill, of the people of Scotland; so much so, indeed, that he will not venture to include that part of the country within its provisions—contrary, as was shown by my hon. and learned Friend (Sir F. Thesiger), to the general feeling of the people in Ireland; and contrary, I am convinced, to the feelings of a large, if not by far the largest, portion of the people of this country. By such a change you are introducing a state of society totally different from that which we now enjoy, where the sister of the wife can live with the husband of her sister in perfect innocence, and with all that familiarity which constitutes the charm of domestic life; and you are imposing upon the husband restraints which are not now necessary, because there is a moral barrier which prevents the rising of a criminal thought within his breast. And when you talk of the guardianship which the children are afterwards to enjoy—when you say that the sister in a married state would be the best guardian for the children, just consider for a moment whether the married woman may not become an infinitely worse guardian than the unmarried aunt who now protects the children of her sister as against claims of the children of a subsequent marriage who might interfere with their interests. All this may be destroyed in an unlucky moment—yes, I say in an unlucky moment, merely because the inclinations of a certain set of people have unfortunately inclined them to violate the law; and I must also add, because paid emissaries have been sent up and down the country to collect partial, imperfect, inaccurate information, by means of which the law of the land and the law of God are both at the same time to be violated.

MR. G. H. MOORE said, the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Bowyer) had observed that this was a Catholic question and a Catholic grievance. Now, he begged to state, in the name of his Catholic fellow-countrymen, that throughout Ireland there existed among the whole Catholic population, high and low, rich and poor, clergy and laity, the deepest horror and scorn for the proposition made to the House to-night.

MR. COBDEN said, he had heard this subject discussed very often in the House, and it appeared to him that the weight of argument was conclusively, and almost exclusively, on one side. But to-night he thought that the opponents of the measure had allowed their case to go by default altogether, because the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir F. Thesiger) gave up the only strong ground on which the law had been defended on former occasions—namely, the 18th of Leviticus. But in 1850 the hon. and learned Gentleman and others relied almost exclusively on that authority, and in abandoning it, therefore, the opposition to this Bill had lost ground to-night immeasurably. He did not understand the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) to say, as the right hon. Gentleman seemed to understand him, that because this law was disregarded out of doors, it ought to be repealed. What he understood the noble Lord to mean was that public opinion did not support the law, because those who infringed it retained their status in society. Public opinion sanctioned the evasion—for it was not the violation—of the law, and therefore it must be inferred that they considered there was nothing immoral in these marriages. He knew of his own personal knowledge individuals who held a respectable position in society, and who from the purest motives went to Germany to be married to their deceased wives' sister, and they returned to this country without suffering in the estimation of their friends and neighbours. But it must not, therefore, be implied that public opinion would sanction the evasion or violation of other laws respecting marriage. Could it be said that if persons had married their niece by blood, or their still nearer relatives, they could return without losing cast in respectable society? The right hon. Gentleman therefore begged the whole question when he imported cases of incestuous marriage into it. Let them deal with the case as it stood. The argument of the right hon. Gentleman, that such an Act as was now proposed to be brought forward would affect the innocent intimacy at present existing between the husband and his wife's sister, quite failed; for it argued a want of purity in domestic life, if it required any such law to prevent dissolute practices in connection with a wife's sister. The argument of the right hon. Gentleman would go to this length, that the wife was to have no female acquaintance at all because at a future time she might become the wife of her husband. He believed that such a view of things was a slander on domestic life in England.

After a few words from MR. HEYWOOD in reply,

Question put, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law as to Marriage with a deceased wife's sister or a deceased wife's niece."

The House divided:—Ayes 87; Noes 53: Majority 34.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. HEYWOOD and Mr. HEADLAM.

(IRELAND).

MR. J. BALL rose to submit the Resolution of which he had given notice to the House, "That it is expedient that more effectual means should be adopted to improve the Education of Pauper Children in Ireland." The hon. and learned Gentleman said that, although the subject which he had to bring under the notice of the House might not be so interesting as that which had just engaged its attention, yet it was one which was deserving of careful consideration, inasmuch as it involved the interests and welfare, both in this world and in the next, of a large and helpless portion of the population, whose characters and future dispositions in life would mainly depend upon the training they received under the guardianship of the State. He found from returns in his possession that in 1853 the average population of the workhouses in Ireland was 150,000, of whom more than one-half were children under fifteen years of age, and of these again not less than 41,000 were orphans and deserted children, whose parents had died or abandoned them in the midst of the dreadful catastrophe which had befallen Ireland some time back. Their number had no doubt somewhat diminished since 1853; but there certainly could not be less than 30,000 of this helpless class of children at present deriving support and instruction from the State. It remained for the Legislature and the Administration to make adequate provision to give these unfortunates a suitable education, which was their only hope of becoming useful members of society. With regard to other classes there may be room for choice; we may rely upon other agencies, but here there can be no doubt that we are in the fullest sense responsible for those whom we have determined to place in public institutions under the sole protection of the law. There were three classes of evidence as to the existing state of education to which he could refer—the reports of Poor Law inspectors, those of officers engaged in the administration of the criminal law, and a special report on the subject, made to the Commissioners of Education in Ireland, by Mr. Cavanagh, one of their most active and experienced officers. That report was more unfavourable to the state of education in the workhouses than any other document with which he was acquainted, though he was bound to say he believed its statements and views to be in some respects exaggerated. The first point to which he wished to call the attention of the House was the inefficiency of the workhouse teachers. Out of 359 workhouse teachers but fifteen were included in the first of the three classes into which the National Board of Education had divided the schoolmasters of Ireland; but fifty-two were even second-class teachers, and the remainder were either in the third class, or classed as mere probationers. Only 113 had gone through a training sufficient to fit them for their duties. This was a lamentable state of things, when it was considered that the children in the workhouses were wholly dependent for instruction and education upon the tuition they received from the schoolmaster. He believed that the cause of this state of things was the ill-judged parsimony of the boards of guardians by whom the teachers were appointed. On an average these officers did not receive more than 23*l.*, nor the schoolmistresses more than 20*l.* a year, with rations such as were given to the lower officials connected with the poor law unions. It was not to be expected that able and well-qualified men could be found to undertake these onerous and important duties at such a rate of remuneration. To show still more conclusively the parsimonious spirit by which the administration of the poor law unions was conducted on this point, he might state that the average sum spent on each child in the workhouses per head per annum was only 5*s.* 8*d.* The boards of guardians had the selection and payment of these teachers, and if they were niggardly they could quote in their excuse the invectives which were constantly being launched by hon. Members in that House at every item of expenditure in the administration of the Irish Poor Law which did not relate to the absolute feeding of the paupers. He could not too strongly protest against the clamour on this subject, founded, as it seemed, on the idea that men were to live by bread alone. It was quite vain to expect that we could have better teachers unless the teachers were better paid, and no less idle to think that the education of these children could be improved unless a better class of teachers were provided; and with a little liberality all this could be easily done. It would not be necessary to pay them on quite the same scale as in England, because competent persons could be procured at a lower rate in Ireland. Another important deficiency in the Irish workhouses was the absence of separate departments for the care and tuition of the infants; and a still more serious evil arose from the want of any means of keeping the children apart from the adults in the workhouse. It was impossible to overestimate the evil consequences which arose from this circumstance. But however good might be the literary instruction given to these children, it would not be sufficient to secure their being good and efficient labourers in future unless these schools were made, much more than at present, places of industrial education. He now came to the subject of the religious instruction given in the workhouses of Ireland. He feared that there was too much disposition in the boards of guardians to use their power to promote their own sectarian views. In Ulster, where the majority of the upper classes were Protestants, there were thirteen unions where there was not a single Roman Catholic officer in the service of the guardians, although the population were principally Roman Catholic. In one case there was not a single Protestant pauper in the workhouse, and yet the board of guardians thought themselves justified in refusing to appoint a Roman Catholic officer, and in placing a Protestant teacher over the children. On the other hand, he did not mean to deny that the Roman Catholic majority in other boards of guardians sometimes abused their supremacy in a similar way by unfairly excluding Protestant officers; though as there were few or no Protestants in the workhouses in these parts the same injustice was not inflicted in this case. Seeing that the law prevented any attempts to proselytise, he thought that these proceedings were simply the assertion of an unfortunate spirit of bigotry, which had the worst results, particularly when it was applied to the selection of schoolteachers to be placed over children who are cut off from every other mode of instilling religious and moral truth. The teacher prohibited from instilling his own convictions, is compelled to be silent on topics which essentially affect the very foundations of education. Another very serious point was the extent to which children passed between the workhouses and the gaols in consequence of the great number of convictions which took place for what were called "workhouse offences," such as breaking windows, tearing their clothes, &c. He thought that children should not be sent to gaol and exposed to the contamination of the associates they met there for offences of so trivial a character. At any rate, there could be no doubt that this circumstance was an extensive source of demoralisation, not merely as regarded the children who were actually sent to gaol, but also as to those with whom they mixed on their return to the workhouses after serving their period of punishment. Among the evils of the present system was another of the same nature which was rapidly increasing, and was very threatening in its nature, namely, the practice of committing destitute children charged with the most trivial offences to gaol instead of to the workhouse. When sent to the workhouse the charge for their maintenance would fall upon a small locality; whereas, when committed to gaol, the charge for their maintenance would be spread over a large district. Notwithstanding all this, he must, however, say that he believed that the state of education in the workhouses of Ireland was better than in the majority of the English establishments. After entering into some details with respect to the management of the North of Dublin Union, where the schools had greatly advanced under the fostering care of a gentleman, Mr. Lindsay, who had been chairman of the board of guardians, and where a mischievous system of separation on sectarian grounds had been established since the removal of that gentleman from his office, in order to show that the education of the children in the workhouses should not be allowed to depend upon the varying votes of fluctuating bodies like the elected boards of guardians, the hon. Gentleman proceeded to dwell upon the importance of establishing reformatory institutions for youthful criminals in Ireland. On this point he might refer to the great success which had attended the institution established at Philadelphia. This was established not for the punishment of criminals, but to restrain and guide those who were likely to fall into crime. In that institution the training was industrial, and the treatment pursued that of kindness. It had proved highly efficient in promoting the object for which it was founded, and by a judicious system of management the annual cost of each of the 230 boys who were its inmates was reduced to 12*l.* per head. The 230 boys earned about 1,500*l.*, and the annual expenditure amounted to about 6,000*l.* The great establishment of St. Michele, at Rome, which contained 500 orphan children, had been attended with similar success. He purposely alluded to that remarkable institution, because it was the only one of the kind in which instruction in art was regularly given to all the pupils. As there was undoubtedly a remarkable aptitude among the youth of Ireland for what might be called the secondary arts, such as carving on wood and stone, he thought a great deal of good might be done by some infusion of the artistic element in the education imparted to pauper children of Ireland.

Summing up the various suggestions which he had made, he urged the necessity of increasing the salaries of the teachers in workhouse schools. They could not compel the local guardians to do much in that way; but justice required that the Government should extend to Ireland the same provision which was made in England; and he thought it would be most desirable, that of the sum thus applied a small portion should be reserved for the purpose of paying "monitors." Upon a rough calculation he thought he could not ask for less than about 10*s.* per head as a grant for the education of pauper children in Ireland, or a maximum of 20,000*l.*, a much smaller sum than was annually expended for the same purpose in England, but which would in a great measure satisfy the claims of the sister country. The only objection he had heard to his proposition was, that the annual allowance for the teaching of pauper children in England were part of the settlement proposed by Sir Robert Peel in 1846, when a portion of the expense of the constabulary force in Ireland was taken upon the Consolidated Fund. It was true that Sir Robert Peel brought forward those two measures at the same time, but there was no connection whatever between them. The constabulary force was a portion of the standing army in Ireland, and it was altogether a misconception to imagine that a reference to the proceedings in 1846 was a sufficient answer to his argument as to the justice, expediency, and necessity of improved measures for the education of pauper children in the sister island. Hitherto it had been said that, in England, the poorer the district the poorer the school, the more the wealth the more the education. He now called upon them to reverse the rule, or at least to extend to the poorer districts of Ireland those advantages which they conceded even to the most wealthy districts in England. Since the measure of 1846, with respect to the constabulary force, the local taxation of Ireland had been greatly increased. The poor rate alone rapidly rose from about 400,000*l.* in that year to upwards of 2,000,000*l.*, and even now, with all the reductions which had taken place, it was more than 1,000,000*l.* As one who had incurred some obloquy by supporting measures for equalising the taxation of the two countries, he was entitled to ask for an equal share in the produce of those taxes. They had in the workhouses of Ireland the materials of future armies, and what would fill up the gaps created in the agricultural population. It rested with them to secure that so great a resource shall be made available for the benefit of the entire Empire ; and under these circumstances he trusted they would not refuse the small boon which he now craved at their hands.

MR. BOWYER seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, " That it is expedient that more effectual means should be adopted to improve the Education of Pauper Children in Ireland."

MR. KENNEDY said, he must complain of the inadequate salaries given to the teachers in the national schools. There were in Ireland 5,383 male and female teachers ; the salaries of male teachers varied in amount according to the class in which they were placed, from 11*l.* to 36*l.* a year ; assistant male teachers from 11*l.* to 15*l.* Female teachers received from 8*l.* to 25*l.* a year, or considerably less than the wages earned by a day labourer. In England, in eighteen districts, the salaries of teachers ranged from 60*l.* to 132*l.* One effect was, that for every two teachers who entered the national schools the Government had to educate three. Nearly 40 per cent abandoned the institution the moment they had passed their examination, and came over to England, where they received four times as much as they would have obtained in Ireland. The absence of complaint from the Irish teachers was owing to an order issued by the Board of Education in 1850, that any schoolmaster who should communicate with the newspapers, or in any other shape make a public representation relative to his condition, would be liable to be dismissed from his office. It appeared from the Estimates of last year, that no less a sum than 1,353,000*l.* was voted for the purposes of law and order in Ireland. A large portion of that sum was devoted to the maintenance of the constabulary force. The amount voted for educational purposes was only 193,000*l.*, although it was admitted on all sides that properly educated men were the best police that any country could possess. He trusted the Government would consent, as one means of improving the quality of education in Ireland, as well as an act of justice to a meritorious class of public servants, to raise the salaries of the teachers in the national schools.

MR. HORSMAN said, he agreed with both the hon. Gentlemen who had spoken, that no Motion could have been brought forward of more importance or interest, and more deserving of attention. He should have regretted to have been opposed to two Gentlemen who were both so well entitled to be heard on this question ; but he had not heard one principle stated by either of them in which he did not entirely concur. He regretted with them that so large a portion of the youthful population of Ireland should be in the workhouses, and dependent for their education on the instruction there imparted ; and he deplored the low salaries which were given to the teachers, and in the desire that a sufficient remedy should be found he fully concurred. He could assure hon. Gentlemen that it was a subject which the Government was ready to consider, and in which they felt an interest not less than he did. But let the House look to the position in which Parliament and the country were placed on this question. The system was undoubtedly deficient at first ; but what had made it so ? He had a higher authority than his own for saying, that while the law required the formation of schools in the workhouses, they were rendered inefficient by the want of completeness in the provisions made by the law, which did not provide for a proper system of inspection. The original defect of the law was, that it established schools and teachers, but took no care for anything beyond that ; and in order to effect any good there must be a change in the law, which would give such power to the local guardians as would enable them by their own agency to remedy the defects which were caused by the law as it now stood. It was admitted that there had been a great improvement in the system, which was owing in a great measure to the conduct and character of the guardians themselves. During the period of the famine, and when pauperism and rates were at the highest point, a great deal could not be expected from the poor law guardians ; but since that pressure had been removed they had made very creditable efforts to improve the system of instruction in the workhouses. It appeared by the Report of the Education Commissioners that there had been such an improvement ; and they stated their gratification at finding an augmentation in the number of agricultural schools in the workhouses in the year 1853. There were in that year fifty of these schools, being an increase of twenty-seven on the previous year, and they attributed that increase to the influence of the Poor Law Commissioners, and the exertion of the local guardians, who showed an increased conviction of their importance ; and they expressed their belief that it was not only an improvement on the past, but held out a hope of still greater progress for the future. That improvement had taken place under a very defective law, and that many deficiencies had been somewhat removed was owing to the meritorious efforts of the guardians. Speaking of the Board of National Education, of the Poor Law Commissioners, and the poor law guardians, it might safely be asserted of them that they all seemed to recognise the advantages of industrial teaching among the pauper population, and were combining their efforts for the advancement of that laudable object. His hon. Friend having stated the facts, came to the remedy, and spoke of a Parliamentary grant to be applied in the same manner as was done in England. But there were at present some difficulties in the way in the shape of the want of means for separating the youthful from the adult population in the work-houses, and preventing those evils which must arise from their coming in contact with many of the lowest and most dissolute of the population ; and he should besides say that it would be rather premature to call Parliament to grant funds for carrying out a system like that adopted in England, which was itself still one of experiment only. There was no disposition on the part of the Government to make this a question of pounds, shillings, and pence, if it could be shown that a great national interest was involved, and that what it was desirable should be achieved could be achieved by means of a Parliamentary grant. The test of the expediency of a Parliamentary grant was the attainment of some great national purpose, which could only be achieved by the Government, and which could not be established by any other means ; and that consideration only would justify the calling on the Government for such a grant. That principle had been adopted in the instance of the Board of National Education in Ireland. But care should be taken by the Government not to interfere with objects which could be better carried out by individual and local enterprise ; and he thought that in Ireland, where a new era and a new state of things had arisen, and where every one seemed to be roused and inclined to effect, by their own efforts, improvements of all kinds, it would not be advisable to call on the Government for pecuniary aid, and it would be very unwise for Government to listen to such a proposition. There was one statement of his hon. Friend the Member for Carlow (Mr. J. Ball) which he had heard with pain, and that was, that in many places in Ireland the education of the children had been carried on in a sectarian spirit, and that religious differences between the poor in the workhouses and the local authorities had interfered with the improvements in the education which were to be desired. There were some things which the Government could, and some which they could not do, and this was a matter in which they could effect nothing. But he believed that that spirit of religious antagonism had much abated, and if it did remain, it was only one consequence of a bad system, which must for a time survive the system itself ; and, looking to the happy change which had taken place now in the tone of discussion on Irish questions in that House, he thought he was justified in saying that it was only a reflection of a greater change which had taken place in Ireland, and the beneficial effects of which would be felt hereafter. He felt that with regard to the question of religious differences and industrial education there was a better spirit prevailing among all classes in Ireland, and while that spirit actuated the people of Ireland in the performance of their duties, he felt that the condition and prospects of that country would be much better dealt with without the Government being asked for aid to advance her moral and physical position. He believed that these improvements might be safely left in the hands of the Irish people themselves, and he was certain that industrial education would, among other improvements, be greatly increased. The duty of the Government would be to strengthen any right system which should be adopted, and to remove, as far as they could, all difficulties in its way. So far from regretting that his hon. Friend had brought forward this subject, he was convinced that his doing so would be of great service. It would be painful to him if the matter was pressed to a division, as it might be made untruly to appear that the Government was hostile to the general views of his hon. Friend, and he thought there was no such difference between them as to induce him to go to a division, and he hoped he would be satisfied with the feeling which had been exhibited on the part of every one to do justice to the objects he had in view.

MR. ROCHE said, he must express his dissent from one opinion of his right hon. Friend, namely, that there was no means of separating the youthful paupers from adults, and that the latter were among the most dissolute of the population, for he (Mr. Roche) had himself had experience to the contrary. He also did not wish it to be supposed that the poor law in Ireland was merely an experiment, but he hoped it would be as permanent as the National Board of Education, which had been productive of so much benefit to Ireland. He was sorry to say, that the physical position of the people was below the standard of the education that was open to them; but he did not wish to mix up the question of national education with that of poor law management; when it was admitted by the Government that there was a remedy for many of the evils complained of by bringing up youthful paupers under a system of industrial education, the Government ought not to leave the promotion of that education only to the guardians, and if a grant was applied for for this purpose it ought not to be refused. The guardians ought not in this respect to be substituted for the Government, when the latter had assented to the necessity for a remedy, when it was found that what was asked for that purpose was right in principle.

MR. HORSMAN explained that he did not say that the poor law system in Ireland was an experiment, but that the system of industrial education in workhouses was. Nor did he go to the length of saying that all the adult paupers in workhouses were the most dissolute of the population.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, that while he was gratified at hearing the right hon. Gentleman's statement with reference to the improving prospects of Ireland, there was something not quite satisfactory to Irish Members in his speech, for he admitted that evils did exist, but suggested no remedy. A more unsatisfactory speech, dealing in generalities, and calculated, if possible, to delude Irish Members with "soft sawder," he never listened to. Government should take their share of the expense, and double the salaries of schoolmasters in the workhouses, and so improve that education which was deficient. He (Mr. Fitzgerald) the other day was in an Irish workhouse, where a number of boys were called up, and asked about the Isthmus of Perekop and the Putrid Sea, and other geographical questions, which they were able to answer; but that was not the education it was desirable to promote—it should be a practical system of education that might be useful to them as men. The salaries of workhouse schoolmasters in Ireland were wholly paid out of the poor rate; in England they were partly paid by the Government. As it was an experiment, industrial education should be conducted partly at the Government expense.

MR. O'BRIEN observed, that allusion had been made to the religious element in Ireland, which it was said prevented the proper education of the poor. He would call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the constitution of Irish magistracies in the different counties. At present the magistrates were ex officio guardians, and complaints had been made that they often introduced political and religious feelings into the board, which created those animosities which all men of common sense deplored. He attributed the fact of there being a dissolute pauper population in Ireland to the want of proper hospital accommodation, which had the effect of throwing vagrant paupers into the workhouse, and thus corrupting the inmates; and he thought that in the face of the great privations they had to endure, the Irish people were justified in calling upon the Government to assist them in providing education for pauper children. He trusted that on reconsideration the right hon. Gentleman would see that, at present at least, the system required assistance from the Government.

MR. F. SCULLY considered that as the sum of 35,000*l.* had been granted for the promotion of the education of the poorer classes in England, a grant of a similar character ought to be made for Ireland, especially as the Medical Relief Fund, which in England was defrayed out of the Consolidated Fund, in Ireland was thrown upon the poor rates. By raising the salaries of the teachers, the services of a much more efficient class of men would be secured. A great improvement had taken place in the matter of industrial education in the Irish workhouses within the last few years, but a great deal still remained to be done, for many of the unions had no land attached to them. He suggested that the Commissioners ought to insist upon a portion of land being added to every one of them, so that the paupers might be taught practically the principles of agriculture. If his hon. Friend the Member for Carlow divided he should vote with him; but, if he did not divide, he trusted that the result of the discussion would be to place teachers in the Irish workhouses on precisely the same footing as those in England.

MR. J. BALL said, in answer to the appeal which had been made to him, that he did not wish to press hardly upon his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, who had so lately come into office; but there was a demand of justice in this matter; no reason had been suggested for treating Ireland differently from England and Scotland, and he could not, therefore, withdraw the Motion.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that hon. Members from Ireland ought to pause before they insisted upon being placed on an equality with England in these matters. If the question were to be placed upon the footing of equal justice between the two countries, he should feel it his duty to state how the case really stood. There was paid from the public revenue for the Irish constabulary, 650,000*l.*; assistant barristers, 52,000*l.*; expenses of prosecutions, 32,000*l.*; Crown solicitors, 16,900*l.*; making a total of 750,000*l.* a year. In England there was paid from the public revenue for prosecutions, 250,000*l.*; education in workhouses, 22,000*l.*; half of the medical expenses, 90,000*l.*; making a total of 362,000*l.* to be set against 750,000*l.* for Ireland. [An hon. Member: The county courts.] The salaries of the judges and expenses of these courts were paid out of the fees of the courts, and not from the Consolidated Fund.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that when the Civil Estimates came on he should call attention to the injustice done in Ireland, and show that England received much more of the public money. It should not be forgotten that there was the building of that House of Parliament. (Oh, oh!) Yes, for that expenditure, being derived from the taxes, was partly drawn from Ireland, and all laid out here. The Irish people had now to pay the income tax; and he must say, they paid more money than they received benefit from their connection with this country.

MR. FRENCH hoped the hon. Member for Carlow would not hesitate to press his Motion to a division. Ireland had a right to equality with England, and if her representatives only stood together equal justice they must obtain, whether the noble Lord at the head of the Government wished it or not.

Mr. F. Scully

MR. CROGAN had never heard in that House any observations which in his opinion were more extraordinary than those which had just fallen from the noble Lord opposite. The noble Lord seemed to forget that at the time of the Union it was guaranteed that Ireland should pay only 2-17ths of the taxation of the United Kingdom, and that by the terms of that Act a greater equality ought to be observed between the taxation of the two countries than the figures quoted by the noble Lord manifested.

MR. WILSON said, that the county court judges were not paid out of the Consolidated Fund, but by fees derived from the courts in which they presided.

Question put "That it is expedient that more effectual means should be adopted to improve the Education of Pauper Children in Ireland."

The House divided; Ayes 32, Noes 80: Majority 48.

VACATING OF SEATS IN PARLIAMENT BILL.

MR. WRIGHTSON moved for leave to bring in a Bill to alter and amend the Act 6th of Anne, c. 7, so far as related to the vacating of seats in Parliament on the acceptance of office. This Bill, which consisted of only one clause, had for its object to provide for those cases in which a Minister merely changed the office he held. He did not anticipate that any disposition existed to oppose the Bill in its present stage, and he therefore trusted the House would give him leave to introduce it.

Motion made and Question proposed "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law concerning the vacating of Seats by Members of Parliament."

MR. FRENCH thought, that if the Government considered such a Bill necessary they ought to introduce and to carry it themselves, instead of leaving it to a private Member.

MR. HENLEY would not oppose the bringing in of the Bill, but he reserved to himself the power of opposing it in any future stage. At present he did not see any advantage likely to arise from the Bill, for he thought it a very good thing that a person changing the office he held should go to the country.

MR. WALPOLE recommended the hon. Member to consider how far it was possible that the exclusion of Members who held certain offices should be provided for.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON thought that this subject should be considered in Committee on the Bill.

On Question, agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Wrightson, Mr. Deedes, and Mr. Headlaw.

Bill presented, and read 1st.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES BILL.

Order for Committee read.

MR. POULETT SCROPE said, that as no discussion had taken place on the first and second reading of the Bill, and as there was some remarkable points in it, he wished to know whether any Member of the Government had paid any attention to the Bill. As far as the consolidation of the Statutes relating to Friendly Societies he had no objection to it, though he thought it was hardly necessary, and he could not approve of some of the novelties introduced by this Bill. There was a clause giving a power to appoint an unpaid Commission, which was to advise members of Friendly Societies; but then that advice was to have the force of law, and to override the decisions of the Courts, which was a very extraordinary provision. Many of these societies had made prospective engagements for the payment of annuities, and giving relief in old age, to receive which large payments had been made by members; but when they came to demand the benefits they had paid for, they found that the societies were broken up, and there were no funds to pay the claimants, who, consequently, suffered grievous injury. It was found by experience that few of these societies lasted longer than about thirty years, and that fact was fortified by the opinions of Mr. Neilson, Mr. Scratchley, and Mr. Tidd Pratt, who declared that the duration of these societies was of necessity limited. He (Mr. Scrope) thought, therefore, that they ought not to go before the public with the sanction of the Legislature and the prestige of registration and enrolment, and undertake to make engagements for long terms of years which they could not reach. They ought to be limited by law to a certain term of years, say five years, and to engagements for relief in sickness, and burial money at death. In that opinion he was supported by the authority of Mr. Tidd Pratt.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the Bill was, in the first place, intended to consolidate the law of Friendly Societies, which was a very useful object. Great care had been taken in the preparation of the Bill, and it was not before the House for the first time, but was read a second time last Session, and referred to a Select Committee; and he believed the Bill was now the same as it was when it came out of that Select Committee. There were some of the clauses, especially that relating to the Imperial Commission, which required consideration; but he thought the provisions would be much better discussed in Committee.

MR. BRIGHT said, he had not been in time to present several petitions in favour of the Bill, but he would mention that one of them was signed by 1,700 respectable heads of families, and others connected with Friendly Societies in Manchester; and he was authorised to say that all the persons interested in those societies in Manchester were quite satisfied with the Bill.

MR. APSLEY PELLATT said, that he had been in communication with many persons in trade who knew how to take care of themselves, who had considered the clauses of the Bill, and in only one instance had any objection been taken to it.

House in Committee.

Clause 6.

MR. MICHELL said, he considered that this and the two following clauses were objectionable. There was to be a board, the Members of which were not to receive any salary or fee, and would therefore be irresponsible. This board would override the Registrar who had a salary of 1,000*l.* a year. He thought the Registrar should be also an actuary, as they would thereby save the expense of an actuary. He should therefore move that the clause be expunged.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he could not agree to the constitution of this board, unless the hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill would state the alteration to be made in the clause limiting its powers.

MR. SOTHERON said, he proposed to strike out some words which might be considered objectionable. There were between 22,000 and 23,000 of these societies, and it would be very advantageous that there should be some central authority to refer to on questions relating to the alteration of rules, and other questions which continually arose. A large portion of these societies supposed that when they got the registration they had the sanction of the Government to their rules and tables. A greater delusion could not exist. Select Committees had recommended the formation of a board. He thought that two or three years after the board had been constituted, if it were found to work well, the House ought to be asked to make them some payment.

MR. BAINES said, he very much doubted the practicability of securing unpaid Commissioners sufficiently qualified and able to devote their time to the business to be discharged under this Bill. Nor was he quite sure of the urgent necessity for the measure, seeing how admirably the magistrates of this country performed their duties as referees or arbitrators under the Friendly Societies Act. Supposing, however, good Commissioners to be secured, he considered that it would be of the greatest importance to enable parties belonging to these societies to obtain their advice. Still there ought to be no indemnity to persons who acted on their advice, if it turned out to be wrong in law and the acting upon it had injured the property of third parties. The Commissioners themselves could not, of course, be sued; and it would be against the policy of the law to allow a wrong to be committed without a remedy, or to empower parties to dispense with the law. He believed that upon the whole the Bill was a wise and liberal measure, and was capable of being made useful and practicable, and that it would prove very valuable and beneficial.

MR. BARROW said, he objected to the Commission because he disliked the system of centralisation, and he believed the people of this country were becoming of opinion that it was well to leave local matters of detail to local self-government. Moreover, it appeared to him monstrous that any body of Commissioners should have the power, without any discussion in open Court, or any responsibility, to issue misives stopping the proceeding in any matter. He was opposed to the introduction of the dispensing power proposed. He was of opinion that Friendly Societies should be restricted to their proper province—insurance for times of temporary sickness; and should not be allowed to undertake for annuities and provision for old age. Their proper object was the encouragement of habits of frugality, industry, and providence. His great objection, however, was to the setting up any body of men to legislate or to alter the law as to these societies. As a Member of Parliament he conceived he had no right thus to delegate his powers, and remove the responsibility which had been confided in him by those whom he represented. Neither did he see any necessity for the constitution of the commission with a view to the revision or construction of tables superseding the authority of the Registrar of Friendly Societies.

MR. TATTON EGERTON said, that when the proposition for a Commission was first brought before the Committee, his own opinion was adverse to it; and though, after the evidence they received, his views had been much modified, he should recommend his hon. Friend to reconsider the whole subject before the bringing up of the Report.

MR. HENLEY said, the clause now under discussion involved a very serious principle, which should be well considered. In the first place he doubted as to the wisdom of an unpaid Commission. What was the Commission to be appointed to do? The Committee which had sat upon the subject had described the powers proposed to be entrusted to the Commission as very extensive. It was his opinion that it would be best not to agree to these clauses at present. What were the reasons which rendered the appointment of a Commission requisite? He objected to anything having the aspect of a Government sanction to the friendly society tables. It was said that if Mr. Tidd Pratt died no one would know anything of the thousands of friendly societies in the country. There was, however, in the Bill no provision for any species of record of its proceedings. Practically the whole business of the Commission would fall into the hands of the secretary as in the instance of the Ecclesiastical Commission. He disbelieved in the necessity for any such central authority at all, and he hoped the clauses in question would be withdrawn for further consideration.

MR. SOTHERON said, he should assent to this suggestion, and withdraw the clauses that touched on this matter; but there had been great misconception as to the functions of the Commission.

MR. POULETT SCROPE said, he would suggest that another registrar should be associated with Mr. Tidd Pratt.

MR. MICHELL said, he would suggest to the hon. Member (Mr. Sotheron) to propose on the bringing up of the Report the appointment of an official actuary as well as a registrar.

MR. ADDERLEY said, that a more objectionable proposal could not be made. In the first place, if it were adopted the House would fall into the error of giving something very like a Government security; in the second place, it would be difficult to appoint an actuary, seeing that no two actuaries could be found to agree; and, lastly, no actuary could prevent those frauds in the management of these societies, which formed the chief subject of complaint.

Clauses 6, 7, and 8, withdrawn.

Clauses 9, 10, and 11, agreed to.

Clause 12.

MR. BARROW said, he would beg to move that the limit of 50*l.* to the annuities assured be reduced to 30*l.*, and that the limit of the sums paid upon the death of any person be reduced from 200*l.* to 100*l.* In his opinion, persons who insured to the extent of 200*l.* ought to go to the ordinary insurance societies.

MR. SOTHERON said, that in all the Acts previous to the last one the sums had stood at the higher amounts, and although they were reduced by the last Act to 30*l.* and 100*l.*, it was thought better to revert to the original amounts. Persons were allowed to deposit as much as 200*l.* in savings banks, and there was no reason why the same amount should not be insured by means of friendly societies. He would mention some instances of the injurious operation of the late Act. One society in Belfast was made use of by the Presbyterians of the north of Ireland for providing for the widows of their clergy; and they found that the limit imposed by the late Act had the effect of almost neutralising their operations. By extending the amount of allowance as now proposed, this and other societies would be able to go on.

MR. BRIGHT said, he agreed with the promoter of the Bill, thinking it an advantage that these societies should not be confined exclusively to the working classes. He admitted the occasional failures of these societies, but the benefits he considered far outweighed the dangers.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to; as were Clause 13 to 19 inclusive.

Clause 20, in answer to Mr. WICKHAM,

MR. SOTHERON said, the object of this clause was to allow societies, instead of going to a public house, or hiring a place for their meetings, to possess a building for themselves, and, if they could not get one ready made, that they might erect one for themselves. He did not think it desirable to allow these societies to hold land for other purposes, or to invest their money in real property.

Clause agreed to; as were also Clauses 21 to 35 inclusive.

Clause 36 struck out.

Clauses 37, 38, and 39 agreed to.

Clause 40,

MR. HENLEY said, he would suggest an alteration of the clause. As the clause stood the person who committed a fraud would be able to compromise his crime by a double payment, and perhaps something in addition. There could be no greater offence than that of a person cheating a society by fraudulently representing himself as a nominee or executor, and he should not have it in his power to compromise that offence by a money payment.

MR. BAINES said, he thought it would be desirable to have the money that was fraudulently obtained from the society returned. At the same time the criminal offence should be punished more severely. The clause was important, and he would suggest to his hon. Friend to consider the clause with a view of framing it anew.

MR. BONHAM-CARTER said, that the Committee followed the precedent of former Acts in framing the clause.

Clause withdrawn.

Clauses 41 to 43 inclusive were agreed to.

Clause 44 struck out.

Remaining Clause and the Schedule were then agreed to, and the House resumed.

SUPPLY—MEDICAL ARRANGEMENTS IN THE CRIMEA.

The Report of the Committee of Supply having been brought up by Mr. BOUVERIE,

MR. A. STAFFORD said, he had given notice that on bringing up the Report he would call attention to the medical arrangements for the sick and wounded in the Crimea, with the view of eliciting from the Government some explanation of those arrangements, which ought by this time to have assumed a definite form. He was not aware, however, whether there was any Member of the Government present who could afford any explanation on this subject, and he would, therefore, suggest that the Report of Supply be postponed to some future day, when he might have an opportunity of putting to the hon. Under Secretary for War the questions of which he had given him notice. This was the last occasion they would have for discussing subjects of this nature before they completed the system of Votes which had placed in the hands of the Government nearly 40,000,000*l.* for the public service in connection with the war; and, considering the state of opinion out of doors, the mode in which the funds hitherto voted by Parliament had been administered, and the condition of some of the public offices, the organisation of which was in a transition state, he conceived that, before receiving the Report of the Committee of Supply, some explanation should be afforded by the Government on the subjects to which he had called their attention. He regretted that the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War, to whom he had given a double notice of the questions he intended to put, was not in his place to answer them.

MR. WILSON said, it was a matter of some consequence that the Report of the Committee of Supply should be received, in order that the Government might be enabled to complete their financial arrangements, and he would suggest that the hon. Gentleman should postpone his questions until Friday, when he would have an opportunity of putting them early in the evening, on the Motion for the adjournment of the House.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL—who had just entered the House—said, he had been in attendance from an early period of the sitting, and was quite prepared to answer the questions of which the hon. Gentleman had given him notice; but, as it was now near six o'clock, he thought the most convenient course would be for the hon. Gentleman to postpone his questions till Friday.

MR. A. STAFFORD said, he would adopt the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman.

The House adjourned at ten minutes before Six o'clock.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE BILL.

Lord BROUGHAM said, that, although he had considered it necessary a week or ten days ago to bring in a Bill on the subject of the Administration of Criminal Justice, there was so little difference between that Bill and the Bill of his noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor) that it was not his intention to press his own Bill, if his noble and learned Friend's Bill should be well received in the other House. He wished to suggest to his noble and learned Friend the propriety of giving the magistrates a greater discretion in some cases, so far as related to the acceptance of bail or the liberation of prisoners on their own recognisance. A case had recently come before Mr. Baron Alderson which strongly evinced the want of some power on the part of magistrates to discharge persons on bail charged with a certain class of criminal offences. A woman committed upon a charge of manslaughter remained in prison during seven months, including the whole of the winter, and when the assizes arrived the grand jury ignored the Bill against her. If the magistrates had had a discretionary power to allow her to go out on bail, or upon her own recognisance, this frightful injustice would not have been committed. In another case, a child twelve years old had been exposed to the contamination of a gaol for three months, having been committed to prison with her father, charged with a crime of which she could not possibly have been guilty—that of causing the death of her mother by starvation.

The noble and learned Lord concluded by moving for a return of persons committed for trial and out on bail at the Central Criminal Court in 1854, and Middlesex Sessions in the same year, with the result in each case, distinguishing those in which there was a conviction, those in which there was no Bill preferred, those in which there was no true Bill returned, and those in which the persons committed did not appear in discharge of their bail.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that he proposed to add two clauses to the Bill, enabling the magistrates either to commit for trial or to take bail if, in their opinion, the circumstances should justify them in so doing, or to let parties out on their own recognisances.

Return ordered to be laid before the House.

MUTINY BILL—COMMISSIONS IN THE ARMY—QUESTION.

Order of the day for the third reading read.

Moved—That the Bill be now read 3<sup>a</sup>.

EARL GREY: I wish to ask my noble Friend the Secretary for War, or the noble Viscount at the head of the army, upon what principle it is that, since the augmentation of the army, commissions in the army have been granted some with and some without purchase? Your Lordships are probably aware that hitherto the granting of commissions without purchase has been quite exceptional. So small a number of them have been at the disposal of the Commander in Chief that, practically, commissions without purchase have been, I believe, granted only either to the sons of officers who have distinguished themselves in service, or to officers who have passed with distinction through the Military College at Sandhurst. The number of commissions which could be granted without purchase has hitherto been hardly sufficient to meet these two classes of cases; but, in consequence of the recent augmentation of the army, rendered necessary by the war, the number of first commissions to be disposed of has been largely increased, and I find that considerable dissatisfaction has been created among various persons under the belief that different people have been differently treated. Thus, one man has been called upon to pay for the first commission which has been granted to his son, while another man who has no closer connection with the army, nor any greater claim than the first, has obtained a commission without purchase. It appears to me most desirable that the country should understand upon what principle these first commissions are to be given with or without purchase. I am not one of those who believe that it would be safe hastily to abolish the system of purchase. Although I should never have recommended its establishment, I think great consideration is necessary before its abolition; and, on the other hand, I am equally certain that a system of that kind cannot be maintained unless there is in the public mind a perfect confidence that its application is fairly and impartially carried out. I therefore wish to ask the noble Lord upon what principle it is that the persons who have come into the army since the commencement of the war have obtained new commissions, some with and some without purchase?

LORD PANMURE: My Lords, my attention having been called the day before yesterday to the question put by my noble Friend, I will give him the best answer that I can to it. I have inquired upon what principle first, commissions are given; and I find that they have been granted without purchase, first of all, to those who have distinguished themselves at the Military College at Sandhurst, and who by passing the highest examination have entitled themselves to the reward to which they aspired. The next class of individuals which has the second claim to commissions without purchase, consists of the sons of those officers of Her Majesty's army or navy who have distinguished themselves in the service of their country, and thereby deserved the indulgence of a first commission without purchase. I am informed that the Commander in Chief recognises, in the next place, the claims of a third class of applicants—namely, the sons of poor and deserving officers generally, of clergymen with large families who have claims upon the public of this country for the manner in which they have discharged their duties, and of individuals whose claims I am sure would be recognised by this House as entitled to such a boon. It is true that these three classes, in consequence of the great demand for officers caused by the war, have been entirely exhausted, and a great many commissions have been given to gentlemen whose names have been long upon the list of applicants, and, in order to meet the demand, the age at which officers may enter the service has even been extended from eighteen to twenty-two years, and officers may now enter the service up to that age. I have endeavoured, but I have certainly failed, to discover that any commission has been granted in a manner which would lead me to suppose that it had been given unfairly or without due consideration, or with any partiality for one class of individuals over another, by my noble and gallant Friend who has the recommendation of persons to these appointments. I am satisfied that, in reference to promotions in the Guards, one half of those promotions has been distributed by my noble and gallant Friend among meritorious officers of the line, and that the other half of the promotions has been so distributed by my noble Friend with a care which will, I am sure, upon examination, reflect great credit upon him. I may mention, in reference to this question, that my noble and gallant Friend delayed making some of the appointments for a considerable time, until he had received reports from the Crimea of those persons who were most worthy of the great step of promotion from the line into the Guards. One of the young gentlemen so promoted, Lieutenant Gordon, of the 38th regiment, had a vacancy kept open for him for a considerable period, as the services which he had rendered in the trenches in resisting a sortie, and retaining his position until he was relieved by a portion of the 50th regiment, were such as, in my noble and gallant Friend's opinion, gave him a claim to the step. I believe my noble Friend incurred some little odium for that appointment, from its being supposed that this officer was a relation of my noble Friend below me (the Earl of Aberdeen), a supposition which I am able, of course, fully to contradict. And I may add, that the gentleman's conduct has fully justified my noble and gallant Friend in giving him the step. This is the statement which I have to make in answer to my noble Friend; and I will only add that I am as alive as he can be to the fact that there ought to be no favour, no partiality, no affection in carrying out the system of promotion, but that one general principle ought to be acted upon; and I am sure that my noble Friend at the head of the army will be guided by that principle.

EARL GREY: Nothing was further from my intention than to impute to my noble and gallant Friend commanding the army, that he had shown any such favour or partiality as that to which the noble Lord has alluded. I did not at all advert to the point of promotion in the army. What I did advert to was the question of first commissions, and I think that the statement just made by the Secretary for War, proves that the evil of which I complain does exist; because, after exhausting the two first classes, it appears that there has been a considerable number of commissions which have been given without purchase to those who have no particular claims, and I want to point out to my noble Friend, that, if at the same moment commissions are given to two persons who have equal claims, and that for one the sum of 450*l.* is paid and the other given without purchase, it is impossible that dissatisfaction should not arise. I think that the right way to meet this would have been to reduce the prices of all commissions, so that all might have obtained them on equal terms; that is, supposing there were two commissions to be given, for one of which 450*l.* was to be paid and the other was to be given without purchase, then I think 225*l.* ought to be paid for each commission, so that persons coming with equal claims might find equal treatment. I have only mentioned this subject because I find that much dissatisfaction existed as to these first commissions, as an idea prevails that some claimants have received different treatment from that experienced by others.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE: It is true that a certain number of commissions have been granted, to some claimants with and to others without purchase, and there would have been a great inequality in the respective numbers had it not been that there were a great many persons on the list of applicants for the purchase of commissions at the amount stated by the noble Earl—450*l.* But the noble Earl, having been Secretary at War, is aware that there is another consideration mixed up with this subject; he knows that great care must be taken to reduce the half-pay list as much as possible; therefore an injunction was laid on the Commander in Chief that a certain number of commissions should be sold at the regulation price, and the proceeds given to the Secretary at War, to form a fund out of which he was to reduce the half-pay list. There were many officers not well able to serve, and who were a dead weight on the half-pay list, and in consequence of the direction I have mentioned, the sums received in payment from persons purchasing commissions have been paid to the Secretary at War to be applied in mitigation of the half-pay list. This matter has been so thoroughly looked into that I now believe that there is not a captain or a lieutenant on the half-pay list capable of service; and, in consequence of the arrangements which have been made, the half-pay list has been very much reduced. It would, of course, have been more agreeable to me not to have to call upon gentlemen to pay for their commissions; but those called upon were taken from the list of those who had applied to purchase commissions, and the order having been issued that a certain number should be sold, as a necessary consequence that order was obeyed by the Commander in Chief.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH : Before this bill passes, I wish to put a question to the noble Earl with reference to the reports that are current as to the withdrawal of troops from India. According to the army estimates, provisions are made for twenty-four regiments of infantry and four of cavalry serving in India. Of these, eighteen regiments of infantry are in India, provision having been made for withdrawing six regiments of infantry, which I believe are now on their way. Of the four cavalry regiments, I see one has been withdrawn and is passing through Egypt; and I understand that the 12th Lancers have received orders to depart from Bangalore for embarkation for the Crimea. I believe the four regiments specified are to be withdrawn, so that the total number of infantry and cavalry in India will not correspond with the number voted by the House of Commons. This is a subject on which I should feel great apprehension if it is intended to reduce the European force both in cavalry and infantry in India. I wish to ascertain whether these reports be correct, for it is stated that not less than 10,000 Europeans are to be withdrawn from India. I must say that I believe the number to be greatly exaggerated; at the same time I think the number to be withdrawn is very large. I see also that it is stated that volunteering is allowed from the regiments that are to serve in India into regiments proceeding to the Crimea. If this be so, not only will the army serving in India be reduced below the ordinary establishment, but likewise those regiments now there will be deprived of the recruits sent out to them every year.

LORD PANMURE : With reference to the troops withdrawn from India, I can only say that orders have been given to withdraw the 10th Light Dragoons and the 12th Lancers from India. The 10th Light Dragoons are now at Cairo, and the Vice-roy of Egypt has extended his hospitality to the whole regiment in a manner worthy of an Eastern prince. With regard to the 12th Lancers, they have not yet arrived at their destination, but I hope they will soon be available for service in the Crimea. I can assure the noble Earl that, as to the propositions made for reducing the army in India, great caution has been and will be observed in this respect, and that they will not be withdrawn without the most careful consideration.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS BILL.

LORD BROUGHAM moved the second reading of this Bill, which he said had come up from the House of Commons, and had for its object the abolition of the jurisdiction of these courts in certain cases, such as that which had occurred recently, where a poor woman charged with defamation of which she said she had not been guilty, but being proceeded against in the Ecclesiastical Court, and being too poor to employ a proctor, was advised to plead guilty, whereupon she was condemned in the costs, and committed to gaol for non-payment, without hope of release. Although he approved generally of the measure, he thought the second clause, which had a retrospective effect, was somewhat objectionable, and suggested that it should be amended in committee.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER said, that there were some considerations which he would thereafter present to the noble and learned Lord with respect to the offence of brawling in a church, which offence was so decidedly ecclesiastical in its nature, that he thought it should be dealt with by ecclesiastical tribunals.

Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

THE MILITIA.

THE EARL OF MELMESBURY rose to call their Lordships' attention and that of the Government to the subject of the militia lately embodied in this country, and said that the question derived peculiar importance from the fact that the recruiting of that force had, unfortunately, been brought to an almost total standstill. That impulse under which, at the original formation of the militia, large masses of people in all parts of the country had nobly come forward to join its ranks had now died away. The causes which had led to such an unhappy revulsion of public feeling in regard to this constitutional force he would presently endeavour to trace. He assumed that the noble Lord at the head of the War Department would answer him, because when, the other day, he gave notice of his intention to put some questions to the Government, the noble Lord kindly offered to afford him any information that he desired if he would only apply to his office for it; and certainly, if the points to which he was now about to allude only concerned his own regiment of militia, or affected his own county exclusively, it might be sufficient for him to avail himself of the noble Lord's courtesy by calling at his department, and then to repeat to the parties interested the answers he obtained at the Government offices. His present questions, however, related to the whole militia force of the country, and to a subject which had been very generally misunderstood by the officers of regiments, the magistrates of counties, and persons who had enlisted or were likely to enlist; and, therefore, he thought it his duty to put the question publicly to the responsible Minister, in order that they might receive a public answer. Now, he thought that the cessation of that spirit which had led the people to enlist in the militia was ascribable, in the first place, to an apparent—if not a real—breach of faith on the part of the Government towards the men who had enrolled themselves. Their Lordships were aware that the Militia Bill of 1852 first raised the force on the understanding that the men would only be required to serve for twenty-eight days, unless in case of an invasion. In 1854, war having been declared in an unexpected quarter, a new Bill was necessary, by which the militia were called out and embodied. The men so embodied received a larger amount of bounty than those who enlisted under the Act of 1852, and justly so, because a greater demand was made upon them; but it was never sufficiently explained to the men of 1852 that they would be liable to be embodied permanently or for a service of five years; and the consequence was that many married men, who would not have joined a permanent force, but did not object to serve in one that would be called out for a month, found themselves entrapped—as they considered it—into liabilities which they had had no intention whatever of incurring when they first enlisted. This had produced a very unfavourable effect upon the minds of those men who went out, as well as upon the minds of their relations at home. It had also had the effect of throwing a great number of wives and children upon the parishes for their maintenance, which would not have been the case had the head of the family been taken away for only a month's training. The men not only thought themselves unfairly dealt with, but the ratepayers, influential farmers, and others, to exempt themselves from the burdens thus cast upon them, had been led to exert themselves to check enlistment, and especially that of married men. Again, many country gentlemen and others who had encouraged enlistment under the Bill of 1852 were seized with apprehension at the anomaly and injustice created under the second measure; but their alarm was allayed by the result of the debate which took place in their Lordships' House in the month of May, 1854, in the course of which the noble Duke then at the head of the War Department (the Duke of Newcastle) stated that the Government, in consideration of the apparent injustice he had now described, meant to deal very indulgently towards the men of 1852, and that the married men should be relieved after a month's service and allowed to return home. He would read to the House a few extracts from the speeches made on the occasion in question. The discussion was commenced by a noble Earl opposite (Earl Grey), who quoted a letter which he had received from a militia colonel, remonstrating against the injustice done to these militiamen, and stating that—

"The country came forward very handsomely upon the appeal made to it, and now, while they believed themselves to be secure of being called out only under certain circumstances and at 3*s.* a day, they are now exposed to be called out to service for a longer period than they had ever intended for only 1*s.* a day."—[3 Hansard, cxxxiii. 313.]

The noble Duke the War Minister then replied, observing—

"It will not be necessary in some instances to embody whole regiments; and in that case leave of absence will be given to those who cannot, from their vocations, come forward, and those only will be selected who may be disposed to attend, so that no serious inconvenience, if any at all, will be felt."—[Ibid. 314.]

It did not appear whether the noble Duke spoke, in this passage, of whole regiments, or only of individuals; but the doubt was cleared up by the subsequent part of the discussion. His noble Friend (the Earl of Derby), remarking on what had fallen from the War Minister, said—

"If he understood aright, although the noble Duke did not lay down the principle that persons who were unwilling to serve under the terms of the new Act should be absolutely free to do so or not, as they chose, yet the Government intended in the first instance only to select for embodiment those regiments which, as a body, were desirous of acceding to these conditions, and in whose case,

therefore, the further embodiment would be equivalent to a voluntary act. Then, again, he understood that in the regiments thus selected—each consisting, perhaps, of 900 or 1,000 men—if 500 or 600 were willing to serve when called upon under the new measure, it was proposed to give the remaining section an opportunity of being released from attendance. If that pledge were specifically given to the country no injustice would be done, and in that case he should entirely approve the course that was to be pursued. He hoped the noble Duke would further confirm what he had been understood to state already, and say that he (the Earl of Derby) had not misinterpreted what were the present intentions of the Government."—[Ibid. 315.]

In answer to this appeal, the noble Duke (the Duke of Newcastle) responded—

"You have not in any respect misinterpreted what I said. The only difference is that you stated it more fully and clearly than I did myself."—[Ibid. 315.]

These assurances relieved the minds of those who felt, after what had occurred, that their honour had been almost compromised by inducing the men to enlist. Practically, however, the promised indulgence had not been shown to the men. He could maintain this assertion by adducing particular instances to prove it, and although he would not mention names in that House, he was ready to furnish them confidentially to the noble Lord the War Minister, if he wished to know them. One landed proprietor of some influence took great pains to raise recruits for the militia force under the Act of 1852, and succeeded in inducing a considerable number in his own district and on his own property to enlist. When, however, the militia of his county were embodied under the Act of 1854, and called out for permanent service, finding that the men had to undergo a considerably longer period of drill than the twenty-eight days to which they were fairly liable, this gentleman applied to the lord lieutenant of the county for leave of absence for one of these men, who had been receiving very high wages. The application was refused, and, in fact, leave had been constantly denied to men to whom the Government had certainly pledged themselves to give it. [Lord PANMURE inquired the date of the refusal.] It was in September last. Since then his (the Earl of Malmesbury's) notice had been attracted by a correspondence which had appeared in a Herefordshire paper, purporting to have taken place between the Lord Lieutenant of Hereford (Lord Bateman) and the present Premier, who was then Home Secretary. The Lord Lieutenant's letter to the noble Lord was to the effect that it was extremely desirable that the wives and children of married men who had been enlisted in the militia should be supported during the absence of their husbands with their regiments by other means than the local rates; and the reply of the noble Viscount was, that an order would be given that the married men belonging to the regiments in question should be sent home. Certainly, however, with respect to his own county he had heard of no such order having been given as yet. He would, therefore, ask the noble Lord opposite whether such an order had been, or would be, given; and, if given, to what extent it was intended to be carried? He would also ask whether it was the intention of the Government to provide some other more public fund for the maintenance of the wives and children of married men serving in the militia, inasmuch as the fact of their being at present dependent upon the rates of small localities had been found to produce a great discouragement to recruiting for the militia?

LORD PANMURE said, he must explain what took place between himself and the noble Earl on the occasion to which he referred. When the noble Earl gave notice of these questions, he (Lord Panmure) said that if the noble Earl or any other noble Lord simply wished for information on any particular points, it would be the best for them to apply to him privately at the War Office, and he would give them all the information in his power; but if, on the other hand, there was anything in the question the noble Earl wished to put which would make it more advisable to put it publicly in Parliament, it would be best and most proper to take the course which he had just taken. With reference to the questions, he hardly thought that the noble Earl could be in possession of a circular which was issued from the War Office in November, 1854; otherwise he imagined that this circular, which was addressed to the commanding officers of militia regiments, and was lithographed throughout, would have rendered his question unnecessary. He was sorry that any impression should have gone forth, that a breach of faith had been committed with those who had engaged to serve in the militia; for he was quite certain that no Government would ever be mad enough to commit a breach of faith, or approach to a commitment of any such thing as a breach of faith, with those who had enrolled themselves in the militia. When the Militia Bill of 1852 was passed, it referred to a very different state of affairs to the present, an embodiment of twenty-eight days for training was alone contemplated, and the enforcement of continuous service was only to be in case of an invasion. But when the declaration of war, in 1854, rendered necessary the Act for the permanent embodiment of the militia, no doubt the men who originally engaged simply for training and exercise were embodied for actual service. But he could not admit that these men had been entrapped into continuous service, for in November, 1854, by the circular to which he had referred, and which he held in his hand, the attention of the commanding officers of all militia regiments was called to the case of these men, and they were directed, when the embodiment took place, to call only on such men as had no claim for exemption through age, employment, or domestic circumstances, &c.; and with respect to the men whom they did not think it advisable to call out, they were directed to report their opinion as to the expediency of granting discharges. There certainly had been no intention on the part of the Government to break faith with these men, for when a regiment was embodied, and it was found that there were men in it whose families would suffer by their absence, and become a burden to the locality, thus throwing the militia service into disrepute, the colonel was empowered to allow such men to return to their homes on the repayment of their enrolment money, and in certain cases, where it should appear that they were entirely unable to make such repayment, to remit it and grant a full and complete discharge. If any blame attached to any one, therefore, it would be to the commanding officers of the regiments, and not upon Government. He thought that he had shown that it was the practice of the last as well as the present Government, in fact, that it had been the constant practice of the War Office, to give these men their discharge, first on the condition that they returned the enrolment money, and if they were unable to do that, to give them their free discharge.

LORD BATEMAN said, that neither he nor his noble Friend near him (the Earl of Malmesbury) had any knowledge of the circular to which the noble Lord had referred, but whether this arose from any mistake in the transmission of it he was unable to say. He certainly had received a document, bearing date January 31, 1855, referring to the same subject, but not in the same terms. As reference had been made to his correspondence with the Secretary of State, he might be allowed to say that the Herefordshire Militia had certainly no reason to complain; they had been treated most handsomely by the Home Office, Lord Palmerston having allowed the colonels to exercise a discretion in sending the married men home. In consequence of that, he applied to the colonel of the regiment, by whom he was informed that a considerable number of men in the Herefordshire Militia were married, and that it would be exceedingly inconvenient at once to carry out the instructions relative to the discharge of the married men, but that he would state, in course of time, the steps that might be taken. The colonel accordingly wrote, as he (Lord Bateman) supposed, to the War Office, and received a reply, to the effect that on his returning the names of the men he wished to be discharged, the Secretary for War would take into consideration the propriety of discharging them on the repayment of the enrolment money, amounting to 18s. 6d.; and that if they could not repay that sum, such men as the colonel recommended might be discharged free. Therefore he repeated that, so far as the Herefordshire Militia was concerned, he had no reason to complain. Since the receipt of the letter he had just adverted to, twenty-eight married men had been discharged, and forty-two married men at the present moment remained in the regiment, either in consequence of certain difficulties between the colonel and themselves, or, perhaps, because they were not able to find the necessary 18s. 6d., or were not desirous to accept a discharge. He was bound, however, to say that the colonel had informed him that he had made it a point only to discharge such married men as could prove that they had two children born in wedlock. Now, he must say that, if every man in the militia were refused his discharge unless he had two children born in wedlock, it was a very hard case for the militiamen. So far as the Herefordshire Militia was concerned, he believed steps had been taken to mitigate the evil as regarded married men; but if out of every regiment, consisting of 500 men, the services of 100 men were to be lost because they were married, very great difficulty would be felt in replacing them. He wished, therefore, to know whether the rule applied to every regiment, or whether it was an exceptional case, in favour of the Herefordshire regiment, and whether a return could be produced of the number of applicants in the militia for leave to return home, and of those who had had their discharge granted to them?

LORD PANMURE said, he could hardly give a return of the number of applicants for discharge, though he might be able to give the number actually discharged.

After a few words from the Marquess of SALISBURY, which were not heard,

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, that if every married militiaman might obtain his discharge with or without payment, according to circumstances, he apprehended the number of transactions between the War Department and married men with two children would become rather numerous and extensive, inasmuch as there could be no more convenient boon than the receipt of 18s. 6d. without the discharge of any duty. It appeared to him that there were two classes of militiamen—those enlisted before the 12th of May, 1854, and those enlisted subsequently to that date. The first class were liable to be ordered out on a service, first of all, of twenty-one days; and if Her Majesty should be pleased to issue an Order in Council, which She might do on any emergency arising, then they were liable to service for fifty-six days. Those enlisted subsequently to the 12th May were liable to be permanently embodied for five years. He understood it to be conceded that no man enlisted before the 12th of May should be compelled against his will to serve for that period or for more than fifty-six days;—but he thought the Government would act very unwisely and imprudently if they did not require of this class of militiamen that they should serve for the whole amount of the period for which they had engaged when they enlisted. He could not imagine why they should not perform not only the twenty-one days' duty, but why, under the special circumstances of the case, the Government should not issue an Order in Council and require them to perform fifty-six days' duty. If they trained a man during fifty-six days, not only was he a more valuable subject, but there was a greater chance of his volunteering into the army and of his remaining there. Therefore he hoped nothing would induce Government to depart from the strict letter of the law, which gave them a power to demand of those who had enlisted prior to the 12th

May a service of fifty-six days during the year, under an Order in Council. Such an order should be issued at once, for without it there was no such power. He wished now again to do what he had already done more than once—namely, to press upon the Government the necessity that existed for making some great exertion for the purpose of raising the militia to the full extent of its establishment. The militia at the present moment was only 44,000 strong; the establishment was 136,000; so that it was 92,000 under its complement. At the same time in the Army Estimates a Vote had been taken for 60,000 recruits to the regular army, and at the same time an allowance must be made for the casualties of the year, amounting to 30,000 more; so that not fewer than 182,000 men were required to raise the regular army and the militia to their complements. Nay more—they required 6,000 or 7,000 artillermen to raise that branch to its full complement. Their demand, therefore, was for nearly 200,000 men; and he really trusted the Government would look seriously at the position in which the country was placed, deficient to that extent in the force which it was thought necessary to have for the purpose of carrying on the war with success.

EARL GREY said, he was extremely glad the noble Earl had brought this subject before the House, for it was one of very great importance. He had not the slightest doubt the noble Earl was right in saying that the present state of things had materially interfered with the recruiting for the militia. He had heard with the greatest regret that a noble Marquess, himself a Lord Lieutenant of a county and a colonel of militia, had stated there would be no breach of faith in calling upon men enlisted under an Act of Parliament which distinctly provided they should be permanently embodied only in the case of invasion, or similar imminent peril to the country—that there would be no breach of faith in calling upon such men to serve beyond the time they engaged for. In his own opinion, there could be no more flagrant breach of faith; and whether the fault rested with the Government or with the colonels of the militia regiments who might agree with the noble Marquess, of this he was quite certain, that, practically, men enlisted under the Act of 1852 had not been aware that they were entitled to demand leave of absence or discharge whenever they had fulfilled the period of service of twenty-one days for which they had engaged themselves. He hoped the present discussion would make it generally known throughout the country that such men, whether married or not, or whether he had children or not, or who thought he could earn higher wages in some other employment than the public service, and who had enlisted under the terms of an Act of Parliament, had a right, which no colonel of militia and no Government could set aside—an express right to demand to have leave of absence after the expiry of the time he stipulated to serve. But when that became known, another inconvenience would arise—a very large proportion of the militiamen would walk off. No doubt that would be a great inconvenience: and what was more, it would be impossible to fill up their places, for no man in his senses would engage to serve five years in the militia, and perform the very same service as that of the regular army, except that of actually being in the face of the enemy, without any eventual claim to pension, when he could find higher bounty, and much more advantageous terms altogether, by engaging to perform that service in the line. To be sure, he would not in the militia have to face the enemy, but he was sure the chance of facing the enemy was no discouragement to men entering the service—on the contrary, it would act with many men rather as an inducement to engage in the army. He thought that all this only showed the extreme impolicy of departing from the original scheme of the militia. The militia was intended to be a reserve force, composed of that description of men who could not consistently with their private avocations enter into the permanent service of the country, and who were not to be permanently embodied; but when they came to keep the militia permanently embodied, that class of men was excluded, and they were forced to fall back upon men who must enter on the service as a profession. But then the consequence must be, that recruiting for the militia must, under those circumstances, interfere with recruiting for the army; and he had seen many officers who had assured him that it was so interfering. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Ellenborough) had just told them that men were wanted both for the army and for the militia. That ought to affect the Government most seriously, and he would recommend them to return to the original principle of a militia. Let them just look at the inconvenience of the present state of things. There were only 44,000 embodied of an establishment of 136,000; but how many officers were there? If he was not mistaken, the country was at this very moment paying for an establishment of militia officers for very nearly the whole army of 136,000. The militia was rendering very little service in return for the enormous sum of money it was costing the country, and it was interfering decidedly with the recruiting for the regular army and causing other inconveniences. Country gentlemen were unwilling to allow their sons to enter it as officers; a different class of men was therefore being brought in; it was interfering with labour to a considerable extent, and agriculturists looked upon it with an evil eye. The departure from the original plan was, in short, bad in every respect. He should put it to the Government, whether they thought that the militia officers ought to be converted into mere drill sergeants for the army? It was the intention of the Act of 1852, that a distinction between the regular army and the militia should be maintained. He was still of opinion that the original Act was a mistake—it was not the right way to make a force, but it was, at all events, a clear and intelligible policy. The Government had departed from that policy, and had not adopted any other; their militia was neither the one thing nor the other; it was neither the militia of 1852, nor was it a force founded on any other plain and rational principle. He did hope, therefore, that the subject would be seriously considered by Her Majesty's Government, and that they would not allow the arrangements connected with the militia force to remain in their present state of confusion.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he could not say that he was satisfied with the reply of the noble Lord opposite, with respect to the breach of faith which appeared to have been committed. How could the course taken by the Government be anything else than a breach of faith, after the positive declaration of the late Secretary of War in that House, which he had had the honour to read to their Lordships? He hoped the noble Lord would state before he left the House that he was ready to adopt the principle so well recommended by the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough) who had left the House, that they would, by some general and comprehensive order, restrict the services required of the men who had enlisted under the Act of 1852, to the liabilities imposed upon them by that Act, and that while they obliged the militiamen who had been so enlisted to serve for the full period of fifty-six days, they would, after that period of service, release them from duty. With respect to the question of married men, the noble Lord had completely forgotten to answer him. He wished to know whether Government intended to relieve the wives and children of married militiamen from any other fund than that created by the parochial rates? With reference to the circular which had been issued to the colonels of militia regiments in November, he believed that there was nothing in it to lead a commanding officer to suppose that it amounted to an order from the War Office for the discharge of the married men. A more obscure circular he had never read. He understood it to mean that men who were unfit to remain in the service, for certain reasons of which the colonel alone was to judge—these men were to be released from duty, and outstanding men, who had not yet joined, were then to join; and an indirect proof that it was so understood by the Home Office was, that in replying to the observations of my noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant of Herefordshire (Lord Bateman), the noble Lord gave my noble Friend permission to discharge such men.

LORD PANMURE: This question has taken a much wider range than I at first anticipated. In my opinion, the speeches of the noble Earl opposite and my noble Friend below me, will raise a very grave question throughout this country—a question which would be of the gravest importance for any Government; for I think that a sort of general notice has been given this night to all the militia of the United Empire, of which many will be too ready to avail themselves and which may occasion great difficulties to the country in its present exigency. I do not hold myself in any way responsible for the consequence of these statements; it shall be my endeavour so to administer the law as to obtain the services of as many of Her Majesty's subjects, either voluntarily or under the law, as the exigencies of the State may require. With reference to the question of the noble Earl, it resolves itself into this. In the year 1854, in the month of November, a circular, which in my opinion would have given clear light to any colonel of militia who chose to read it, was issued from the office of the Secretary at War, and addressed, not to the private residences either of the lords lieutenant of counties, or of colonels of militia, but to the orderlies of the militia regiments, or to the clerks of lieutenancy in the various counties. In my mind the last paragraph but one of that circular, points out in distinct terms that if there be any reason why, in the opinion of the colonel, a man ought to be released from service in his regiment of militia, either upon repayment of the enrolment money or without such repayment, upon the recommendation of the colonel that man would receive his discharge. Now that exigency did arise in the case of married men who had enlisted as burdens upon the parishes, and who, having become embodied for five years, stood in the position of soldiers of the line in that respect, and were not bound to maintain their families further than they could afford to do out of their pay. To those individuals it was, and is now, the practice to give discharges, that they may return to their families upon a free discharge (if they cannot pay the enrolment money); for it is better not to have a man at all, than to have him with his wife and children burdens upon the locality—a thing which would render the militia service extremely unpopular. It is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take any other steps with reference to the wives and families of married militiamen further than to discharge the men from a position in which they make their wives and families a burden upon the parishes. If such men are not discharged, it rests with the colonel who did not recommend the discharge to accept the responsibility of imposing those liabilities upon the parishes; and I trust that one issue of this debate will be to acquaint the colonels of militia fully with the power they have in that respect. But I do trust that the other and far more serious and important result of this discussion may not be to reduce the militia of this country, and to impair the existing arrangement, which is one I should be very sorry to see disturbed.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he did not yet distinctly understand whether the discharge of these men was to rest solely and exclusively upon the responsibility of the colonels of the regiments; because, however unpleasant and awkward it might be to raise any question at the present or at any moment which might have the effect of diminishing the numerical amount and efficiency of the militia force, whatever inconvenience might arise in that way would be as nothing compared to the evil resulting from the promulgation of an impression that Government might tamper with the men who had been enrolled in the militia with impunity. Depend upon it no temporary inconvenience and loss could be equal to the permanent injury and loss which would be sustained if it were to be held that engagements entered into with the Government of the country were not to be adhered to and strictly fulfilled. A great mistake had been made in not fulfilling to the letter, as well as in the spirit, the declaration made by the noble Duke the late Secretary of War, at the time of the introduction of the Act of 1854, namely, that at the time the terms of the enrolment of the militia were altered, the period of the service and the character of the service would be altered altogether and that an individual offer would be made to every single man enrolled under the Act of 1852, to say whether he would or would not enter into the new engagements. If that had been done, if every man had had his free option in the matter, to serve or not, as he pleased, under the Act of 1854, those perplexed questions would not have arisen. Government would then have had men submitting voluntarily to the embodiment of the regiments of militia. Although he agreed in a great deal that had fallen from the noble Earl, he differed from him as to the embodiment of large bodies of militia, which he held to be very essential. He would have those regiments embodied for service in this country according to a well understood agreement with the men, whether married or single. If they did enter into that new arrangement with their eyes open, and with a full knowledge of the circumstances, they would have had no cause to complain and no right to withdraw; but he could not subscribe to the doctrine that it was unfortunate to the men to know that they had that right which practically they had, and he, for one, would be no party to concealing from those men the existence of that right. He agreed with his noble Friend near him (the Earl of Malmesbury) that every man in the regiment, enlisted under the Act of 1852, was liable to be called out for a service of twenty-one days without an order in council, and for fifty-six days under an order in council. He agreed with the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough) that such an order in council ought to be issued for the purpose of placing under training the largest number of militia who were to be used as militia, and not as soldiers; but it was not right that men who had enlisted for twenty-one or for fifty-six days training should, by an alteration of an Act of Parliament, be compelled to go into service for five years, or that their being free from that extra duty should depend upon the colonels of regiments, or upon the will of any other man whatever.

LORD PANMURE said, that if he supposed for a moment that the men in the militia had been ignorant of their rights, whatever those rights might be, he should have been the last man to have adopted or advocated any course of policy which would have kept them in that ignorance. But he believed there was no militiamen who did not know that if he chose to break that service, he might do so legally, being subject always to fifty-six days' service under an order in council. When whole regiments of militia volunteered for foreign service, they all appeared to be re-attested. That proved that they were by no means ignorant of what their rights and obligations really were. He thought he had stated pretty clearly that it was not in the option of colonels to discharge men mero motu. He thought he had stated that they must recommend every discharge. They could withhold the necessary recommendation if they pleased, but if they did so they took the responsibility on their own shoulders; but if the colonels recommended the discharge, their recommendations would be complied with if fair grounds were shown for it.

EARL GREY thought it was important that the men should know their rights. So far from agreeing with the noble Lord, he believed that the fact of those who were embodied for foreign service requiring to be re-attested, as no re-attesting was requisite for home service, led the men to the conclusion that they had no right to break that service. The impression was, that the men had no such right without the consent of their colonel. He (Earl Grey) had been assured by the Government on a former occasion, that although they had the legal power of altering a man's engagement, yet that it would not be exercised; that no man should be held to do more than he had agreed to do. The men who were enlisted before 1854 were not aware that there was such a power of discharge. He (Earl Grey) was not aware of it himself; and, indeed, on application to Lord Palmerston, that noble Lord told him, not that the men might be discharged, but that their colonel might give leave of absence to those who claimed it, and he wrote to the lieutenant-colonel of the Northumberland Militia to that effect. But up to that moment he had never heard of this power of discharging them, and the right which the men possessed.

LORD BATEMAN moved for an Address for, Return of the number of Married men in every Regiment of Militia, specifying the number who have received leave to return to their homes, in accordance with the permission granted them by the Secretary of State.

TORQUAY DISTRICT CHURCHES BILL.

Order read for resuming adjourned Debate on Amendment [13th March] proposed to be made to Question, "That the Bill be now read a second time;" and which Amendment was to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR JOHN BULLER said, he considered that it was very desirable that Torquay should have additional church accommodation, which could only be obtained by such a measure as the present. It was a place with a large and increasing population, and some time ago a proprietary chapel and a new church at Upton were erected, for which latter Sir Lawrence Palk gave the site and a stipend of 150*l.* a year for the minister out of the great tithes of the parish. In consequence of the increase of the town, the new districts were at a distance from all the places of worship, the road between them being hilly and difficult of access for invalids, and Sir Lawrence Palk now again gave the land and a similar endowment for another church, as he had done for that at Upton. The only real question was whether further church accommodation was desirable, and as of that there was no question, he hoped the House would agree to the second reading of the Bill.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, his hon. Friend had not answered the objections that had been on a former evening made with respect to this measure. There was no doubt that a church was needed, and the efforts of Sir Lawrence Palk for that purpose were highly laudable; but the real point was, that what was demanded might be effected by the existing law, and that where this Bill differed from the existing law, it did so for the worse, and sought to lay down a precedent which the House ought to guard against. The Bill gave a power to levy Church Rates, and also to mortgage the pew-rents in the first instance for the expenses of the Bill, and then for repairs, and the charge of the officers of the church, leaving the stipend the last charge, whereas it was usually the first. With regard to the right of presentation, no doubt it was reasonable that the endowers of the church should have it; but that could be done under the existing Acts. He objected to precedents being made in directions against which the House had set its face, and with regard to which it had rather shown an inclination to retrace its steps. On these grounds he felt bound to oppose the second reading.

MR. SOTHERON said, he thought that no private Bill should be refused a second reading, unless it was shown that its principle was so objectionable that it could not be amended in committee.

MR. APSLEY PELLATT said, he should oppose the Bill, because it would establish a church rate, and would thus effect a local advantage at the expense of a great principle affecting the whole kingdom.

MR. PALK said, it was a misconception to suppose the Bill gave a power to levy additional church rates; as it only diverted the rates of this portion of the parish into the district, which would otherwise be payable to other churches.

THE MARQUESS OF BLANDFORD said, he should support the Bill, as being a measure promotive of religion in a district of the country which was at present destitute of church accommodation.

LORD SEYMOUR said, he must admit that it was desirable there should be additional church accommodation at Torquay and its neighbourhood, but it appeared to him that the 16th clause of this Bill would have the effect of increasing the church rates. It was not prudent that, while on the one hand, they were anxious to put an end to that vexed question, they should, on the other hand, pass a Bill that would have the effect of not only continuing, but increasing, that objectionable impost. If the 16th clause were taken out of the Bill, he was not prepared to oppose considering the Bill in Committee; but, unless that were done, he should vote against the second reading of the Bill.

SIR JOHN BULLER said, he could inform the noble Lord and the House, that he had had a communication with the agents of the Bill, and that there would be no objection to withdraw the 16th clause in Committee.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 125; Noes 74: Majority 51.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

THE CAMP AT ALDERSHOT—QUESTION.

MR. DRUMMOND said, he wished to know why the soldiers who were to be encamped at Aldershot, in order to learn their duty in the field, were not instructed in that part of it which consisted in the soldier forming his camp and hutting himself; whether the small extra pay which might be allowed for this would not be a saving of cost of labour, as well as be useful for the instruction of the soldiers; and whether the huts were to be removable, and the men to be instructed in putting them up and pulling them down again.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, that it was intended that all the soldiers connected with the camp at Aldershot should be instructed in their general duties, whether in the field or in barracks, and although the barracks in which they would be accommodated were not removable, but were temporary barracks, still it was intended that these troops should be taught the way to pitch and strike their tents, and put them up afterwards, and as that formed part of the duties of a soldier, it was not intended to give them any extra pay for such work.

REAL ESTATES OF INTESTATES.

MR. LOCKE KING: * I rise, Sir, to move for leave to bring in a "Bill for the better settling the real estates of intestates;" and I feel confident that I bring this great question of justice under the consideration of the House, under more favourable circumstances than I have done on former occasions. Public opinion is now aroused to the injustice of a law which makes a difference, where a parent has made no difference, between one child and other children in the same family; and is not unfrequently the unfortunate engine by which a widowed mother and a whole family of dependent helpless children are rendered destitute, in order that one member of the same family may, through their poverty, become powerful, pampered, and luxurious. It is a law which creates a very anomalous and frequently a very inconvenient distinction between one class of property and another, for even in the very same class of property, in landed property, which it intends to take under its own peculiar patronage, in order to carry out its own intended injustice, land is made to differ from land. Not only on the very same estate, but in the very same field, in the very same house and garden, the property belonging to the same individual, where no one could tell there could be the least difference, the technicality of an absurd law makes such a distinction that one part of the field, or even of the house, is a distinct property, and descends in a different way from the other. What I propose, is by a very simple, short and just measure to do away with all these cruel distinctions in families, and at the same time with these anomalies in properties, by applying a good and sound principle, and one uniform law to all properties, of all persons who die intestate.

As there are many persons who are entirely ignorant of the nature of my proposal, as well as others who, I regret to say, have found it convenient to put a false interpretation on my intentions, I will at once state what is the change I really do propose to make. At the same time I will give an unqualified contradiction to those assertions which have been ungenerously made for the convenient purpose of prejudicing unthinking persons against a just measure. I merely propose that where a person dies without having made a will, possessed of real property, that the law should make a just will for him, that it should make the same will for him, as it would have made if his property had been personal instead of real, or if his family consisted of daughters ; that the law should no longer make for him the unjust will it now does, a will which every one, whatever may be his prejudices, cannot say is founded on justice, and which the deceased individual would have been ashamed to make for himself. The law which relates to personal property under similar circumstances, and to leasehold land, leased for 1,000 years, which in many respects is better than freehold, or to houses which in this metropolis are leased for ninety-nine years, is a just law ; no one ever ventures to complain either of the injustice or of the inconvenience of distributing all such property to the next of kin. Now all I ask is, to have the same law applied to all the property of all who die intestate. This simple alteration of the law, founded on the most undeniable justice, will at once remove all the anomalies which now exist. The law will then be the means of creating equality, harmony, and content in those families where the parent has neglected to make a will. We shall then hear no more of those cruel inequalities, of those miseries which cannot be concealed, or of those secret discontents of which the present law alone is the cause.

I have now stated clearly what I do propose. I will proceed to state what I do not propose. I have been accused of being anxious to interfere with the power of willing property ; quite the reverse, for I should like to see that power much greater in this country than it now is. It is a most valuable privilege, and at the same time a great and solemn responsibility. I feel confident that if the parents in many of our noble and great families had more power over their eldest sons, we should not see so many instances of sons, who, in spite of the earnest entreaties of their parents, have been led into vicious and bad practices, borrowing money at exorbitant rates of interest of the Jews, solely because they are independent of their parents. It is reversing the natural order of things to make the son independent of the father, the father dependent upon the son. Then I have been accused of desiring to introduce the French system of succession into this country ; quite the reverse, for however much France may have profited by that law, I feel that it is open to the very same objections your system of entail is open to here—the interfering with the paternal authority. Here you make by entails one son independent of his father : there all are to a lesser extent independent also. It is by resisting just measures of this kind you yourselves are much more likely to introduce the French law. For when justice is delayed or refused, we have often seen a sort of compulsory justice established, as in France, and which savours much of tyranny. It is well known to those who have read the discussions which took place on this particular point in the Code Napoleon, that Napoleon was not in favour of the law as it now exists in France ; he wished the father to have more power over his children.

I have said thus much to allay the fears and the prejudices of those who are opposed to me, and who dread this measure, lest it should interfere with the power of making a will, or lest it should introduce the French law into this country. I can positively assure the House that this Bill cannot affect it—I have no such intention ; and no one who supports this Bill, with whom I have conversed, has ever expressed such a desire, but the contrary. I must add, that after what I have said such a fear is an unmeaning fear ; if it amounts to anything, it is a fear lest the law should provide for all the children of an intestate out of his own property, lest the eldest son should suffer by having his own brothers and sisters provided for out of an estate, which during his father's life, had been used for the benefit and support of all. It is not a fear, but, if persisted in, a bitter determination that younger children should, where a father has nothing but land, be deprived by the law of all support. What we ask is simply this, that where an individual dies without a will, the law should make a just one for him founded on a principle, instead of the unjust one it now does, founded on no other rule than that of injustice. If any person likes to leave the whole of his property, whether real or personal, to one child, to one individual, this Bill cannot prevent him ; the only difference will be that he must do it by will ; if the act he is desirous of performing be an unjust act, he must put his name to it ; the law would, if this Bill pass, no longer do it for him. This really is the whole of the Bill, and yet every possible prejudice has been invented against it. Ingenious, not ingenuous persons have appealed to the pride, to the bad and ungenerous passions of men in order to get them to pre-judge the case, and raise up a clamour against this measure. They have endeavoured to blind them and to keep justice out of their sight, and certainly have, I fairly admit, in certain classes for a time succeeded.

I have thus been obliged explicitly to state what this Bill will do and what it will not do, because of the many misconceptions which have been formed about it. One noble Lord (Lord St. Leonards) and one of the ablest of the law Lords, seemed to boast with peculiar pride that the other House would very easily dispose of a measure of this kind. No doubt, if they shut out argument and justice, and only legislate for their prejudices, they can without a debate, without an argument, reject it. But the same noble Lord certainly surprised me when, after saying there might be much argument on the subject, he stated why a measure of this kind should be opposed, and why it was unwise to introduce the change. He at once showed that he did not understand the question; he built up a castle that any one might knock down with the greatest ease, because it had no foundation. His reason was, the effect produced by the system of minutely sub-dividing landed property in France. Now the effect of the law of equal division in France can really have nothing whatever to do with what may be the effect of this Bill. In France the law is compulsory; no one can make a will as he chooses: the law in every case disposes of, and divides the greatest part of every person's property, whether landed or moveable. The French feel the nation can make a better will for the individual than he can for himself. They take away from him the absolute power of making a will, and give him only a very limited power. All that this Bill proposes is, that where the individual has made no will, the law should provide for all his children. He will have the most absolute control and power over all his property.

I may say, when persons, like Lord St. Leonards, are inclined to legislate solely because of the effects which are to be observed in other countries from different systems, I might ask them to look at Ireland—there you have had the greatest evils that can arise out of small cultivation, caused alone by a most needy class of large proprietors. But this Bill could not even touch those great estates, they are mostly settled and entailed, and where they are not, can be left by will.

But when persons only talk of the good or bad effects of this or that system, let me show the House the real misery, the cruelty, and oppression which do arise out of the present law. If they are not inclined to argue on the justice of the case, but to reject it, perhaps the effects and the way the law really works, may induce them to alter it.

I will now show by actual cases of real hardship how this most unjust law really operates.

"In the year 1826, the owner of landed property to the amount of 15,000*l.*, died suddenly, leaving a wife and ten children. His personal estate, to the amount of 4,000*l.*, was entirely absorbed by bond and other debts. His eldest son, who had been well provided for by inheriting the fortune of his maternal grandfather, took the whole of the landed property. A will which the father left, and which proved inoperative, showed his intention of providing an annuity for his widow, and dividing all he left equally among his children."

The heartburnings and estrangements of feeling caused in this case were great.

Here is another case where the relationship was more distant, and if the unjust operation of the law be not greater, the ill feelings caused by it were more serious than even in the former case—

"Some short time ago, two bachelor brothers died intestate, at a very advanced age, within twenty hours of each other, leaving real estate to the amount of 1,000*l.* yearly, and personality about 1,500*l.*, with instructions, often verbally expressed, that the whole real estate, as well as personality, should be equally divided between their two nephews, John B. and William B., two brothers. To this equitable distribution of property laboriously acquired there seemed no disposition to demur, until some few weeks after the decease of the uncles, when the elder brother, John, claimed the real estate as heir at law, and one-half of the personality. What are the results? An enmity which will never cease until the grave covers it."

I will now give another and a most interesting case, where a father has escaped in the most providential manner, and has, by making a will, prevented the law doing a most serious act of injustice for him. This case will give a very good answer to those persons who say that the state of the law is generally known; the law is not, I maintain, known. I give the name in this case, because the person is extremely anxious that his case should be known, in order that others may take warning and make their wills in time—

"William Collins, of Walton-on-Thames, seventy-three years of age, the bulk of whose property is in land, has always been looked up to by his neighbours as a person well informed in matters relating to property. Being taken alarmingly ill with a mortal complaint a few weeks ago, his medical adviser thought it right to ask him if he had any final arrangements to make. He said, in reply, that there would be no occasion for him to make his will, as he wished his property to be divided among all his children, and the law would do that for him. He was most fortunately assured he was in error, for that his property being in land, it would all descend to his eldest son, and his other children would have no share of it. Upon this he made further inquiries, and finding the state of the law was so, he sent for his solicitor without loss of time and made his will. He has now partially recovered, and has expressed the deep gratitude he feels both on his own account, and on account of his children, that he has been made aware of the true state of the law. He admits that he had great difficulty in believing a law of so unjust a nature could be in existence."

There is a class of cases also of extraordinary cruelty to which I will now refer, where not only the law of succession works its own injustice, but also the law relating to marriages comes to complete, and if possible add to, that injustice. A will is made by an owner of landed property in order to defeat the injustice of the law, in order to prevent all younger children being left destitute. A marriage settlement is also required by every thoughtful woman, for no other reason generally than to prevent her being deprived of everything she possesses, and in order that some sort of a provision may be made for her. These cases will at once show the extraordinary injustice and double cruelty of the present laws.

"J. N., plumber and glazier, married the daughter of a respectable farmer, who gave her several hundred pounds. No settlement was made, and some time after the marriage the husband laid out the whole of this money in the purchase of a piece of land. He subsequently died intestate, and without children. The land went to the heir-at-law, a nephew, and the widow was left entirely destitute. She is now a menial servant in a farm house."

I will now trouble the House with only one other case out of many—

"A. B. was a dealer in provisions, &c.; he had a wife, but no child—they were a most careful and industrious couple, and had amassed besides the stock in trade, furniture, &c. some 2,500*l.* There was a nephew living, who had been a great favourite with them, but on growing up he had become a thorough scamp. A. B. made a will in favour of his wife, who had, in fact, done as much to earn the property as he had. They were in the vale of years. At the time I speak of, there was a freehold little farm to be sold in the vicinity. The price was 3,000*l.* A. B. had book debts, stock in trade, &c. and 2,500*l.* in cash. He knew he could, with a little temporary borrowing, compass the purchase, and stock the farm—he signed the contract, and paid the deposit. Somebody suggested that he must alter his will, or his nephew might succeed to the estate instead of his wife. The poor man said, 'it will be time enough to do that when the place is my own, I will make a new will that very day.' Alas, there was not time enough. He died suddenly, before the purchase was completed. His poor wife, as executrix, was compelled to complete the purchase, and what with the expenses of some litigation, every shilling, and every chair and stool went away from her, the nephew took the estate, and the woman lived on charity."

I have now quoted cases of real hardship, and I admit that if cases of similar hardship could be quoted as having arisen in consequence of the law relating to the personal property of intestates—they would have weight. But nothing of the kind—a noble Lord (Lord J. Russell), on a former occasion, attempted to strain himself into a belief that if this Bill were passed into a law much hardship would arise. Against my real cases of great hardship, he adduced an imaginary one. He said, "suppose a landed proprietor brings up one son to the bar, and he becomes a Judge; another is in the army, and he becomes a General; the father has spent largely in educating the one and in buying a commission for the other, it might so happen they might be better off than the eldest." Now, it is quite clear that the noble Lord had not looked carefully into this question. I propose to apply the statute of distributions to landed as well as personal property. In that statute there is a clause with respect to "advancement," the object of which is to make all the shares of the children of the intestate father as near as possible equal. It is expressly enacted that any child who has been advanced by the intestate in his lifetime, shall bring that portion he has received into hotchpot, and receive so much less of the surplusage. This imaginary castle falls in the same way Lord St. Leonard's castle fell, because it has no foundation.

I might give a number of cases of hardship. But I have also looked carefully into what my opponents have written and said on this subject, and I think no one has in a more careful and spirited way shown up the technicalities and oppression of the law, than Lord St. Leonards himself.

Lord St. Leonards, when Sir Edward Sugden, thus expresses himself in one out of a series of letters he wrote—the object of those letters, no one can doubt, was to warn the possessors of property against the anomalous state of the law—

"A moment's reflection will show what serious consequences may follow from a neglect on your part, for suppose you purchase an estate with the £50,000*l.* in the funds, which you have given by your will to your younger children, and which constitutes the bulk of your personal property, and should neglect to devise the estate, the money must go to pay for it, at the expense of your younger children, who would be left nearly destitute, whilst your eldest son, to whom the estate would descend, would have an overgrown fortune."

Lest any one should imagine that this is a rare instance of hardship, I call the particular attention of the House to his own remark in the very next sentence; this great authority goes on to say, "Distressing cases of this kind are continually occurring."

I now proceed, still reading an extract from my opponent, in order to prove my case—the horrible injustice of this law—and he continues—

"If your personal property undisposed of is not sufficient to pay for the estate, it would be better, perhaps, to direct it to be sold again, and the first purchase money to be paid out of the money produced by the resale."

You must here remark that even he, even Sir Edward Sugden, that most astute lawyer, hardly knows how and what to advise; the technicality of the present law really does seem to be too great even for him. At all events, his plan of solving the difficulty certainly does not seem to be a very simple one. He then goes on to state another case of great importance; I give it in his own words—

"You must remember, that in devising or suffering an estate to descend which you have purchased and not paid for, your devisee or heir will be entitled to have the purchase-money paid out of your personal property, although you may have given it all to another person. A most vexatious case once happened. A younger brother agreed to purchase an estate from his elder brother; the conveyance was accordingly executed, but the money was not paid. The younger brother then made his will, giving his property to his brother, subject to legacies, and made him executor. The will, however, was not executed so as to pass the estate. The younger brother died, and the elder brother took the estate as his heir, and also paid himself the purchase-money out of the personal property, by which he disappointed the legatees, who lost their legacies, whilst he got both the estate and the purchase-money for it."

Now these distressing cases of hardship, which really are continually occurring, are referred to by Lord St. Leonards, when Sir Edward Sugden, with the view of warning individuals as to the state of the law. Is it not, I would ask, imperative on the Legislature after such a warning, and when its attention is called to this deplorable state of the law, to take care that no such distressing cases shall ever again occur?

Let not hon. Gentlemen imagine for a moment that this Bill will affect the unjust rights of eldest sons alone, and that the eldest son is the only member of a family who has these unnatural rights, for the rights of the youngest son in many places are just as oppressive and unnatural.

There are many places where the custom of Borough English prevails, where the youngest son inherits all the land of his intestate parent, to the exclusion of all his brothers and sisters. There is a large tract of about 40,000 acres in the neighbourhood of Taunton, where this custom prevails, and from which neighbourhood, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Taunton (Mr. Labouchere) presented a petition to-night in favour of this Bill. That petition was more respectably signed than any which ever came from Taunton, and by persons of all shades of politics. The circumstances under which these rights commenced, have now ceased. The law has survived the occasion for which it was at first introduced; that law which was necessary once, is now no longer so. You no longer require that land should be kept in few hands, and descend to the eldest son as a means of protection. You may say that it is necessary it should thus descend for other purposes, but the original object has altogether ceased. Neither is it any longer necessary that land should descend to the youngest son, where the custom of Borough English prevails; for those most revolting, disgusting, and tyrannical rights have long since ceased, which alone made such a descent imperative. These laws, which belong to other times, are no longer required; having arisen out of the necessities of other times, they can no longer be supported either by argument or by expediency.

Is it right, I ask, that the Legislature should allow these laws, however necessary they once were, to exist any longer in the oppressive state they are now in? We must look upon all these laws and customs, with regard to landed property, as a part of a great military system. A foreign enemy encamped on these shores and made such laws as they, without the concurrence of the nation, considered best adapted for the purpose of subjugating a conquered people. Those laws still remain, but we, the Legislature, ought not to treat that people whom we profess to represent, any longer as a conquered nation. There has been no great modification in those laws for more than 300 years, when an inroad was made upon this great military system, and an owner of land for the first time had the power of bequeathing land by will. Till that time, it may be said, as far as land was concerned, we had a law of primogeniture, for no one could leave land by will. I find in Kent's Commentaries that so great was the dread of land being alienated, "that the hand of him who knowingly wrote a deed of alienation was directed to be struck off." We live in other times—there is now a general desire that land should be alienated with facility, that the transfer of land should be easy.

I heard with delight a speech of the Solicitor General at the Law Amendment Society—he confirmed these views, and said that he saw no reason why land should not be as easily transferable and divisible as money in the funds. If it be a good and sound rule to make land easily transferable, and to treat it in this respect like personality, how much more essential does it seem, to let it descend also in the same just way that personality now does. This is a part of the question, the justice of which is much more cared for by the people out of doors, than the transfer of land. It is often said why, when every one can make a will and leave his land to whomsoever he pleases, why should you alter a law which works well, and gives all to one child, and no portion of it to any of the other children? Now I deny that it does work well, and I say, moreover, that it is most unjust. I would remark that life is extremely uncertain, there is too often a carelessness and propensity to procrastinate and delay making a will—that repugnance is often carried so far, that even persons have on their deathbeds expressed their wishes in the clearest manner, so as not to leave the slightest doubt, and yet those intentions could not be carried out because they had not been legally expressed, in short, for no other reason than that the deceased had a repugnance to making a will.

The result of these laws of succession to real property is, that unfortunate families of helpless young children with their widowed mothers, are plunged from comfort into misery and want.

law to remain in such a state—can it be lawful to persuade the heir that he is doing right in taking all from all his brothers and sisters, only because the law gives him an unjust right to all? I am sure those who have done so have thus acted in blind ignorance—they can never have thought of the justice of the case—if they have thought at all, they have justified their conduct under the comfortable garb of expediency. I do not say to any one who may have thus acted, to restore that to which he has an undoubted right as far as the law is concerned, though a most questionable one as far as justice is concerned. This I do not ask, but what I do ask is, that you should assist in making a just law now, and thus prevent any one from hereafter being placed in the unsatisfactory position, those who have profited by the existing law must feel themselves placed in.

We have been told that it would be dangerous to alter these laws of succession and to remove this part of a vast military system of organisation, for that if we did it would endanger our institutions, and that they are necessary for the support of the aristocracy. But we have been told also the very same thing, with regard to another portion of our great military system, the regimental system which prevails with regard to promotion in the army. It has been gravely asserted that to allow the common soldier to rise from the ranks, as he does in the continental regiments, to reward as it were merit in him, to treat him with common justice, to do unto others as you would wish to be done by, that this would also destroy our aristocracy and our army.

Have not the awful successions of catastrophes, which have arisen solely from the extraordinary rottenness of our military system, taught us another lesson; and now we are, at last, when it is almost too late, prepared to reverse the system; to concede tardy justice to the soldier, and reform with one dash of the pen the whole of our military system. You refused to treat your common soldier with justice. You kept him in a degraded position, where merit would have elevated him, because you imagined it was expedient. You now, at last, in consequence of mismanagement in every department, find that it is expedient to be just. You have refused justice, nay, even sustenance to the widow, and to all the younger children of their intestate father, unjust as it might appear, because you said it was expedient. You have found it expedient to degrade all the younger children of a parent whose property is in land ; you do not acknowledge their existence, you treat them as if they were illegitimate, and unknown to the law ; this treatment you have found to be expedient. May you not find that it is expedient to be just, and to remodel the great cruelty and injustice in this part of the great military system.

We mourn over the loss of an army, which has been hurried through our military mismanagement, to an untimely grave ; we cannot recall those who are gone, but we may prevent such sad catastrophes again occurring. Neither can we recall and restore to their proper and natural positions in society, the widow with her degraded and insulted children, who have been suffered to pine away, and are now dragging on a wretched existence, solely in consequence of these cruel and unjust laws. We cannot undo this injustice of the past, but we can, by passing a just law, prevent future generations being ever again placed in a similar misery. I hope the House will not refuse me leave to bring in this Bill. If you do refuse it, you will at once proclaim that you have a perfect horror of justice where your prejudices are concerned. I entreat you not to let it go forth that this House, which is almost the only representative assembly now left in Europe, holds in its hands unequal balances and false weights ; but I sincerely hope that we shall be able to show our institutions are a model for Europe, and that we shall prove, by passing this Bill, we are willing to do justice, and to remove oppression, wherever it is to be found.

MR. MASSEY, in seconding the Motion, said, that considerable misapprehension existed that this measure would lead to ulterior consequences of a very grave and extensive nature ; but his hon. Friend did not propose to introduce a new law ; he only sought to extend the provisions of a law which had been in existence for two centuries, and which already controlled the great mass of the property of the country, namely, the Statute of Distributions—a law, the wisdom and policy of which no man could contravene. His hon. friend desired simply to comprehend in the Statute the remaining portion of landed property not now embraced in it. He (Mr. Massey) did not know that he went so far as his hon. Friend in thinking that this measure would have as extensive an operation as he supposed, or as some, who objected to it feared. He believed it would not have that extensive effect. Personal property, leases of nine hundred and ninety-nine years, leases at rack-rent, mining property—probably half the real property of the country—were at present subject to the law which regulated personal property and chattels. The law which had been in operation for two centuries had affected that vast mass of property, and, therefore the House was in a position to judge accurately of the effects of that Statute. There was ample proof of the salutary operation of this law, and on the experience derived from its working he principally founded his advocacy of the measure his hon. Friend asked leave to introduce. He hoped the Government would not oppose the introduction of the Bill, and he could not conceive any valid reason for such a course. The argument that it was a measure that would have an injurious effect on the institution of the aristocracy of the country was without foundation. He considered it almost an insult to him to charge him with being opposed to any of the great institutions of the State. Aristocracy had a much more solid foundation than those who used such an argument could suppose. But our landed aristocracy was founded not on the law of primogeniture, but on the law of entail. He certainly did not wish to see the existing order of society in this country disturbed. But, in reality, the question before the House did not touch the question of aristocracy at all. The alteration proposed by his hon. Friend would come to this—that it would relieve some small owners of heritable property from the ill effects of their own ignorance. Men who purchased a few acres of land did not do so with the view of founding a family, but of obtaining interest for their money, and it was estates such as these which it was sought principally to bring under the operation of the law of Charles II. It might be said that this proposal would discourage agriculture. But they had the experience of the last two centuries to guide them ; and he asked hon. Members if they found that agriculture had been diminished through the effects of the Statute of Distributions ? If he thought agriculture would be injuriously affected by this measure, he would not give it his support. He trusted that the House would permit his hon. Friend to bring in his Bill, and then, when in Committee, he would be prepared to hear and discuss any objections that might be made to its details.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill for the better settling of the Real Estates of Intestates."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, there were some subjects which the House should not let go further, and towards which they should not exhibit any hesitating determination, and one of these was, whether they should admit a Bill to be brought into the House which undoubtedly had for its object, and which unquestionably would have for its result, the altering of some of the most important and established institutions of the country. There was a great distinction between a measure framed with a view to an amendment of the law and a measure which, whatever might be the intentions of its framers, would directly shake the institutions of the country. To all measures calculated to effect an amendment of the law, he trusted that the House would ever afford a ready ear, and an anxious attention; but to a measure for removing the landmarks of some of our valued and most important institutions—for taking away some of the foundation stones of the constitution—to any such measure he hoped the House of Commons would answer, as their ancestors did of old, Nolumus leges Anglie mutari. This proposition had been debated last Session, and the adverse opinion of the House was most unmistakably declared, by a majority of three to one, and he now called on the House to reject it again by a majority as decisive. The argument urged by the hon. Gentleman who introduced and seconded the measure was an appeal to hon. Members in certain cases of hardship, which they said could not be remedied without their interference. The hon. Gentleman who introduced it to the notice of the House cited a great number of instances of contract for the purchase of estates where the whole of the personal property, in consequence of the death of the purchaser, had been absorbed by the money due under the contract, the estate going to the heir and the younger children being deprived of their proportion. But that was not due to the law of primogeniture. The result proceeded from a contrary principle. In every contract which was to be carried into effect after the death of a party, his personal property was liable at his death to the contract. Whether it be right or wrong that personal property should be liable for the payment of debts was a question altogether beside the one now before the House. With respect to the law of primogeniture they had heard most contradictory arguments—that the law they proposed to alter would affect the most important classes in the empire, the aristocratic branches—that it would affect the great estates—and then it was said on the other side, that it was required to dispose equitably small estates, affecting the lower classes. One hon. Gentleman said that the greater part of the large estates went by the law of entail; but if the law were altered, what became of the principle upon which our settlements were founded and maintained? Would the great settlements of the country be permitted to remain if the law of primogeniture was taken away? The hon. Gentleman who brought forward the measure knew that, should they abolish the law with respect to the succession of the eldest son, the whole principle and form of arranging settlements, and the foundation on which the order of estates was fixed, would fall, and they would have nothing more than estates divided indefinitely, to the great disadvantage of the country economically, socially, and, he would add, that to which the hon. Member who last addressed the House had referred, agriculturally. It was said, too, that this was a question based on the principle of natural justice. But the institution of property and of landed estates was the creature of positive law, and that law was regulated by our political institutions; and they could not alter the one without materially affecting the other; therefore, the question was not to be discussed upon any abstract principles of natural justice, but it must be considered upon the principles by which the constitution of the country was established. He contended that in adhering to the rules of property which had been laid down from the earliest time, and in reference to which their institutions were moulded, they would not at all violate any principle of natural justice. But even if any such principle were violated, it belonged to the Legislature to consider whether any greater advantage did not accrue to society from that partial deviation from the general principle than from an invariable adherence to it. He begged hon. Members would not consider that in abiding by a rule laid down from the earliest times they would violate any principle of natural justice. But even if there was any principle of natural justice violated by it, it was for the Legislature to consider whether there were not many great social advantages resulting from this institution. He did not know anything that was more important to preserve in this country than the great rule by which the landed property of the father passed to the eldest son. There was not a profession, calling, or occupation in the country that did not swarm with numbers of industrious, intelligent, earnest, active younger sons, whose industry was stimulated, intellect excited, and talents called forth and matured by the mere circumstance that they had to depend on their exertions, and would not have the property they might probably be looking to if this great institution were abolished. The whole constitution of society had been framed on the existing principle, and what were the reasons to induce them to consider the propriety of uprooting the foundation and altering the principles and rules by which the whole of the people of the community had their expectations and views regulated and determined? Having had no apprehension that this matter would be brought forward until he came into the House, he was only expressing his thoughts in a desultory way; but he considered that he should be failing in his duty if he did not declare his decided conviction that this matter, now again introduced, came recommended by no new argument, nor by anything that could induce them to entertain a different opinion respecting it from that which had been repeatedly expressed by that House and by the best-informed persons out of it. With regard to one point to which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. L. King) had directed attention, namely, the anomaly existing with regard to the peculiar custom respecting descent which prevailed in a very small part of the United Kingdom, whereby the younger son, instead of the elder son, became the inheritor, if the hon. Gentleman would direct his attention to it, it might be a proper subject for discussion, but any attempt to alter the great institution to which his Motion had reference should not be entertained by the House of Commons.

MR. EWART said, he should support the Motion for the introduction of the Bill, which was similar to the one introduced by his hon. Friend on this subject last Session, and he had seen no reason to change the opinion he then entertained on the subject. He believed this was a question which could only gain ground by discussion and experience. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General appeared to apprehend that it was a measure which would affect one of our most ancient institutions; but he (Mr. Ewart) did not know what institution the hon. and learned Gentleman could mean. The descent of property by due course of law was no institution. He denied that the proposed measure involved any change in the institutions of the country; what it was really proposed to do was to alter the law so as to suit the existing wants of society. The hon. and learned Gentleman had sheltered himself behind that venerable quotation—Nolumus leges Angliae mutari; but why did he stop there? Why did he not go on with the sentence—quaes huc usitata sunt et approbatæ? He (Mr. Ewart) was equally opposed to the law of France and of Norway, and to the old Roman law of compulsory division. He was for perfect freedom in the distribution of property by will; but when, in the absence of any will, the law made an unjust distribution of that property, then it became the duty of the Legislature to reform that law. It was, therefore, under these circumstances that he supported this Motion. He believed it was a measure in conformity with the changes which had taken place in the opinions and feelings of society, and one which would anticipate and prevent those evils which infallibly resulted from reforms which were too long delayed.

MR. WARNER said, he must complain that the question had been argued on both sides too much as a question of natural justice. For his part, he regarded it as one of pure expediency. There was not a shadow of reason why the elder son should receive more of his father's estate than his brothers, unless they went back to the law of Moses; but on the other hand, if they insisted on an equal division, they could not stop there. In order to be consistent, they must carry out the principles of socialism, and assert that every man had an equal right to everything, and that property was robbery. He (Mr. Warner) thought the custom of primogeniture was an exceedingly good one. It was a custom which was strongly recommended, both by antiquity and universality, for it had existed from the earliest times, and had prevailed in every part of the world. If, therefore, it was a question between our English custom and the French custom of continued subdivision, he should say by all means let us keep up to our own law, with all its anomalies, all its difficulties, and all its absurdities, rather than resort to a system of enforced subdivision, which had proved most disastrous to all that had been subjected to it. On the other hand, while it might be right for a man to keep up his name and family, it was still more right that no citizen of this country should be left to starve. He should therefore support the Motion for bringing in this Bill; because he believed that by the measure they would obviate many cases of suffering without materially altering the present system, with which he thought it would be undesirable to interfere to any considerable extent.

MR. LOCKE KING, in reply, said, that his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General seemed to have prepared his arguments previously to hearing his (Mr. L. King's) speech, for he had made an elaborate defence of primogeniture, which had not been attacked. He was surprised that after his hon. and learned Friend had said he was in favour of the amendment of the law, he should oppose the present Motion.

REAL PROPERTY, &c.—THE PROBATE DUTIES.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that on several former occasions he had called the attention of the House to the great injustice of imposing the probate and legacy duties upon personal property of every description, while real property was exempt from both. This injustice had its origin in the year 1796, when Mr. Pitt brought in a Bill to subject all descriptions of property to the payment of probate and legacy duty; but the powerful landed aristocracy of that day compelled him to divide his measure into two Bills, one to impose those taxes upon personal property, and the other to impose them upon real property. Mr. Fox opposed the separation on the ground that if the tax were imposed upon one description of property, it ought to be laid upon all; and his view was strongly supported by Mr. Pitt. However, the measure, as he had stated, was divided; and while the Bill relating to personal property was carried through both Houses with little or no opposition, the other was successfully resisted. The injustice thus done had been partially remedied by the introduction of a Bill by the right hon. Gentleman the late

Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gladstone), to whom the country was deeply indebted for the measure, although it only went to the extent of laying one-half of the legacy duty alone upon real property. So far, however, from blaming the right hon. Gentleman, he thought that he had acted with great wisdom and discretion in not attempting to do more. Such was the opposition with which the right hon. Gentleman had to contend, that he believed there was no other man in the country whose ability and resolution would have enabled him to carry it through Parliament. The Motion, however, which he (Mr. Williams) was going to propose, had reference solely to the probate duty, and as the circumstances both of that and the legacy duty were precisely similar, he could not conceive how any one could object to his proposition. If the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) were still Chancellor of the Exchequer he should appeal to him with hopeful confidence; and he trusted that he might also do so with the right hon. Baronet who now filled the office. When he (Mr. Williams) brought forward the subject on previous occasions, the only argument with which he was met was, that landed property was subject to stamp duties on conveyances and mortgages so heavy as fairly to counterbalance the legacy and probate duties. But five years ago, at a sacrifice of 450,000*l.* per annum, the stamp duties on conveyances and mortgages were reduced to precisely the same amount as those paid on the transfer of railway and canal property, of joint-stock bank shares, and every other species of personal property, except shares in the Bank of England, the Bank of Ireland, and the East India Company. That argument, therefore, had ceased to be valid. The House had lately voted something like 40,000,000*l.* for carrying on the war, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer would shortly have to provide that sum, and very possibly a great deal more money would be wanted for the same purpose. Now, if the right hon. Gentleman accepted the proposal which he (Mr. Williams) was now making to the House, he would at once obtain 2,500,000*l.* not by imposing any additional tax, but by doing a simple act of justice—that of imposing the same tax on land as is paid on all descriptions of personal property. The right hon. Gentleman might depend upon it that if he attempted to raise the money either by new taxation or by loan before he adopted this just principle of taxation, the country would express the strongest disapprobation of his conduct. To show the unfairness and anomalies of the present system, he might remark, that while the stamp duties on probates from 20*l.* to 80,000*l.* varied from 3 to 2½ per cent, above 80,000*l.* paid only 1½ per cent. Why should the larger properties be thus indulged? But this was only one specimen of the unfairness which was to be found in all our arrangements relating to taxation. Again, legacies chargeable on land paid no probate duty whatever, and the rich landed proprietors were thus exempted from taxation in providing for the younger members of their families. But how did they deal with the tenant-farmer? They valued his lease, all the improvements he had made on his farm, his stock, his implements, and everything he had, even to his wearing apparel, and they charged the probate duty upon that valuation. Houses built on freehold land paid no probate duty; but those built on building leases, which was the case with the great majority of houses in this country, paid probate duty on the full value of the lease. Land held on a lease for 1,000 years, which was as good as freehold, was made to pay probate duty in proportion to its value, while freehold land was wholly exempt. When the Legacy Duty Bill was before the House, much was said about the hardship on heritors having to pay the duty, which only amounted to one-third of a year's rent, and for this four years and a half credit was given. If a man had a legacy of 1,000*l.* left him, he must pay the duty in sixty days. If a man engaged in commerce died, leaving stock and book debts valued at 20,000*l.*, though his estate might only pay 10*s.* in the pound, the administrator had to pay duty on the full amount, and there was the greatest difficulty in getting any portion of it back. As an example of the anomaly of this tax, he would take the Duke of Bedford's estate—that in Covent Garden—the leases had recently expired; the property had passed into his Grace's hands, and was not liable to a farthing of duty. His other estates about Russell Square were still under lease; and the leaseholders were liable to the duty. By the law of Scotland, houses built on another man's freehold were considered part of the freehold, and paid no probate duty. The case was the same with mortgages. The result was, that property of this kind in Scotland was wholly exempt. Another instance of the injustice of the tax as at present levied was afforded by the late

Duke of Portland's estate. He left one of the largest estates in England, which was inherited by his heir; he also left personal property of about 1,000,000*l.*, on which, if left to the younger children, they would have to pay 1 per cent legacy duty and 2½ per cent probate duty. Legacies were left to the servants, and they actually had to pay 10 per cent. legacy duty and 2½ per cent probate duty. The result was that the younger children paid on the personal property seven times more duty than the young Duke paid on his freehold estate, and the servants paid thirty-seven times as much as he did. Recently Mr. Benyon de Beauvoir died, leaving property worth 7,500,000*l.*; of this 1,000,000*l.* being personal property, paid probate duty; and all the rest escaped. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer had brought all kinds of property to his net in the Succession Duties Bill; but he was told that lawyers could still contrive to evade it; and those evasions all applied to the legacy duty, not the probate duty. Lord Stowell, one of the most eminent lawyers of the day, had transferred his property to his son by a regular deed, to evade paying legacy and probate duties; the son died before him, and he had to apply to the Court of Chancery, and contrived to evade the payment of the duty. The late Mr. Porter, in his Progress of the Nation, said that not three in ten of the estates of persons who died paid any probate or legacy duty at all. It appeared that in 1848, on the property of only 26,000 persons who died, probate duty was paid, the property left by 17,000 of whom was of less than 250*l.* value; showing that the duty was evaded to a great extent. He estimated that a revenue of 2,500,000*l.* might be derived from extending the probate duty to real property. At present the average payment was 2 per cent; he understood the same amount of property very nearly paid the legacy duty and the probate duty; and including inappropriate tithes, corporations, colleges, bishoprics, and deans and chapters' property, the amount he had named would be greatly increased. The corporation of London obtained 60,000*l.* a year by taxing all the coals which came within twenty-five miles of London—why should they not be taxed to the probate duty? It might be said, because corporations never died; but means might be devised of bringing their property to charge. There were also the livery companies, all which had large incomes—they ought also to be charged in the same way. He would also extend the tax to the two Universities, to bishoprics—not touching the present income of the bishops—and to deans and chapters. Including these, he thought 2,500,000*l.* a very low estimate of the amount to be raised by the proposed tax. In rendering holders of real property liable to it, landlords would only be paying the same tax as their tenants and menial servants. Nothing could be more consonant with justice than the proposal he now made. Both the late Chancellor of the Exchequer and his predecessor had acknowledged the partiality of the existing probate duty; the latter Gentleman had said that he saw no difference between a privileged noble and a privileged tobacconist. He could not conceive on what ground his Motion could be opposed. It had been said by the Opposition that land was more heavily taxed than any other property. This he denied, and was prepared to prove that the industrious classes were far more heavily taxed than landowners. It was commonly said out of doors that our representative system was on its trial, and nothing could bring it into greater contempt with the people than for the aristocracy to make use of it to exempt themselves from taxation. Could any man oppose this Motion, and call himself a just man and a Christian?

MR. HADFIELD said, he cordially seconded the Motion, believing that the existing law was in a very unsatisfactory state. He had been under the impression that there was an understanding come to with the late Government that the probate and legacy duties should be extended to real property. It was high time that those hateful distinctions between one class of property and another were done away with. While between 18,000,000*l.* and 19,000,000*l.* of taxation were contributed by the industrious classes, the aristocracy were almost wholly exempt from the general burdens. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman who now fills the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer would entitle himself to the thanks of the country by removing all odious distinctions in the taxation of different classes.

Motion made and Question proposed—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that Real Property and Impropriate Tithes should be made to pay the same Probate Duty as is now payable on Personal Property, and that Property belonging to Corporations, Universities, Colleges, Bishoprics, and Deans and Chapters, should pay a Duty equivalent to the Probate and Legacy Duties levied on Personal Property."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could not avoid expressing his regret that the hon. Member who had brought this Motion before the House should have adopted the course of stating his views in the form of an abstract Resolution. It was quite competent to the hon. Gentleman, if the House were in Committee of Ways and Means, to bring forward any plan for continuing or extending the probate duty, and had the hon. Gentleman taken that course it would then have been in the power of the House to form a judgment as to the exact nature of the proposition which he submitted to its consideration. But in the present shape of the Motion it became extremely difficult for the House to form any clear judgment as to the plan the hon. Member would wish to have pursued. The hon. Gentleman, according to his speech, appeared to have confounded the legacy and the probate duty, for in many cases he had applied to the probate duty an argument which referred exclusively to the legacy duty, and he had omitted to state the precise nature or the precise object of the distinction between real and personal property upon which the present probate duty was levied. The system of proving wills had grown out of the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts. Those Courts from an early period of our history exercised jurisdiction over the personality of deceased persons, whether testate or intestate, the jurisdiction, however, from the nature of the Ecclesiastical Courts themselves being limited to personal property only. The law of England did not require that a will devising real property should be proved in an Ecclesiastical Court, which had not by its machinery or plan any means of deciding upon questions affecting the land. The consequence of this state of the law had been that the probate duty had necessarily fallen upon wills affecting personal property. If it were proposed to extend that duty to real property, it would be necessary not only to take the simple course which the hon. Member appeared to indicate, but also to alter the whole law of real property in England, exempting such wills from the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts, and further to alter the jurisdiction and powers of those Courts, which now were not applicable to this class of property. That was a difficulty which met them at the very threshold of the question, but if his hon. Friend had, as he had previously observed in

Committee of Ways and Means, submitted a distinct plan to the consideration of the House, they would then have been able to form a judgment as to the manner in which he proposed to overcome that difficulty, and deal with the practical questions surrounding this particular mode of taxation. If, however, it were proposed to consider the matter in a more general view upon the merits of the case, he must be permitted to refer to the extensive measure affecting the legacy and succession duties, introduced two years ago by his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) who had preceded him in the office he had now the honour to hold. That measure went most extensively into the relations of real and personal property as affecting the question of succession; the whole subject was thoroughly exhausted in discussion, and a settlement was come to, adjusting those respective claims, which he confessed he was not prepared to advise the House now to disturb or rescind. The probate duty must be considered as more or less involved in that settlement, and as determined by the decision to which the House then came with respect to the proportion in which personal property should be taxed, the question of the legacy duty. It was further to be borne in mind, if they looked to the specialities of the case, that there were charges to which the transfers of real property were subject, not pressing on personal property in an equal degree. No person could deal in land to any great extent without being constantly required to pay stamp and other duties imposed on it. Although there were circumstances in which the transfer of personal property was liable to duty, these were of much less frequent occurrence, and it might be stated with truth, that great inequality in the working of the law affecting transfers existed in favour of personal and against landed property. There were, besides, many local charges affecting the land, from which, no doubt, it derived benefit, but still forming special burdens on it. He was, therefore, not prepared to accede to the first branch of the Motion of his hon. Friend, as it was presented to the House. He ought, perhaps, to congratulate himself in having found so able a coadjutor, who presented to the Exchequer a gift of not less than 2,500,000*l.* Although in the present state of the finances he should feel not slightly relieved by so great a donation, he could not but fear that the exemption of wills of real property from probate, would very considerably diminish the sum. The hon. Member said he wished to make wills of real property subject to probate, but there was nothing in his Resolution which bore any such meaning. The Resolution did not propose to alter the law respecting probate of wills of real property, but merely the law respecting the probate duty. The hon. Gentleman had also commented on the inconsistency of leases for years being subject to the probate duty, whilst leases for lives were exempted. That was in consequence of the general law of the country, which made leases for years a chattel interest, while leases for lives were freehold property. There was the same distinction between houses on lease and freehold houses. The latter being real property were necessarily exempt, whilst houses on lease, constituting a chattel interest, were included under the duty. His hon. Friend had alluded also to the scale of probate duty. If his hon. Friend had submitted a distinct and articulate proposal to the consideration of the House, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) should have been ready to meet it by argument, but when it was made merely matter for an abstract proposition, it became very difficult to deal with. The same remark applied to the hon. Member's comments on the evasions of the law, which might perhaps exist even at the present time, for which perhaps a remedy might be found, but in regard to which it was necessary to frame specific measures. With respect, therefore, to the other branch of the Resolution, he regretted his inability to accede to it. He had only one further remark to make with reference to impropriate tithes, which the hon. Member said were real property, but which were very often held as a chattel interest, so that in case of any person dying, and making a will bequeathing them, they became subject to the probate duty. With respect to the latter part of the Resolution, proposing that property belonging to corporations of deans and chapters should be made liable to probate duty, he begged leave to say, that a Bill dealing with the whole subject had been brought to a stage of considerable maturity by his right hon. Friend who preceded him. He had not yet had time to make himself master of the details of the Bill, which required careful consideration; but should he find it possible to arrange those details in a satisfactory shape, he should feel disposed, at the proper time, to submit a measure on the subject to the House.

MR. WILKINSON said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman had not fully answered the arguments of the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. W. Williams), and should give his support to the Motion, which he regarded as founded in justice.

MR. PEACOCKE said, that he should be sorry to throw any damp upon the feelings of gratitude which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had expressed towards the hon. Member for Lambeth, but he must beg to remind him that the latter part of his speech went to show how easily and successfully the existing probate duty upon personal property was evaded, so that if the arguments of the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. W. Williams) were worth anything, it was that the probate duty upon personal property should be removed rather than extended to real property. The hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield) had spoken of the inequalities of taxation in this country; but the hon. Gentleman himself had with much candour admitted that personal property was not subjected to a stamp when it changed hands, though real property was. They had been told that a hateful distinction and inequality existed in the taxation of this country, but certainly neither the distinction nor the inequality would be found to be in favour of the landed interest. But there were other burdens beside this to which the land was subjected, and from which personality was exempt. And, indeed, if personal and real property were placed precisely on the same footing, and made liable to precisely the same duties; if, upon the transfer of personal property, and its mortgage and reconveyance when the mortgage was paid off, it were placed on the same footing as realty, he believed that in a pecuniary sense personality would have nothing to gain. He contended, moreover, that it was most in harmony with the spirit of our free commercial code that personal property should change hands as easily, freely, and readily as possible; whilst it was equally in accordance with the spirit of our territorial constitution that the land of the country should change hands as seldom as possible, and that it should rest in the possession of certain families and be identified with certain names. ["Oh, oh !"] Upon this subject he had no less an authority than that of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gladstone), who, when making his financial statement in 1853, showed that, whereas personal property paid the income tax upon the gross amount of revenue, the same as real property, 16 per cent ought to be deducted from income derived from real property for repairs, management, and other outgoings inherent to the possession of land. From this the right hon. Gentleman deduced, that whilst personal property was only paying 7d. in the £., landed property was paying at least 9d. in the £. But he went even further than this, and showed that owing to the power of self-assessment which traders and manufacturers possessed, and which the landed interest did not possess, the latter were suffering under a still greater inequality than that. The right hon. Gentleman took the case of some personal property that was to be removed to make way for certain public purposes. He stated that twenty-eight individuals possessing that property claimed compensation for its destruction to the extent of 48,000*l.* a year. A jury was empanelled, who assessed the income at 27,000*l.* a year. But what was the gross return of income made by these twenty-eight individuals? Why, 9,000*l.* a year; so that, in point of fact, whilst the landed interest was paying 9d. in the £., the trading and manufacturing interests were paying only 7d. in 3*l.* When he (Mr. Peacocke) first became acquainted with this statement, he owned that he felt very much in the position of the plaintiff in an action at law who, after listening to the pathetic statement made by his counsel in his behalf, burst into tears, and exclaimed that until that moment he had never known what an injured man he was; and certainly until that statement the landed interest was not aware of the full extent of the inequality of taxation to which it had been subjected. Nor did the inequality cease there; for, according to the Report of a Committee of the House of Lords, the landed interest was subjected to local burdens, which pressed upon it to the extent of 23 per cent. Yet, in the face of this declaration, the hon. Member opposite speaks of hateful disproportionate taxation in favour of the land. A great statesman of the Whig school once told a rising financier of his party, that whenever he intended to impose additional taxes, he should always select the landed interest for that purpose. They could be sheared like their own sheep, but beware, said he, how you lay a finger on the manufacturing or trading interests; if you touch one of them, you will have the whole tribe about your ears. Now, what-

over the Whig party had been in other respects there could be no doubt that it had been faithful to its tradition. But although the country party had submitted to forego the privileges they once enjoyed, and been content to accept the national wish that unrestricted competition should be the law of the land, they would not sit quietly down with folded arms and submit to unjust exactions. The present was certainly not the proper moment to reopen the great question of agricultural burdens, when the country was at war, and its capability for bearing taxation was likely to be strained to its utmost tension; but whenever peace should be again established, he contended that it would be the duty of the agricultural party to demand of Parliament what equivalent it proposed to give for the restricted cultivation of the soil, the unequal burden of local taxation, and the unequal and unfair pressure of the income tax, so ably and graphically described by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer. It would then be the imperative duty of the Legislature to review the entire financial system of the country, to take into consideration the burdens with which the landed interest was exclusively saddled, and to seek by every means in their power at all events to alleviate, if they could not effectually remove them.

SIR GEORGE STRICKLAND said, he was favourable to the principle of the proposition, having always been of opinion that the probate duty on personal property was oppressive and unjust. By the measure of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer that duty was extended to land, but in a very unmerciful manner, for he held that the duty on legacies in money ought then to have been reduced to one-half its former amount. There were burdens pressing on land more heavily than on any other species of property, and he held that the question ought to be examined more minutely before they declared that probate duty should be extended to transfers of landed property. As the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that the case of ecclesiastical corporations should be fully considered, he thought the hon. Member for Lambeth should be satisfied with that declaration, and not press the Motion to a division.

MR. CROSSLEY said, he must deny that the burdens on land were, in every instance, greater than those on personal property, for he was aware that, in some cases, the contrary was the fact. Horses that were employed for commercial purposes were subject to taxation, but when used for agricultural purposes they were exempt. Again, insurances of commercial or personal property were subject to taxation, but insurances of agricultural produce were free from duty. He was not in favour of the abolition of probate duty on personal property. He thought that when a man came into the possession of property, to obtain which he had not had to lift his little finger, it was a good time for an officer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to step in and demand something for the support of the state. He thought, too, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to feel obliged to the hon. Member for Lambeth for having brought forward this Motion. The Government, most probably, would have been glad enough to have supported it, but, fearing that they had not sufficient strength to carry it, they had thought it prudent to withhold their support, in order that their tenure of office might not be cut suddenly short.

MR. MUNTZ said, he objected to this tax altogether, and was therefore unwilling to support the inconsistency of extending it to a larger portion of the community. It was a bad tax, and if the hon. Member for Lambeth would move its total repeal he would give him all the assistance in his power.

FACTORIES.

MR. COBBETT said, he would now beg to move for leave to bring in a Bill to limit and regulate the hours of work of females and young persons in the factories of the United Kingdom to ten hours in the day, and to provide the means of more perfectly inspecting the factories. Two years ago he had obtained leave to bring in a similar Bill, but at too late a period of the Session to have any chance of passing it, and last year, though he had made several endeavours to obtain an opportunity for renewing his Motion, he had been unsuccessful. He had, therefore, taken the earliest occasion which offered itself this year, and he hoped the House would allow him now to introduce his Bill, in order that it might be printed and circulated through the country with a view to its full discussion at as early a period as was convenient after the recess. The factory question was one which had excited great interest, both in Parliament and in the country. For fifty years efforts had been made to reduce the hours of labour of children, then of young people, as they were called, from the age of thirteen to eighteen, and, lastly of all, females, to that which every one must allow was a reasonable extent of labour—namely, ten hours a day. In 1847 Parliament passed an Act, by which it was provided that no young person and no female should work more than ten hours a day; and the Speaker, in his speech to the Throne at the end of the Session, congratulated Her Majesty upon the circumstance. Unfortunately, there was a flaw in an Act to which the Act of 1847 necessarily referred, and the manufacturers, in consequence, were enabled to evade it. They adopted a mode of working called the "shift" system, by which, though they worked no person longer than ten hours in any one day, they kept them in and out of the mills in such a manner as to extract from them twelve, thirteen, and even in some cases fifteen hours' labour per day. This was acknowledged to be an evasion of the spirit of the law. It was decided by the Judges that in 1849, though Parliament intended that no protected person should work more than ten consecutive hours in any one day, the words of the Act were not precise upon the point, and thus the evasion was in accordance with the letter of the law. The Ten Hours Bill of 1847, therefore, in point of fact, was abrogated by the fatal flaw to which he had referred. It was admitted, however, that the error was one which ought to be rectified by an amended Bill, but the working people became alarmed in consequence of rumours which gained ground that it was intended so to amend the Bill as to infringe the ten-hour principle. They thought it would be a breach of faith on the part of Parliament to deprive them of any part of what was intended in 1847—namely, a real honest Ten Hours Bill, and, in consequence of the fears entertained by the working people, the Secretary for the Home Department was applied to through Lord Ashley, in order to ascertain if it was the intention of the right hon. Gentleman to introduce a proper Ten Hours Bill, or in any way to infringe that principle. This application was made by the Spinners' Association at Manchester; it put the question distinctly to the right hon. Gentleman (Sir G. Grey) whether he intended to adhere to the ten-hours principle in any amended Bill. An answer was returned to the spinners, signed by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, stating that the then Secretary of State for the Home Department intended to do nothing that would be inconsistent with the spirit of the Act of 1847. The factory people, therefore, thought themselves safe, and were justified in believing that, at any rate, the House of Commons in any measure which might be passed would observe the principle of ten hours labour a day. In May, 1850, the right hon. Baronet the present Secretary for the Home Department detailed to the House the principles of a new measure, which he wished to introduce. The right hon. Gentleman stated that, having taken the advice of other parties, and after great consideration, it was found desirable to extend the term of labour to ten hours and a half, but that a great boon would be conferred upon the workpeople by limiting the hours of labour between six o'clock in the morning to six at night. Any person practically acquainted with the manufacturing districts would be aware that this was no boon to the factory operatives, as they already possessed this advantage. The manufacturer of course took those hours of the day which were the most convenient in respect to the day light, in order to save the expense of gas or other artificial light. Consequently he would of course work between six and six, and no Act was required for that purpose. This was no boon, but a mere delusion. The right hon. Gentleman, in explaining the intentions of the Government with regard to the factory question, said—

"On the one hand, although during the week this class would be employed somewhat more than under the existing law, on the other hand they will gain this advantage—they will have half an hour in the morning, between half-past five and six o'clock, at their own disposal; they will have, undisturbed, the whole evening after six o'clock at their own disposal; and on Saturday, after two o'clock, the whole day at their disposal."—[3 Hansard, ox. 1134.]

Now, if the custom of the manufacturers had been to bring their workpeople into the mill at half-past five o'clock in the morning, and the Ten Hours Bill had been properly enforced, they could not have kept their hands at work after five in the day, so that here again no boon was conferred upon the operatives. The right hon. Gentleman promised the hands half-an-hour more on the Saturday than they would possess under a Ten Hours Bill; but, in point of fact, no additional time was given at all, as the workpeople, in the present mode of violating the law, went on working till three and half-past three o'clock in the afternoon, instead of stopping at two or half-past two o'clock, as they would have done under the Ten Hours Bill. The measure of the right hon. Gentleman was, therefore, immediately resisted. Petitions were presented against it from workpeople, merchants, bankers, manufacturers, clergy, and tradespeople in Manchester, Preston, Bradford, and other towns; but, in spite of the opposition of the manufacturing districts, the right hon. Gentleman pursued his course, and Parliament, with too much readiness, supported him. The Bill was, however, passed, and the Act came into operation, and the labour in factories of women, young persons, and children, was extended half-an-hour more on five days in the week, and curtailed, according to the law, half-an-hour on the Saturday afternoon. Well, how did this Act work? Had it been observed since the time it became law? On the contrary, it scarcely came into operation before the Factory Inspectors began to complain that it was violated to such an extent that it was absolutely necessary to pass some further Act to enforce its provisions. He would refer shortly to some of the remonstrances and complaints which were made upon the subject. Mr. Horner, the Factory Inspector, stated in his Report, dated the 30th of April, 1852—

"The details I have given of these cases, and what I have further stated in my Report for the half-year ending the 31st of October last, if you will please to refer to them, will, I think, satisfy you that there must be an amendment of the existing law before the evil complained of by the millowners in the memorial from Manchester, lately presented to you, can be corrected."

The memorial alluded to by Mr. Horner was one presented to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midhurst (Mr. Walpole) during the time he was Secretary for the Home Department, from the manufacturers themselves, in which they stated that the provisions of the Act were so much violated in the country districts of Lancashire and the West Riding of Yorkshire that they required some amendment of the law in order to protect their interests and place them upon an equal footing with other manufacturers who were in the habit of employing their workpeople beyond the hours to which the mills in Manchester were kept at work. So much as to the mode in which the Act had been observed

after it came into operation. From that time to the present there had been repeated complaints, showing more or less that the Act was constantly violated by the overworking of the young people, who ought not to have worked more than ten hours and a half a day. In October, 1852, the Factory Inspectors made a joint Report, stating that the clear intentions of the Legislature were defeated because of the difficulty in obtaining the conviction of offenders. After that, down to October, 1854, when the last Report was presented to the House, the inspectors, in every one of their Reports, though they stated now and then that the Act was fairly observed, pointed out the necessity of an amendment of the law, in order to prevent the violation of its intentions. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary might, perhaps, say that he did not go into Lancashire, Scotland, and Yorkshire to inspect the factories, but received information from the factory inspectors, and he was content with those few words used by them, that the law was fairly observed; but it was his (Mr. Cobbett's) duty, in order to justify his Motion for the amendment of the law, to state some strong facts, showing the feeling of the manufacturing districts on the subject. During the last Session not less than 1,083 petitions were presented to the House, asking the House to pass such a Bill as he had introduced in the preceding Session; and the petitioners stated distinctly that violations of the law were systematically carried on, that they desired a Ten Hours Bill in its strictness, and that they knew no mode by which the violations of the law could be effectually put down other than by the proposition he had made for a restriction on the motive power of the mill and for a better mode of inspection. During the Session he had presented from a body of his constituents a remarkable petition, signed by the then mayor and late mayor of Oldham, both large manufacturers, and by, he believed, all the aldermen and a great portion of the town council, and this petition distinctly called on the House to pass his Bill of last Session, alleging that the systematic violations of the present law made it necessary. The gentlemen who signed this petition were, for the greater part, largely engaged in manufactures, and could it be supposed that they would pray the House to adopt that which was inimical to the interests of the manufacturers. Petitions came from all parts of the kingdom; they were signed by upwards of 200,000 persons, and were unopposed by any counter petitions. He thought the facts he had stated were conclusive as to the feelings of the people on the subject, and they ought to have sufficient weight to induce the House to permit him to introduce the Bill he now asked leave to bring in. That was one mode by which he showed the feelings of the manufacturing people of the country on the subject, but he could refer to other proofs of the strong desire that existed for an amendment of the law. In 1852, when he was elected, his opinions on the factory question were well known, and he was able to give a pledge to his constituents which he knew would be satisfactory to them, and which he believed to be founded in justice, that he would support such a Bill. Since his election two other elections had taken place in the manufacturing boroughs of Lancashire, and at those elections it was considered by the factory operatives most important to ascertain whether the candidates would frankly pledge themselves in favour of the Bill he had introduced. At Blackburn the Member returned promised to support his Bill, and, if that hon. Member were not now extremely unwell, he should have the advantage of that hon. Gentleman's advocacy on the present as on a former occasion. The rejected candidate also promised to support the measure. Subsequently, at the election for Clitheroe, the two candidates were asked whether they would support his Bill, and the one who promised to do so was returned, and the other, who gave no such pledge, was rejected. These were facts, which showed distinctly that the factory people were desirous of having the Bill, which he had on a former occasion presented to the House; and the one he should now move for leave to introduce was very similar to the measure he brought under the notice of hon. Members two years ago. With regard to the Ten Hours Bill, he knew that it effected a great deal of good. He knew that under its operation the people enjoyed better health and greater domestic comfort, and that, whereas before the young women had not time to make their own clothing of any kind, they had, after the passing of that Bill, and during its operation, been able to perform many needful domestic duties—it had given them domestic comfort which they had not before enjoyed. This was the reason why he felt so strongly on the subject. The House should recollect what was the condition of the factory people before any factory legislation took place. The long hours of work had enervated the bodies of the people; he meant this literally; this had been fully proved. One consequence, among others, of the long hours of working was that it affected the recruiting for the army. It was ascertained that the working people in the factory districts were, to a great extent, so reduced in strength as to be unfitted for the army. Sir John Elly stated, that when he was engaged recruiting at Leeds, he found a prodigious number of persons rejected, as compared with the agricultural districts. In giving evidence before the Health of Towns Commission, Sergeant Farrell said—

"He had been engaged ten years in the recruiting service. For ten recruits he got formerly, he could only now get one, and that one was frequently rejected. He ascribed this to the circumstance that, when persons go to work in factories early, they do not grow to the proper size, have always some deformity, and are pale and sickly, and thin in flesh. The surgeon refuses them for being too thin, not round chested, and not standing straight. In Rochdale there is almost no use staying. I have been only able to pick out thirty men for the last eighteen months, and out of those only one was passed by the surgeon for every four rejected."

This result of severe factory labour was not confined to England, it existed also on the Continent. In 1840 Lord Ashley quoted an extract from the Report of a Commission of the Chamber of Peers in France, to the effect that, of every 10,000 men believed capable of military service in the agricultural districts, 4,029 were rejected on account of physical infirmities; while of every 10,000 men in the manufacturing districts 9,930 were rejected from the same cause. The same state of things existed in Prussia, where the manufacturing districts could not fully supply the contingents required of them. The consequence was, that, both in France and in Prussia restrictions had been imposed on factory labour. Did not this show that interference was necessary, and did it not show that the Ten Hours' Law ought to have been rigidly adhered to? When he formerly brought this subject before the House, he mentioned, on the authority of Dr. Fletcher, of Bury, the astounding mortality that prevailed among the children of factory operatives. From the fact of the mothers working in the factories, and being thereby kept away for long periods of time from their children, great numbers under two years of age died. Dr. Fletcher stated that, of every 100 deaths among the factory workers, a fraction over sixty-one were infants under two years of age, while among the other operative classes in the same locality the deaths of infants under two years of age were a fraction under thirty-three in 100. Last year, at the meeting of the British Association, a Mr. Ashworth, a manufacturer, furnished a variety of statistics relating to the celebrated strike which took place at Preston. It would be recollect, perhaps, that this strike took place during a very severe winter and lasted for six months, and that those connected with it were exposed to very great privations. After Mr. Ashworth had stated to the British Association a great many details with regard to the strike and its mischievous consequences, the Rev. Mr. Clay, the chaplain to the Preston House of Correction, observed that there was one point so important as to deserve special notice. He had reason to believe, he said, from data in his possession, that there were 1,000 women generally employed in the factories among the 18,000 persons who were out on strike, and who were the mothers of infants under five years of age; and he added that the number of infant deaths in Preston among the operative spinners during the six months of the strike was 497, whereas the number of deaths in the six months before the strike was 594. This, he observed, raised the important question, how far it was proper to encourage the employment in our cotton mills of women who had young infants at home who required their attention. The House would observe that, notwithstanding the privations of the strike and the severity of the winter, there were about 100 fewer deaths in the six months during which the strike lasted than in the six months before, while the same people were in full work. It was quite clear that it was the mother's absence from her family which caused the high rate of infant mortality in these districts, and that absence was entirely chargeable upon the factory system as at present carried on. And this fact he looked upon as a remarkable confirmation of Dr. Fletcher's statement. If the deaths in Preston owing to factory work were so many, what would be the total number in the whole of the manufacturing districts of England and Scotland? With a view of remedying the evils which now prevailed in the working of the law, he now asked the House to permit him to introduce this Bill, the leading provisions of which he would briefly state. He proposed, in the first instance, to reduce the hours of labour to ten. And then, as the only practicable way of giving the Factory Inspectors some chance of enforcing the law, he proposed to place a restriction on the motive power, so as to limit its time of working to that fixed for the hours of labour. He knew that in this last proposal he struck against that which many Members would call hazardous, but which, nevertheless, practical manufacturers had declared to be the only effectual mode of ensuring the object in view. Before the Factory Commissioners, appointed to inquire into the condition of the operatives in 1833, commenced their inquiries, they circulated among the manufacturers a series of questions, and the object of one of those questions was to ascertain the opinion of practical manufacturers as to the mode in which an efficient factory law might be framed. He found that in reply to that inquiry forty-eight manufacturing firms in Lancashire, Yorkshire, Scotland, and Ireland, declared that they could not suggest anything more effective than what he (Mr. Cobbett) proposed by this Bill—namely, the restriction of the motive power. Mr. Bolling, the late Member for Bolton, an extensive manufacturer, who volunteered his opinion on the subject, said—

"I wish to say, that as I use up in my concern one-ninentieth part of the cotton consumed in Great Britain, I think it is right I should declare my opinion about an alteration in the law. Now, my opinion is, that whatever Bill is passed, it should be a tight one, and such as can never be evaded; it should be equal and efficient; and for this it must be a restriction on the moving power; then, if that is not granted, we must have a warden, and he must enforce the law at his discretion, and so place us all on one footing."

One of the clauses of the Bill which he (Mr. Cobbett) asked leave to introduce would impose such a restriction. The other clauses of the Bill carried out the suggestions of the Factory Inspectors with reference to an increase of penalties and some other matters, but there was one new clause by which he proposed to give, to persons who ascertained that offences had been committed against the provisions of the Factory Acts, the power, after giving three days' notice to the Inspectors, to bring actions in the County Courts, in the nature of qui tam actions, to recover penalties. He hoped the House would do justice to that immense and increasing body of the operatives of this country who worked in factories, and who were increasing, according to the reports of the Factory Inspectors, to the extent of about 25,000 persons annually, by allowing him to introduce this Bill, in order that it might be printed and discussed. An opportunity would then be afforded to hon. Members and to the country generally of considering the details of the measure, and after Easter the House might determine whether, in their opinion, it was calculated to provide an efficient remedy for the evils which undoubtedly existed.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE seconded the Motion.

Motion made and Question proposed—

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to limit the hours of work of females and young persons, in the Factories of the United Kingdom, to ten in the day; and to provide the means of more perfectly inspecting the said Factories."

SIR GEORGE GREY: I rise, Sir, for the purpose of stating very shortly the reasons which induce me to offer my opposition to the introduction of this Bill. If there were any ambiguity in the object of the measure proposed by the hon. Gentleman—if any advantage could be derived from allowing it to be introduced, in order that we might be more fully in possession of the objects which the hon. Gentleman has in view—I should be quite ready to agree that the Bill should be laid upon the table, and that, when we were acquainted with its contents, we should decide whether it should be entertained or not. But there is no such ambiguity about this measure. The hon. Member has stated very explicitly the provisions of the Bill; and he has stated what is perfectly true, that the measure is identical, or nearly identical, with one which he obtained leave on a former occasion to introduce, which the House had an opportunity of considering; but which the House did not seem disposed to sanction. I conceive, under these circumstances, therefore, that the House can come to a decision upon this Bill without waiting until a distant day, and discussing the measure on the second reading. I think that it would be most mischievous to allow a Bill of this nature to be introduced, if the House is not prepared at once to assent to its principle. The interests concerned are of such magnitude that any Parliamentary interference can only be justified by necessity. In former years I thought such necessity did exist, and I gave my aid in passing that law by which the hours of labour of certain specified classes were abridged; but I believe, unless a case of indispensable necessity is established, that interference of this nature cannot fail to be mischievous, and I must contend that the hon. Member for Oldham has made out no case which would justify such an interference as he proposes on the part of this House. Now, what is the case which the hon. Gentleman brings forward? Many of us remember the keen and protracted debates which took place on this subject of factory legislation in years long gone by; we remember the nights which were occupied by the detailed statements of my noble Friend Lord Shaftesbury, who then had a seat in this House, and who brought the question repeatedly under its consideration; and also by the late Mr. Fielden; and we recollect the accounts given of the suffering and injury to which it was contended the classes in question were subjected in consequence of the long hours of labour in factories. We remember, too, the interest which was excited throughout the country with reference to this subject, and I ask hon. Gentlemen to contrast the statements which were then made with the statements the hon. Gentleman has now addressed to the House, and the indications of interest and excitement which were apparent in the country at that time and at the present. Why the only facts stated by the hon. Member are drawn from a period antecedent to the passing of what is called the Ten Hours Bill. When an hon. Member who is anxious to detail the sufferings of the factory population has to go back for statements to 1840, before the Ten Hours Bill was passed, the inference I draw is, that the evils have been remedied, and the House ought to abstain from further interference. I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman, that great benefits have been derived by shortening the hours of labour as regards women and children. I believe that those beneficial results have arisen not from the mere operation of the Act of 1847, but from the operation also of the Act of 1850, which he now seeks to set aside. He has stated, that under the existing laws women and children have a great deal more time to spend in their own homes, and that parents have greater opportunities of intercourse with their children, but I attribute this, not to the Act of 1847 alone, but to the Act of 1847 combined with the supplemental Act of 1850, which the hon. Gentleman now stigmatises

as a fraud upon the operative classes of this country. Let me remind the House what is the state of the case. By the Act 3rd and 4th of Will. IV., chap. 43, it was declared that young children should work in factories no more than twelve hours, between half-past five o'clock in the morning and half-past eight in the evening. By the 10th and 11th of Vict. chap. 39, the hours of labour were reduced to ten, but the fifteen hours still remained, within which those ten hours labour might be rendered. No doubt it was opposed to the intentions and objects of those who introduced the Ten Hours Act, but there was nothing in the legislation—10 & 11 Vict. c. 39—to render a system of relays illegal, so long as no individual woman or young person was subjected to more than ten hours labour in the day. I at that period held the office of Secretary of State for the Home Department, and received innumerable complaints of the operation of that law which the hon. Gentleman calls the "Charter" of these classes, because the anticipations raised by it were disappointed. In 1850 the subject underwent long and anxious consideration. I communicated with the millowners and occupiers, who wished to have a satisfactory settlement of the question, and with those who had been the most strenuous advocates of the working classes and the means of inducing Parliament to abridge their hours of labour. With their consent and concurrence, founded upon the conviction that the proposal was for the interest of the operatives themselves, and expressed privately to me and publicly in this House, that Act was passed. If that had been a measure which could be justly stigmatised as a fraud, they would not have assented to it, and I should not have proceeded with it. I believed it would confer substantial benefits on the working population, and their warmest advocates felt justified in supporting it as the best settlement which could be obtained, and as a security to the working classes of the utmost extent of benefit they could derive from legislation. By that Act the fifteen hours during which the hours of labour might be taken were reduced to twelve, namely from six o'clock in the morning to six in the evening, being identical with a proposition which Lord Shaftesbury on a former occasion submitted to the House. No doubt only one hour and a half being deducted for meals, during five days, ten hours and a half instead of ten hours' labour might be imposed; still, as there were only to be sixty hours in a week, it gave them the whole of the afternoon of Saturday for their own occupations, recreation, and enjoyment. The hon. Gentleman says this Act has worked ill. That is to me quite novel information. Speaking generally, I have received uniform testimony from all persons competent to form an opinion as to its beneficial operation, and I am entitled to say that it has afforded general satisfaction to those for whose benefit it was intended, while the occupiers of mills, almost without exception, have acquiesced in its provisions. Though with respect to any law there will be some transgressions of it, the Act, on the whole, has worked most harmoniously, and has given no occasion to the disputes which before occurred between the millowners and the persons in their employment. I do, therefore, conceive, that it would be most prejudicial to the interests of all parties to reopen this question, and upon the statement of the hon. Gentleman, without any evidence, again to renew those discussions which took place with regard to the Ten Hours Act. I believe the best course for the House to pursue is at once to declare its intention of abiding by the Act of 1850, which has been found to fulfil all the anticipations with which it was passed. The hon. Gentleman says there are persons who violate the law, and the penalties and means of detection are insufficient. I hope the House will mark that the hon. Gentleman said there was only one way in which these infractions of the law could be prevented. And that mode of prevention leads me to the important provision of the Bill by which he proposes now, for the first time, to extend these restrictions, not only to the protected classes, of young persons and children, but to the whole male adult population. The hon. Gentleman says the only effectual plan is to shut up the mills altogether, except during certain hours, and that if the motive power is stopped it will be absolutely impossible for any person to be employed before six o'clock in the morning or after six in the evening in connection with that machinery. But I must beg to ask, is the House prepared, for the first time contrary to its decision on all former occasions, and contrary to the express declaration of those who advocated the interests of the protected classes, to say that no adult operative shall work in future beyond the hour of six o'clock? That is a principle which the House has hitherto refused to recognise, and I hope will refuse to recognise again, as imposing fetters on manufacturing enterprise which may be fatal to the prosperity of the country. The hon. Gentleman proposes to fall back upon the Act of 1847, limiting the hours of labour to ten, and setting aside the arrangement of 1850, without any proof, that the arrangement of 1850 has been productive of any mischief. I am authorised by those who took part in the factory agitation to deprecate this movement as injurious to the interests of those for whom the hon. Gentleman desires to interfere. I trust the House will not consent to disturb the Act of 1850, or apparently sanction the principle of limiting the hours of labour of the adult male population, by allowing this Bill to be introduced, leaving the question in uncertainty, perhaps, until the end of the Session; thereby exciting expectation and creating doubt as to what may be the decision of Parliament upon a case which is fully before them. The House is as competent to say ay or no now, as at Easter, or at the end of the Session, and I hope they will at once express their opinion, and support me in negativing the Motion of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. W. J. FOX said, his hon. colleague (Mr. Cobbett) had so ably brought this subject before the attention of the House, that it was matter of surprise he was not to be allowed to go any further into the subject. They had heard not long ago complaints by the possessors of land that land was unequally taxed, and complaints by the possessors of personal property that personal property was unequally taxed; but the possessors of land and the possessors of personal property could make their voices heard in that House, they could speak for themselves. Now his hon. colleague spoke for those who were obliged to appear by proxy, and whose complaints and desires therefore were more worthy of serious and prolonged consideration. He thought the request was in itself most reasonable. The factory operatives asked for a boon which was granted to them some years ago, and the enjoyment of which failed from no fault of theirs, but from the imperfection with which the measure was drawn, or from the effect of other laws with which it was coupled. Their request was simply that the House should put them in real possession of the boon which the Legislature bestowed, or intended to bestow, upon them, and this appeared to him to be a most well-chosen time to bring the subject under discussion. He considered that it was favourable on two accounts; the cotton-mills were working at short time, and the experiment of further limitation of time might, therefore, be tried now without any danger to those whose capital was invested in such undertakings. That was one reason; another was that the Acts of 1847 and 1850, so far as they had been tried, had had a beneficial operation. The inspectors had had an opportunity of canvassing the operatives as to how they regarded the law of 1847, and he thought they must have found that a large proportion of them, though they might have suffered in their wages, prized the time that was put in their possession much more than any amount of wages they might have lost. He was astonished to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary express his decided hostility to the principle of the Bill. Now, what was the principle of the Bill? Why, it was the very principle which the right hon. Gentleman boasted of having established, and which that House had again and again recognised and sanctioned in its various measures for the regulation of labour in factories. The right hon. Gentleman objected to any restriction upon the moving power in factories, and he called that the principle of the Bill. It was no such thing; it was not the principle of the Bill, but the means by which his hon. colleague proposed to carry his principle into effect. Surely it was incumbent upon the right hon. Gentleman, if he objected to that means of enforcing the principle, to provide his own means; at any rate not to allow the decrees of the Legislature to remain a dead letter for the want of adequate powers to insure obedience to them. Objection was raised on the ground of an assumed previous consent of the operative classes to the Act of 1850. He denied that any such consent had been given. The consent of Lord Ashley was adduced by the right hon. Baronet in confirmation of that statement; but what was the fact? True it was, Lord Ashley did consent to that interpretation of the Bill, but the immediate consequence of it was the disownment of the act of Lord Ashley by the factory operatives and the transference of their cause to other hands. So that remonstrance rather than acquiescence was given to that portion of the measure which regarded the regulation of the labour of male adults. It might be said that the right to regulate his hours of labour was possessed by every individual adult. But how much was it worth? If an individual operative were to refuse to work unless he obtained his own terms, the effect would be to put himself out of employment altogether. It was only by combined action that they could effectually treat with their employers, and it was only by an united effort that they could hope to give effect to their opinions. The factory operatives had accordingly sought to do this by petitioning the House of Commons. They were willing to bargain for ten hours labour per day, but they did not choose to bargain for more. The most able political writer of the day had referred to this case, as the one in which the many might venture to come to the Legislature, in order to give that force, that reality to their wishes and purposes, as to bargaining for their labour, which they were unable to give in their individual capacity. For these reasons he thought that the House should have a proper, an honourable, a kindly regard to the desires of the great mass of the working people. He thought it would be consistent with their own sense of impartiality to treat the subject with that deliberation which its importance demanded, and he trusted that they would not take the advice of the right hon. Baronet, and throw out the measure without hesitation; but that they would allow the measure to come fairly before the House, and enjoy that full discussion which its importance fairly and justly deserved.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he was very much struck with the inconsistency of the argument which the right hon. Baronet (the Home Secretary) had used on the present occasion, and that which he advanced in opposition to the Motion of his right hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire (Sir H. Halford), when he wished to introduce a Bill for the benefit of the working classes connected with the hosiery trade. On that occasion the right hon. Baronet argued that, because that class of labourers was suffering from other causes as well as from the abuses relating to the hours of labour, therefore the evils complained of by his hon. Friend ought to remain unredressed; that because they were suffering from competition they ought also to suffer from unlimited hours of labour. That was the argument by which the right hon. Baronet induced the House to reject the Bill of his hon. Friend, which had for its object the relief of that portion of the working classes. And now, when the

hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Cobbett) came forward with a measure to secure to the working classes the benefits of the Ten Hours Bill which had been passed by the Legislature, up rose the right hon. Baronet and expressed a hope that the House would reject it, because it would interfere with adult labour. The principle of the Bill of 1847 was, of course, recognised by the Legislature; but the right hon. Baronet had now endeavoured to induce the House not to enforce that principle. The right hon. Baronet had admitted that the operation of the Bill in limiting the hours of labour, as regarded women and young persons, had been most satisfactory. Who denied it? It had been satisfactory where it had been properly carried out; but the right hon. Baronet was using the law where it had been effectual as an argument to justify the infraction of it; he adduced the benefit which had been felt by a portion of the working classes from a limitation of labour to ten hours a day as a reason why that benefit should not be extended to all. The right hon. Baronet had not the hardihood to deny the abuses which had taken place, but even while admitting that there had been gross infractions of the law, he had endeavoured to persuade the House to extend the shield of its authority over the guilty parties. He trusted, however, the House would not in the excitement of a foreign war, allow its attention to be diverted from all other subjects, and particularly the very important one then under consideration. The right hon. Baronet had said that the people were contented with the Act of 1847. True, they were content with its principle, but proofs had been adduced, Session after Session, that the law was evaded, and the working classes had called upon the Legislature to consider what means might be adopted that should give effect to the law which should be at once salutary to the working classes and beneficial to the manufacturers who employed them. He remembered, when the Act of 1847 passed, they were told that one-sixth of the exports of manufactured cotton would be struck off; and yet, year after year since that time, millions upon millions had been added to the production of that manufacture. So great, indeed, had been the productive powers of this country in that branch of manufacture that every market was glutted; and it was at such a time that the right hon. Baronet endeavoured to persuade the House to reject this Bill.

Mr. W. J. Fox

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the hon. Gentleman had not quite correctly represented what he had said. He did not say there had been gross infractions of this law, for although he was well aware that almost every law would be violated, generally speaking, this law had been well observed.

MR. ELLIOT said, that the supporters of Lord Ashley's Bill were taxed with having admitted the principle of the limitation of adult labour, but in fact that principle had been always repudiated by them; and though the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Newdegate) said that it was the bonâ fide intention to make ten hours universally the limit of work in factories, yet he was sure that there was no such intention. If the proposal of the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Cobbett) for the stoppage of mills after a certain number of hours was carried out it would work great hardship on the factories in his part of Scotland, where most of the mills were worked by water power, which was not always available, and especially in winter, and the practical effect would be that such mills would most probably only work six hours a day. With regard to the women and children in factories in his part of the country, they were generally in as good health as those employed in agricultural and domestic occupations.

MR. CROSSLEY said, he could speak from experience of the benefit of legislation on this subject. He had for sixteen years attended a factory at six o'clock every morning, and long before any factory legislation he was convinced that twelve hours a day was too long for women and children to work, and the town with which he was connected had shortened their hours of labour before the law came into operation. The system of relays had been tried in Lancashire, though not as far as he knew in Yorkshire, and it had caused great hardships on those persons who were waiting till their turn for work came on. The alteration to ten hours and a half during five days in the week and seven hours and a half on Saturdays, had enabled the people to go home at two o'clock, and had made the number of hours per week sixty instead of fifty-nine, and though there was, therefore, only one hour a week difference between the old and the new plan, if the proposition of the hon. Member for Oldham had been to go back to the old plan he would have voted with him; but his Bill went to the stopping of the motive power at a given time, and he believed you could not do that without causing a great deal of suffering to the labourers themselves. He objected to any legislation for male adults, who were quite able to take care of themselves.

MR. WILKINSON said, the principle of this Motion was akin to that of the Bill proposed by the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Sir H. Halford) the other day, and he objected to that principle generally. The hon. Member for Oldham had argued that it would be better for women and children to work ten hours a day instead of twelve. Of course it would, and he only wished that they could work only eight hours. This question ought to be considered in the interest both of the employer and the workman; but he would take it as regarded the workman only, and looking only to that, he thought the true principle was, that the workman should be at liberty freely to contract to work for such a length of time as would ensure him good wages. He, therefore, trusted the House would reject the Bill.

MR. BRIGHT said, he would only make one or two observations on the Motion before the House. The hon. Member for Oldham proposed to disturb a question which most reasonable and patriotic people had hoped was settled for a very long time, if not for ever. The hon. Gentleman appeared to have two objects in view. He proposed to diminish the time of working, not, as the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Crossley) said, by one hour, but by two. He (Mr. Bright) was not able to see the difference which was said to be made by the arrangements of the Saturday under the Bill of 1847; but he took it that instead of sixty hours a week it was to be fifty-eight. The whole matter, then, in dispute was two hours in the week. This question had been much discussed in that House and in the country, and in that House it had been treated as a party question with more than ordinary bitterness, and in the country it had been made a question in which men were hot and fierce in their mutual denunciations of each other. In 1850 the question was understood to have been settled by one of these compromises by which many questions were settled in that House—Lord Ashley being a party to it on the one side, and a large number of the manufacturers on the other. The hon. Member for Oldham said that Lord Ashley was disowned by those who had previously given him their confidence. It was quite true that certain persons had pledged themselves to an agitation, and felt that the object they had contended for was not actually and literally fulfilled; but he (Mr. Bright) did not believe for a moment that anybody in Lancashire would say the factory workers disowned Lord Ashley in consequence of the part he had taken in that Bill. And more than that, he was perfectly sure, being himself an opponent of that Bill, but not on the pultry consideration of the slight gain of those few hours a week, that Lord Ashley did that which the most educated and best informed of the factory population believed to be the best for their case. It was something, surely, to obtain, that a large number of the manufacturers and spinners who had opposed that Bill should agree to its settlement on any terms whatever. There was no person connected, as a capitalist, with the cotton, woollen, silk, or flax trades, that had ever proposed in any way to disturb the fundamental principle of that Act, or to hinder its operation. Was it not better for that House and for the factory workers, to have a law of sixty hours a week, which men agreed generally to abide by and not to disturb, than to have attempts again made which might, after a few years, be successful, or might fail speedily, to obtain a law of fifty-eight hours a week, at the cost of disturbing all the harmony which now, happily, existed upon this question, in spite of what the hon. Member for Oldham said, among the capitalists employing and the employed population of Lancashire? He did not think there was any man, without strong partisan views, who would not agree that it was better to allow the question to settle where it was, than to stir up in the manufacturing districts the fires of discord, a thousand times more perilous and pernicious than any grievance of two hours a week could be. The hon. Member had another proposition, that the steam-engine should be stopped at a certain time, so that not only no woman or child, but no grown-up man, should work beyond that hour! But there were many cases in which more than one trade was carried on in a mill, and the mill was occupied by more than one firm. There was often, perhaps, one room in a mill where the machinery, worked by the same steam power, differed entirely from that of the other rooms, and was worked by a different class of workpeople, and by adult men. Did the hon. Member mean to ask the House, under the pretence of legislating for women and young persons, to stop the steam-engine and all those workmen—for, without opening a door to the widest evasion, no exception could be made? Did he mean to ask the House to shut up that mill, where A B, employing only adult men, was on a separate floor from C D, and using the same power,—must they all be brought under the same law? Much had been said of the advantages which had accrued to the working classes from the diminution of their toil by one hour or an hour and a half in the day—advantages which he (Mr. Bright) would not deny, to those who were temperate and well disposed, as the great bulk of them were. But the hon. Member had made out no case for such an extreme measure as this, which would hinder the working of some hundreds of thousands of adult men. There were many cases now in his recollection in which it would have that effect. The hon. Member had said that this was a convenient time to try such experiments as he proposed, because the cotton trade was not very brisk now. Why, one would have thought that a condition of languor and partial exhaustion was not the time for a wise physician to try the endurance of his patient. There were, unfortunately, times when adult men worked not more than six hours a day, because the Australian, or the Indian, or the home market, had happened to fail. But would a paternal legislature, because those men now worked short time, at reduced wages, to the loss of their families, say to those grown-up, intelligent men who had families to care for, and who were anxious to maintain their independence, when a revival of trade came, that they should not be permitted to recover their position by working a single hour in the day longer than the ten hours prescribed to them? Why, if he (Mr. Bright) set up for a patriot and tribune of the people, he would have a better principle and better objects to advocate than those. Whenever he met his constituents, he had always said about this Bill, that he always disapproved of such legislation as extremely perilous, whatever good it might do; but that since the question had been settled by a judicious compromise and compact, which Parliament were resolved to maintain, he would not abet, in any way, any Motion to disturb the settlement of 1850; and he had always found that answer satisfactory in Lancashire. Now, he would assert, from his knowledge of those districts, that the masters themselves were disposed to carry out that Act in a manner which exceeded, he believed, in their duty to the law, what was found with regard to any other Act that ever was forced upon any persons, of so unpalatable a character. He regarded this as a most unfortunate proposition, chiefly because it disturbed that harmony which he should be the last to interfere with. He had been a strong opponent of the present law; but he would not be the man to move or second any Motion having for its object to disturb the duration of labour fixed upon by the Bill of 1850. He would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary or to anybody else, in support of his declaration, that if he considered the vast interests involved, the technicalities of that law, the insulting nature of the inspectorship carried on, in a most insulting manner, by the most injudicious servant which the Government could have to carry out the intentions of Parliament—he spoke, and he had no wish to conceal the name, of Mr. Horner—yet, under all the insolence and annoyance of that gentleman's character, he maintained that law had been carried out by the manufacturers of Lancashire and Yorkshire in a spirit as complete and as fair as Parliament could have expected. He did not believe—he said it conscientiously and frankly—that there was the slightest necessity, upon any ground, for asking Parliament to reopen this question, and to stir up again those elements of discord which if he thought were to be stirred up, and worked out to their dangerous results, he would himself be glad to leave the country, and to live somewhere else, where labour and capital were allowed to fight their own battle on their own ground, without legislative interference.

MR. E. BALL said, he thought that the observations which had just fallen from the hon. Member for Manchester, did not tend in the slightest degree to lessen the force of those facts and those statements which had been put forward by the hon. Member for Oldham. That hon. Member had not come to ask the House for a revival of the law—he had simply come to state that the existing law had not been observed; and in support of that statement he had produced the reports of the inspectors to demonstrate that the law had been violated, while he had also informed the House that no less a number of petitions than 1,083 had been presented to have the law of 1850 fully carried out.

The poorer classes complained of the violation of the law, and were they, he would ask—the representatives of the people—to turn around upon the poor, and tell them that they would not lend an ear to their complaints? The hon. Member for Oldham merely asked for leave to bring forward a certain proposition for their consideration, and to lay the case of the manufacturing classes fairly before the House. Neither the hon. Member nor the petitioners sought for re-legislation upon the subject—they merely asked that the law, as it stood, should be observed; and in his opinion it would be by no means satisfactory to the country that they should repudiate the claims of their poorer fellow-subjects. The hon. Member for Manchester had made so many various prophecies which had been so entirely falsified by the result, that he thought it would be rather an amusing occupation to enter into an examination of those prophecies. From 1847 to 1850 there had been considerable opposition offered to legislation upon the subject of factories; and the hon. Member for Manchester had then, among other things, stated that he could not conceive anything more dreadful than to practise such a delusion upon the operatives as was sought to be practised through the medium of a measure which, instead of conferring upon them a benefit, would be the means of causing, as far as regarded them, greater evils than any measure which that House had ever entertained. Such had been the prognostication of the hon. Member for Manchester before the Bill of 1850 had come into effect; and what, notwithstanding the hon. Gentleman's prophecy, had been the result of that measure? He found that the result had been, in the case of the cotton manufacture alone, an increase in the first year after the alteration of the law had been made, of from 350,000,000 lb. to 591,000,000 lb. in the consumption of cotton; while in the next year the quantity consumed had amounted to 648,000,000 lb. But it was not the amount of cotton alone that was to be taken into account in calculating the results of the measure of 1850. He found, that under the operation of that measure, the number of power-looms had increased from 115,182 to 298,916, and that they still continued to increase, notwithstanding the prognostications of ruin and devastation as to the consequence of any alteration in the law of the hon. Member for Manchester. He also found that the number of new factories constructed since the passing of the measure of 1850 amounted to 255, and that fact, as well as the others to which he had called the attention of the House, seemed to demonstrate the advantages which must result from carrying the law as rigorously as possible into effect. The House ought not, therefore, to hesitate to take into its consideration a question which intimately concerned the well-being of numbers of the poorer classes in the community. To do so would be an insult to the poor, a disgrace to the country, and would cast a stigma upon the House itself.

Viscount PALMERSTON said, that one of the grounds upon which the proposition of the hon. Member rested was, that the law, as it now stood, was grossly violated. Now, it was his duty, when he held the office of Home Secretary, to watch the enforcement of this particular law; and he was bound to say that, although there were many instances in which some small violations of the law took place, still those violations were very small in amount, and they were carefully watched by the inspectors. Many of the violations were, that some steam-engine began to work five minutes too soon, or continued to work five minutes too long in the evening, and some little odds and ends in that way; and although he did not say that advantages were not unduly gained by those who adopted those means, still they were not such instances as could be put forward as violations which should induce the House of Commons to alter the existing law. There was evidently a great distinction between the restrictions placed upon the hours of work of females and young persons and male adults, and the principle upon which Parliament had acted in legislating upon the subject had been that persons of tender years could not properly be considered as free agents, and that it was necessary, therefore, to restrict their hours of labour; but that with respect to adult men, who were perfectly competent to take care of their own interests and to make their own bargains, there could not be a more vicious principle than that of the House of Commons interposing between labour and capital, between the employer and the employed, and saying that a certain limit should be fixed, and should not be transgressed upon any account, either by the willing labourer or willing employer. He thought such a principle both vicious and wrong, and should be sorry that that House should so far encourage the establishment of this principle as to allow the hon. Gentleman, after the full explanation he had given of his Bill, to introduce it merely for the purpose, as he could not doubt, of seeing it rejected on the second reading. He quite agreed with the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright) that when the House had come to settlement of a great question involving the interests and feelings of large classes of people, and when, after long debate and much anxious discussion, a system had been established, it was unwise to disturb that compromise, except upon very much stronger grounds than those which had been put forward by the hon. Member who proposed to introduce the present Bill, and he should, therefore, certainly give his vote against the introduction of the measure.

Mr. COBBETT, in reply, denied that any compromise had been entered into by the factory workpeople in 1850—they were no parties to what had been called the "Compromise Act;" but, so far as they had time to do it, had protested against it in every form. At the time when the announcement was made in the House by the right hon. Baronet (Sir G. Grey), which was early in May, 1850, the delegates of the working people were assembled in London, and he (Mr. Cobbett) would read to the House a Resolution come to by them on learning that Lord Ashley had given his assent to the right hon. Baronet's proposal for a Ten-and-a-half Hours' Bill. The paper was in these words—

"2, Northumberland Court, Strand, London,
"May 8, 1850.

"It having been communicated by Lord Ashley to the factory delegates now assembled that he has determined to accept the Government proposition, it was unanimously resolved by the delegates—"That the delegates now assembled are of opinion that the factory workers will never consent to any variation from the limitation of ten hours per day and fifty-eight hours per week, unless it be to further shorten the duration of labour."

"THOMAS PIT, Chairman of the delegates."

There was, then, no compromise on the part of the working men, because the proposition was repudiated by their delegates in London as soon as it was announced, and Lord Ashley's adhesion to it was condemned in the paper that he had just read to the House. Besides this, petitions against the so-called compromise came in from all parts of the manufacturing districts, praying the House not to pass the Bill. One petition came from masters alone, signed by a large body of employers of working people, earnestly entreating the House not to interfere with a measure that had worked so well. The masters, the clergy, the merchants, and other inhabitants of Bradford, petitioned to the same effect. Three hundred over-lookers of Manchester did the same. In short, the working people and a very large body of masters and others protested against that Bill, which the right hon. Baronet and the hon. Member for Manchester now insisted was a compromise to which the working people themselves were parties. He (Mr. Cobbett) had never been able to discover who, if there were a compromise, had acted the part of go-between—who it was that had been the parties to the arrangement. The Earl of Derby distinctly asked the question in another place, but failed to make the discovery. He (Mr. Cobbett), however, had read a curious passage in a speech of the hon. Member for Manchester, made at a meeting of his working constituents in Manchester on the 8th of June, 1852. The hon. Member was on his rounds previously to the general election, and the working people catechised him rather strictly upon the subject of his invariable opposition to factory legislation, whereupon the hon. Member made the statement that he would now read—

"The short hours of labour having been agreed to by a compromise, to which he as well as Lord Shaftesbury were parties, he was no longer an opponent, but was willing to do everything in his power that the law should have a fair trial."

This passage he took from The Times of the 12th of June, 1852, and it occurred to him at once that the secret was now out; that we now knew who the compromisers were—namely, the hon. Member himself and Lord Shaftesbury—but did they obtain the assent of the working people?

MR. BRIGHT here explained, that all that he had meant upon the occasion alluded to was, that he acquiesced in what had been done by others. A Secretary of State, he presumed, was the mediating party.

MR. COBBETT thought that as the hon. Member spoke so positively of a compromise, and of the very parties to it, he must know something more of the manner of bringing it about than he now professed to do; and he (Mr. Cobbett) had been driven to the conclusion that the hon. Gentleman who spoke of himself as a "party" to the compromise with Lord Shaftesbury was what he represented himself to his constituents to be—one of the parties who effected that which was now called a compromise, but in which the working people were certainly no parties at all. All that he wished now to do was, to get back for the people what had been taken from them in 1850—namely, the half hour per day; and he wished also to make that secure to them by various provisions for ensuring the means of thorough inspection of the mills. He wished, in short, to make it—what the late Mr. Bolling said it should be—a tight Bill, and he thought he had said enough to show that even manufacturers themselves considered that nothing but a restriction on the moving power could accomplish this. He was not, however, obstinately bent on thrusting this Bill on the House. He wished it to be read a first and second time, and thoroughly discussed clause by clause in Committee, and if the House thought any clause uncalled for or too stringent, let it be struck out. He would not abandon the Bill, even though the clause restricting the moving power should be struck out; but let the whole Bill be discussed. The hon. Member for Manchester had pointed out certain cases where this clause would interfere with the labour of adults working in the same building. The hon. Member had not seen the clause: how could he know what he asserted? There were exceptions made in it to obviate such cases, and such exceptions would be easily extended. The hon. Member had also deprecated the revival of the bitter discussions that had already characterised factory debates. He (Mr. Cobbett) remembered that there had been great bitterness displayed on the subject of limiting the labour of females and children so as to be compatible with their strength, and it surprised him that such a subject should excite bitterness in any quarter, and he did not think it would occur again if the hon. Gentleman himself would deal with it in a more temperate manner than he had done. He (Mr. Cobbett) promised that in any future discussion on the same subject he would treat it as he had hitherto done, without any bitterness of feeling or intemperate language, and he hoped the hon. Member for Manchester would condescend to take a lesson from him.

THE ARMY IN THE CRIMEA.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE, in moving for an address for Copies of any Despatches or correspondence that had passed between Field Marshal Lord Raglan and the Minister for War relative to the wants of the army in the Crimea, said, he would shortly state the reasons which induced him to ask the House to assist him in obtaining these documents. The House would recollect that a few days ago he had asked the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War, whether there would be any objection to lay upon the table the correspondence that had passed between Lord Raglan and the Minister of War relative to the wants of the army in the Crimea. To that inquiry the hon. Gentleman gave an extremely unsatisfactory answer, for he stated that he objected to the production of the papers because it would not be right to produce a portion of the correspondence, and the House ought, therefore, to wait until the Government was prepared to produce the whole of it. Now, he wished to know, when the Government would be prepared to do so, and who the Government might be when that time arrived ? He did not want the whole correspondence, he only asked for such extracts as related to the wants of the army and the causes of the disasters which had befallen it; he did not want those portions which related to other subjects. His principal reason for asking for it was the great interest and anxiety on the subject which existed not only in this country, but also among the officers of the army in the Crimea. It was stated that representations had been made not only to head quarters at home, but also to Lord Raglan, with regard to the wants of the army, the clothing, food, and medicine—and also with regard to the ambulance department, and many persons thought his Lordship had not attended to those representations. He was not one of those who believed that Lord Raglan was wanting in humanity, as it had been represented in some of the public prints; any one who knew that noble Lord must know that he was of a perfectly contrary disposition. He knew from officers who had served with his Lordship in the Peninsula, that if he were now indifferent to the wants of his men he must be very much altered, because, if he ever had exceeded his duty, it had always been upon the side of too much consideration for the men under his command. He believed that Lord Raglan had made representations to the Government of the wants of the army; he could not believe that the Duke of Newcastle had been indifferent or had not attended to these representations, for he could have no interest in withholding what was asked for; and he (Mr. Duncombe) had a right to assume that the stores of food, clothing, and medicine, had been supplied. The non-production of these papers, which might exonerate Lord Raglan and the Duke of Newcastle, was most unfair to those noblemen. With whom did the blame rest ? He believed that these papers, if produced, would show that those whose duty it was to attend to the wants of the army in the Crimea—the Commissariat, the quartermaster general, and the adjutant general—were to blame in many particulars. He should like to know whether it was true, that the French had lent the English army 10,000 great coats; whether the French had been obliged to bake the bread for our soldiers; and also, whether they did not convey our sick and wounded soldiers in their ambulances. He should also like to know the state of our ambulance department. They had a Committee sitting upstairs, and had he been on that Committee, the first thing that he should have asked for would have been the correspondence between the Minister for War and the Commander of the Forces. It would have served as a guide, and should the House consent to its being laid on the table, the next step he considered would be to refer it to the Committee. The production of the correspondence might exonerate Lord Raglan, but it would inculpate, he believed, the Commissariat; and, if it did so, a punishment ought to be inflicted. In the case of the two soldiers at Chatham who were charged with having wasted their ammunition—which was, no doubt, a military offence—in firing at a figure of the late Emperor of Russia, one of them was sentenced to sixty days imprisonment with hard labour, and the other to forty days; and even-handed justice would also require that these through whose negligence and incompetence the army had been sacrificed should also receive punishment. He trusted that the House would support him in compelling the Under Secretary for War to place the correspondence to which the Motion referred on the table.

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies of any Despatches or Correspondence that has passed between Field Marshal Lord Raglan and the Minister for War, relative to the Wants of the Army in the Crimea."

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, having agreed to the appointment of the Committee upstairs, I can, of course, have no desire, or intention, to withhold from Parliament any information which may be necessary for the full investigation of all those matters for which the Committee was appointed to inquire into. I am sure the House will see that it cannot be useful to carry on two inquiries parallel with each other at the same time. The House might have adopted the course of taking the inquiry into its own hands, and then hon. Members might have moved for such written documents as they thought desirable to notice, and they might have examined witnesses at the bar, and inquired into all these matters; but the House determined to appoint a Committee, and delegated to that Committee all the powers which the House possessed. The Committee has full power to call for all these documents, or any other papers which they may think it necessary to have in pursuing the performance of their duties. I therefore submit to the House that it will be far better to leave these papers and writings to be dealt with by the Committee. The Committee will judge of the information which it has before it in investigating all these matters. The Government will grant all those papers and documents in which is not involved political matters which may be inconvenient or dangerous to the public service; I therefore submit to the House that it will be far better to leave these papers in the hands of the Committee, who will exercise their own judgment as to the course which they will pursue, and the proceedings which they will adopt.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he must humbly beg leave to demur to the doctrine laid down by his noble Friend, that the hands of the House were to be tied by the Committee. He (Mr. Milnes) had from the first seen the great danger of difficulties arising from this or any Government being enabled to refuse information, on the excuse of a Committee sitting upstairs. That anticipation had been, to a great extent, already fulfilled; and it would be necessary, on that or on some future occasion, to prevent that conclusion from being more fully carried out. The Committee was only now at the commencement of its inquiry; it might last the whole Session, and the Report would probably be deferred till the end of the present or some time in the course of the succeeding Session. Was the House, then, to be prevented from discussing any matter relating to those great transactions which were now causing the hearts of the people of England to palpitate? Were they to wait upon the progress of the inquiry, and was every step of the House on such a momentous question to be subordinated to what might happen in a Committee upstairs? The country really demanded that some of the correspondence between Lord Raglan and the Minister of War should be laid on the table. The character of that gallant commander was not merely imperilled by what had occurred, but the root of all the evil that had led to so much misery and confusion lay in the circumstance that the people of England were not allowed to know, in the frank and open manner to which the spirit of our institutions entitled them, what had been the real defections in the Crimea, what it was that had been asked for there, and what had or had not been supplied. Day after day they had been left without any other official information on these all-important affairs, but what they could glean from those meagre and scanty despatches—for such they undeniably were—proceeding from the commander of our troops. All that they knew beyond what was thus communicated as to the state of our army in the East was derived from those indirect channels which some thought ought to be closed altogether—the organs of the daily press. Where, in all Lord Raglan's despatches, excepting in one solitary instance, had they any record of fraud that had been detected, of incompetence that had been reprimanded, or inespacety that had been superseded? Where were the proofs that he had exercised that vigilant supervision over matters which perhaps, after all, he had exercised, and found himself thwarted, it might be, by great impediments that all his talents could not overcome? So, again, with the Government at home. The Duke of Newcastle would have done well for his own reputation, and that of his Friends in the late Cabinet, if he had not allowed these affairs to come out by chance communications, but had laid on the table such a selection, at least, from the correspondence between himself and the Commander in Chief at the seat of war as might not affect our great military operations, or endanger the interests of the public service. This question seriously involved the character of public men in this country, and especially that of those right hon. Gentlemen who had lately seceded from the Government, and stood at this moment, as it were, at the bar of public opinion. Above all, it affected the commanders of our army, in whom if we had not confidence, how was the cause of this country likely to prosper in the future military operations to be undertaken? Therefore, for the sake of our Ministers and our commanders, as well as for the best interests of the country, his noble Friend should pause before he refused even a modified assent to the present Motion, and said that it must be left to depend upon the mere will of some Member of a Committee upstairs, whether that information upon which the heart of the country was set should or should not be suffered to transpire. The Committee, no doubt, would ultimately reveal the mystery better than some of those who resisted it imagined; but at the same time it would not be just either to that House or to the public that the proceedings of any Committee should stop the progress of that House in demanding what it had a perfect right to demand; or that, while the House was prevented by its own forms from alluding to what passed in the inquiry, the Committee should be permitted to exercise an exclusive right and domination over all those questions with which the House was told it must not interfere.

MR. PACKE said, he fully agreed with the noble Lord at the head of the Government in thinking that, as the House had delegated the inquiry to a Committee, with power to call for all papers, documents, and records, it would only be fair and straightforward to leave the Committee to conduct the investigation to a close.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, that if any Member of the Committee would give the House an assurance that these papers would be moved for, he would not trouble the House to divide.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, that there was no reason for assuming that the Committee would not do its duty.

Question put and negatived.
The House adjourned at Twelve o'clock.

TRANSPORT OF HORSES TO THE EAST.

THE EARL OF ALBEMARLE moved for a Return of the mode of Shipment to the East of horses intended for Military Purposes. His object in moving for these returns was to endeavour to persuade his noble Friend the Minister of War, if not to abandon the present mode of shipping horses to the East, at least to give fair trial to the system of transport adopted at Hull. Although he could hardly expect to imbue his noble Friend with the objections he entertained to the Government system, he hoped to persuade him that it was productive of great and unnecessary cruelty to the horses and cost to the country. There were two material points of difference between the Government system and the Hull system. In the first place, the Government allowed the cavalry horses a width of only two feet "in the clear," while the horses in private trade were allowed a width sometimes of three feet, sometimes of three and a half feet, and even of four feet. He would here anticipate an objection that would naturally suggest itself—namely, that the effect of doubling the space would be to double the expense; but he thought he should be able to prove satisfactorily that the expense of the Hull system was considerably—perhaps one-third—less than that of the plan now adopted by the Government. The other important point of difference between the two systems was, that the cavalry horses were not allowed to lie down, no matter what might be the length of the voyage. Let their Lordships consider the expense of the system now practised by the transport department. First of all a platform must be provided for the horses to stand upon, besides a number of pillars, posts, and rails, as each horse was so wedged in between four pillars that he was hardly able to move. In order to prevent the effects of the great friction which must take place, Government went to a great expense in sheepskins, and each horse was also provided with a set of slings to keep him upon his legs in bad weather. He would ask any noble Lord who was at all acquainted with the management of horses what was likely to be the result of breaking the rest of a horse for five or six weeks together, and what would be the state of its sinews and tendons when it had been placed in a constrained position for so long a period? The Hull merchants were perfectly aware of the antiquated system of the Government, and had been so for forty-five years—ever since it had been adopted—and if there had been anything worth a farthing in it they would naturally have adopted it. They had not, however, adopted it, because they knew it too well; they knew the evils that had arisen from it during the last war and the injury it had inflicted upon the cavalry horses, and they were, therefore, too wise to allow their valuable cargoes to incur so much risk. The cargoes they had to deal with were frequently of the most valuable description, some horses costing as much as from 3,000*l.* to 4,000*l.*, being the best blood that could be purchased for money. He would relate one anecdote in illustration of the opinion which practical men entertained of the Government plan, not only in 1854 and 1855, but as far back as 1814, when the allied Sovereigns visited this country. The late Emperor of Russia, then the Grand Duke Nicholas, having purchased fifteen valuable horses, intrusted them for shipment to Russia to Mr. Thomas Kirby, who was well known in the trade, to which he had now belonged for fifty years—at that, as at the present time, being one of the principal exporters of horses from England, and, of course, a man of thorough experience. The Government of that period placed a transport at the disposal of His Imperial Highness, and the Grand Duke told Mr. Kirby that if he would take out the horses to St. Petersburg all the spare room in the ship should be at his disposal. Mr. Kirby went to Deptford with Mr. Goodwin, a gentleman who belonged to the Royal establishment in 1814, and served under a near and dear relative of his (the Earl of Albemarle's), who, in the reign of King William IV., and in the early part of the reign of Her present Majesty, held the office of the Master of the Horse, and was much benefited by Mr. Goodwin's advice in all matters connected with horses. At Deptford they saw Captain Young, who was the officer appointed to receive the horses, and found a magnificent vessel fitted up with what he could not help calling the Government instruments of torture. Mr. Kirby objected to this mode of fitting up, and said that if he were not allowed to break down all the posts and pillars he would not accept the offer which had been made him, as he never allowed any horses to go a great distance without lying down. The officer refused to alter the arrangements, and Mr. Kirby refused the gratuitous transport, and chartered a vessel for 500*l.*, in which he carried the horses in perfect safety upon the Hull plan. He must express some little astonishment at the course which had been pursued by his noble Friend's predecessors in the War Department; because he should have supposed that, when a prospect arose of war breaking out and a necessity occurred of shipping horses to a great distance from this country, the Government would have obtained the latest intelligence upon the subject, particularly when that intelligence could be obtained at Hull at not more than a few hours' journey from London. If Her Majesty's advisers would not adopt the plan pursued there, they might, at least, have made themselves masters of it, instead of which they immediately adopted the antiquated system of forty-five years ago, a system under which a transport so far as Constantinople had never been contemplated; for it must be remembered that the plan, bad as it was, had never been intended for the shipment of horses beyond the coast of Spain. It might, perhaps, have done very well for horses during a voyage of four or five days to be "cabined, cribbed, confined," in this manner; but it never could have been contemplated that they should be put to such torture for four or five weeks together. It was very difficult to obtain a correct list of the casualties that took place in the army or navy. He had been in the profession for forty years, and he knew that men who looked for honourable employment were cautious in giving any intelligence that might be injurious to them; but he would refer to matters of common notoriety. He would take the case of the 17th Lancers. A gentleman, well acquainted with horses, had seen the 17th Lancers, 250 in number, just before they left England, and he said that horses in better condition or better fitted for the journey it would have been impossible to find. They went in a variety of ships but out of that number twenty-three troopers and two chargers had died upon the passage, and seventy or eighty more, as he understood, soon after landing. He would venture to say that nothing like that number of casualties had occurred in the whole horse trade of Hull during the last fifty years. He would not go into the evidence which his noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Lucan) had given the other day before a Committee; but was not the horrible mortality that had taken place upon the occasions to which he had referred notorious and appalling? Under the Hull system it would have been impossible, for the horses would have been between instead of on the decks. He was told if he got these returns that they would not prove much, as some said that the loss had been 5, and others 2 per cent; but he wished to know why there should be any percentage when no such allowance was made for casualties in the Hull trade? He thought, however, that the most important question, and it was one of vital importance, was, whether the horses were fit for use on landing, and did they come to hand in that sound state in which the horses were universally acknowledged to do that were conveyed under the Hull system? Here was a question that was easy of solution, for he saw opposite the noble Earl (the Earl of Lucan) who had lately commanded the cavalry in the East, and he should like to ask him in what condition were the horses when they were disembarked in Turkey—were they fit for immediate duty? and had he not found it necessary to employ horses that had been some time on shore to do the work of the new arrivals? He now wished to state that in the year 1819 Mr. Goodwin, from whom he had got his information, was sent for professionally by some person connected with the Royal establishment at St. Petersburg to perform some nice operation on a horse belonging to the late Emperor. Mr. Goodwin was accompanied by a Russian officer, and took his passage from Hull; and he then, for the first time, saw the mode in which the Hull shippers conveyed their horses. The mode might simply be described by saying that it was not the Government plan, and that no posts, rails, platforms, slings, sheepskins, or any such expensive or useless paraphernalia, were employed. The ship in which Mr. Goodwin went over was of only 300 tons. The horses were placed in the hold, and stood on shingle and sand mixed, being only separated by rails bound over with spun yarn, and the hold presented the appearance of a stable on shore in which there was a pressure for room. After a stormy passage of five weeks these horses were landed in as good condition as when they started. Mr. Goodwin remained in St. Petersburg for two years, and saw the unshipping of a variety of cargoes of horses, but during the whole of that time he never witnessed a single accident. Last year, when the war broke out, Mr. Goodwin was anxious to press the subject on the Government, and he first made some inquiries as to the practices of the Hull shippers, and he received a letter from Mr. Thomas Kirby, aged eighty-four years, who had for fifty years been engaged in the horse export trade, and who had been for twenty-two years in the habit of conveying horses to St. Petersburg; his letter was written on the 14th of March, 1854, and was as follows—

"I know that the way that Government has of shipping the transport horses is shocking, for I remember well, some years ago, when I was returning from St. Petersburg, we had to wait some time at Elsinore for the convoy, and, at the same time, there were some English ships there with some Government horses, which they were bringing from Hanover. By some way or other they got to know of my being there, and they sent for me to go on board, and then they told me what a quantity of horses they had that died; which I did not wonder at, seeing the horses jammed together as they were, with their heads in midships, and their tails to the ship's sides, and their legs swelled as big as their bodies, with all the filth and dirt behind them. You have been told if they lie down they cannot get up again. I am sure you yourself are aware that a horse may drop in a three-feet standing, but I defy him to rise in that room. I then sent the carpenters on board to work to pull down the stalls and put the mangers to the ship's sides, and to get all the dirt and filth out of the ship; gave the horses more room in the stalls, so that they could lie down and get up, and, after that, I heard no more of any horses dying. Now, if horses in a short voyage like that would drop, what would they do in a long voyage to Constantinople? I have often thought within myself that, should these horses be alive when landed, they would be of no use. I have myself been in the habit of taking horses to St. Petersburg on my own speculation, and of sending horses to the Russian Government for the last fifty years. I once took forty over in a merchant ship, and landed them all as fresh as when they were put on board for the voyage. We take as many rum puncheons for water casks as we have horses, which will last three weeks; the casks were buried in the ballast in midships, where we could get to them when wanted; as for corn and hay, you may calculate for the length of voyage they are going to take."

In a second letter, written on the 17th of March, 1854, Mr. Kirby stated—

"I was myself in the habit of going with horses to St. Petersburg on my own speculation, for twenty-two years, both in war time and in peace, and never had but one horse die on board—but one in the whole time—and mostly landed them as well or better than when they were shipped, and always allowed each horse four feet, so that he could lie down and get up again. The manger was fastened to the ship's side, a ring and staple driven into the ship's side to fasten the horse to, as he would be as if in a stable. Nothing was put behind the horse, but to let him have full liberty, for after the horse had been on board two or three days he will get the movements of the ship: and the horses to windward, when the ship is rolling, will have their hind legs sometimes a yard behind them, and the horses to leeward will have their fore legs a yard before them. In bad weather I should prevent the horses lying down as much as I could, for the motion of the ship keeps their limbs in action. Horses shipped and treated as above, after a voyage of a month or six weeks, will be fit to go into any use required. Since I gave over going to St. Petersburg with horses I have bought horses and shipped them for the Russian Government, for which I have paid 33,000*l.*, and never lost one of them."

Mr. Goodwin received a letter from Captain Jackson, who was born at Moscow, and had for twenty-six years been engaged in the horse export trade; his name was well known in Russia from the fame acquired by the horses he had exported into that country. In his letter, written on the 15th of March, 1854, Captain Jackson said—

"In sailing vessels the horses are stowed in the hold (the ship being previously ballasted with casks filled with fresh water for the use of the horses) made level with sand, &c. They stand, without slinging, on each side of the ship in separate stalls, as in a stable, leaving a passage in the centre for the grooms. My horses have always had sufficient room to lie down when disposed, and have never suffered any injury, however valuable; but, on the contrary, have been much benefited. I have been as long as twenty-eight days at sea. My father and myself have shipped considerably more than 1,000 in this manner. Hay and straw are stowed on rafters in the hold, above the horses; corn at each end. The watertanks, as emptied, are filled with salt water to keep the ship ballasted. The size of the stalls in sailing vessels is eight feet in length by four in width. No upright stalling required."

A third letter had also been received from Captain Keghly, who had for sixteen years conveyed horses to St. Petersburg, and he confirmed the statements made in the two former letters. The sailing vessels employed by the Government only conveyed sixty horses, if they were of 600 tons burthen, and thirty-two if they were of 300 tons burthen, while vessels of 900 tons and upwards took out no more animals than those of 600 tons. It was obvious, therefore, that there had been a great waste of tonnage and an unnecessary degree of expense. At present the horses were embarked at Woolwich, and occasionally at Portsmouth, instead of being shipped, as they should be, at Plymouth or Falmouth, in order to abridge the length of the sea voyage, and to avoid the detention that frequently occurred in the river and in the Channel. Surely, on the ground of expense it would be better to embark them at the latter ports, seeing that three or four weeks were now often lost in getting as far as the Land's End, causing great wear and tear of horse flesh as well as unnecessarily prolonging the employment of ships' tonnage. The noble Earl concluded by moving—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, for Return of the Number of Horses shipped to the Seat of War by Her Majesty's Government in Sailing or Steam Transports for Military Purposes during the Year 1854, the Amount of the Tonnage of and the Number of Horses conveyed in each Vessel, the Number of Horses that died on the Passage or were rendered unserviceable in each Vessel, the Average Duration of Voyage of each Steam or Sailing Vessel, and the Average Expense of the Transport of each Horse."

THE EARL OF LUCAN quite agreed with the noble Earl who had just sat down, that all horses which were shipped for so distant a place as Constantinople ought to have the sea voyage as short as possible. Indeed, there could not be two opinions on the question. He was perfectly ignorant of the Hull system, as it was called, and he, in point of fact, never heard of it until two or three days ago. He did not quite understand the noble Earl with respect to the number of horses embarked in each transport.

THE EARL OF ALBEMARLE explained that according to the Government plan from 17 tons to 20 tons were required for each horse; whilst under the Hull plan not more than 10 tons and a fraction were required.

THE EARL OF LUCAN: Then in sailing transports more than 10 tons were allotted to each horse. He thought 10 tons were quite enough, and that there had been a great waste of money in not embarking as many horses as each transport would carry. The noble Earl, however, argued as if it were intended to continue the conveyance of horses in sailing vessels; but it was sincerely to be hoped that the Government did not mean to adhere to that plan. The serious losses that had been sustained from the employment of sailing vessels, and the successful voyages that had, on the other hand, been performed by the steamers, conclusively showed the inferiority of the first-named mode of transport. The Himalaya arrived at Constantinople with the 7th Dragoon Guards and a detachment of artillery; and though she carried more than 400 horses on board she only lost one animal on the voyage. Again, the Jason, with a battery and a half of artillery, carried 237 horses, and only lost one of them. In the passage from Turkey to the Crimea he had no recollection of the horses having suffered any losses in the steam transports. In fact, nothing could be more perfect than the fitting up of the Government steam vessels which, during the last twelve months, had carried not only the English cavalry, but the French also, and rendered a very large amount of other transport service; and yet none of them had lost on an average more than one-half per cent of the whole number of animals conveyed. The system having thus worked so admirably, it would be most unwise and very hazardous to depart from it in order to resort to any other mode—although he certainly was not acquainted with the Hull system.

LORD PANMURE said, as far as it was a question of transporting horses by steam vessels or by sailing vessels, he entirely concurred in the views of the noble Earl opposite. There could be no doubt, that, when steam vessels were at command, from their greater capacity between decks, the shortness of their voyages, and all the conveniences which existed, the suffering to the horses was much less than in sailing vessels, and that the fittings were much more complete. The noble Earl, however, seemed to think that Government had steam vessels at their command to send out all the horses which were required. He must beg very much to disabuse the noble Earl of that belief. A sufficient number of steam vessels for that purpose were not at the command of Government. Government had taken as many as they could obtain with reference to the necessities of the other services; but the greater number of the horses which had been shipped from this country had been conveyed in sailing vessels, and a vast proportion of the horses which still remained to be transported must of necessity find their way to the East in sailing vessels. Now, if they were to go in sailing vessels, the question would arise whether the Hull system should be adopted, or whether the system at present in use, adopted under the auspices and direction of the best cavalry officers that could be found, was or was not the most economical and the easiest for meeting all the requirements of the case? He understood that the practice at Hull was to take a vessel of some 300 tons, strip her between decks from stem to stern, and fit her out solely with reference to the conveyance of horses, but without the slightest reference to the number of men who were to accompany the animals, or to the furniture with which each horse must be accompanied. At Hull the horses were shipped as a matter of traffic between dealers at home and purchasers abroad, and there were not above four or six men in attendance on 100 horses, who had the run of the deck, and nothing to impede them in the discharge of their duties to the animals under their charge. The case of the conveyance of a regiment of Dragoons was very different, for there must be a man and heavy furniture for each horse; and a ship which would carry thirty horses must not only carry them, but thirty men also belonging to the horses, and a number of others besides. The Hull system allowed four feet and a half to each horse, and in the Government system two feet and a half were allowed. He had inquired of cavalry officers what was the result of this practice of embarking horses when they were sent out to India from this country, and he was informed that the horses were never allowed to lie down—in fact, they were so close that it was impossible for them to lie down; but he understood that under each horse was a sling, as it was called, by which it was suspended. In bad weather, if proper care were taken—but in some instances losses occurred from a neglect of paying proper attention to the slings—the horses were kept in a position to prevent them from falling from perpendicular jerks, and they were then left to rely upon their own exertions to keep their footing. The moment the storm passed away, and the motion of the ship became less inconvenient, the slings were taken up, and the horse, with an instinct amounting to the reason of man, threw himself directly into the slings, and found instant relief, and a relief which was much greater than if he had been allowed to lie down. With reference to this system, he had had a return put into his hands, of which he would read a summary. Last year a total of 3,100 horses were embarked both in sailing and steam vessels on this system; out of that number ninety-two were lost ; making the loss on the whole about 3 per cent. On that total were embarked in sailing vessels 2,051, the average length of the passage was thirty-nine days, and the loss was 78, or about 3 4-5 per cent. In the steam vessels 1,049 were embarked, and fourteen horses were lost. The average length of the passage was sixteen days, and the loss was about 1 1-3 per cent. This return clearly showed that the system of carrying horses by steam vessels was certainly to be preferred to that of sailing vessels ; but when steam vessels could not be obtained, recourse must be had to sailing vessels, to comply with the exigencies of the service. He was of opinion that no fault could be found with the present system, which, out of a total of 3,000, had landed them at a distance of 3,000 miles, after an average passage of thirty-nine days, with so small a loss as 3 per cent.

THE EARL OF LUCAN said, he must beg to observe that there had been no answer to the question ; for after all the length of the voyage was the most important point. The condition of the horses which came in the sailing vessels, after they had been six weeks at sea, was such that they were not fit for service for a considerable time after landing. He was quite certain that horses would not be fit for duty on landing if they had been at sea for a longer period than three weeks. Many cases had occurred in the 8th Hussars and the 17th Lancers of the horses when put to work, being found to be with fever in the feet, and having foundered. He was sorry to hear that the Government had any serious intention of employing sailing vessels for the transport of cavalry, while there was an amount of steam power at their disposal which, if properly used, would enable them to dispense with sailing vessels. If there were none to be got in this country he was sure they would find a number of steamers lying idle in Balaklava Harbour, sufficient to carry a very large body of cavalry to Constantinople within the next six weeks. Though he could not say that there were quite sixty there, as had been stated in the course of the week, he believed there were constantly very nearly that number lying in or off the harbour, and he never could discover of what possible use they were there. Why did not the Government bring home the Jason, the Simla, or the Trent, vessels which were fitted up for the conveyance of cattle, and which were not now wanted there at all ? Certainly, the Government would incur great responsibility if they allowed these vessels to remain idle at Balaklava, and at the same time took up sailing vessels at home for the transport of cavalry to the seat of war.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE : I entirely agree with my noble Friend (the Earl of Lucan) in condemning the conveyance of cavalry by sailing transports when steamers can be obtained, and I cannot help thinking, with him, that an arrangement might be devised by which some of the vessels which he named could be brought home and rendered available for the transport of horses from this country. No doubt there has been a great deal of time lost hitherto in this respect, and I am persuaded that if a system of transport by steamers were adopted it would enable the Government to despatch horses with greater facility and in greater efficiency than they can do by sailing vessels. Take the instance of the Himalaya ; she was only a fortnight going from this country to Varna, while the average passage of sailing vessels was thirty-nine days. The Himalaya, therefore, would have made two or even three trips while a sailing vessel was making one, and, in addition to gaining time, you would have saved all that knocking about to which the horses, to their great detriment, are exposed in the sailing transports. I would, therefore, strongly impress upon my noble Friend the Minister of War the advantage which would be gained by establishing a service of steam transports, to be despatched regularly once a week, or once a fortnight, as the case might be, by each of which you would be able to send out 300 horses in the most simple and easy manner. At the period when the first horses sent out were despatched I was Inspector General of Cavalry, and I conceived it to be my duty to inspect the vessels prepared for their reception. I had the advantage at that time of having an interview with Mr. Goodwin, who has been referred to, who explained to me the Hull system—which I must say I have never seen—much in the same manner as it has been described by the noble Earl (the Earl of Albemarle) tonight. In my humble opinion, however, it would be extremely inconvenient that so large a space should be sacrificed in the Government transports as would be the case if the Hull system were adopted ; for you must remember that with the horses, you have to carry very nearly double the number of men. You have to carry Dragoons and their equipments, which are very heavy, and though I have no wish to express any opinion of the fitness of the Hull system for general mercantile purposes, I must say I do not think it well adapted for the transport of cavalry. The ships in which the first horses were sent out and which I inspected were as well fitted as any ships could be; the great fault was, that the deck under the horses' feet was not properly battened. For my part, I should prefer the substitution of shingle for those battens.

LORD PANMURE said, he wished, with reference to one statement about the steam vessels and the impression which had gone abroad, to state that there was not one steamer lying idle at Balaklava—they were all either disposed of on some service for the benefit of Government, or engaged in doing duties which Government had undertaken to perform for others. There was not a steam vessel in the Black Sea which had not its duty assigned to it, and whenever it was possible to bring one home for the purpose of conveying cavalry it would be done. Not three days ago the Himalaya—the very steamer referred to by the illustrious Duke—had left this country with upwards of 300 horses on board. Whenever steam vessels could be got for this purpose they would be taken, but he trusted that the impression would not prevail that Government had any steam vessel either lying idle now, or likely to be idle at any time during the summer.

THE EARL OF ALBEMARLE, in reply, expressed an opinion that, in the transport of horses, the advantages of the Hull and the Government system might be combined; so that, when a number of horses were conveyed on board a vessel, each horse might have an opportunity of lying down once in three days. He was, however, afraid, from what had fallen from the War Minister, that the exploded system of 1810 was to be continued without the adoption of improvements suggested by modern experience.

THE EARL OF LUCAN said, he could not understand that, with our enormous fleet of steamers and sailing transports, there should not be some of the former at Balaklava to spare for the conveyance of horses.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE BILL.

On Motion that the Bill be now read 3<sup>d</sup>, THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that he had added two clauses to it to make the powers of remanding perfectly clear, although he considered the objections which had been taken perfectly hypothetical.

Lord BROUGHAM said, that great difficulty had been felt with respect to accommodation. In some cases, although the courts were said to be public, they were practically private. He therefore should move to transfer the clause from the County Courts Act to this Bill, for the purpose of giving powers to use public rooms or places, wherever there were such, under the same limitations as in the County Courts Act.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW said, he wished to propose two Amendments; the first would be to Clause 5, which, as at present framed, required that the certificates should be signed by two justices attending petty sessions. What the practice in this country was he did not know; but the practice in Ireland was, that the certificate should be signed by the presiding justice in each individual case. He should therefore propose to add, after the words "signed by two justices," the words "or the presiding justice."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, there would be no objection to the Amendment.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW would then propose an Amendment to Clause 10. This clause, as at present framed, would place stipendiary magistrates resident in the counties of Ireland in a position above the other magistrates, inasmuch as they would have a power which could not be exercised by the other magistrates. He would add words to obviate this difficulty, and which would give to resident magistrates acting with the stipendiary magistrates the same privileges as they would possess.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, no apology was necessary from the noble Earl in calling the attention of their Lordships to these oversights. The Bill, as originally framed, was intended for England only, but his noble Friend (the Earl of Desart) having suggested that it should be extended to Ireland, an alteration was made in the last clause. It was at first considered that it would be more expedient to introduce a separate Bill for Ireland than to bring all three countries under the operation of the same measure, but it was afterwards stated to him that nothing more need be done than make the present Bill extend to Ireland, as all the provisions were adapted to the state of that country. He quite agreed with the noble Earl that the Amendments would be an improvement, and would place the magistrates acting in the counties in the same position as the stipendiary magistrates.

LORD BROUGHAM regretted that an Amendment of which he had given notice had not been made. He quite agreed to the alterations proposed by the noble Earl opposite.

Bill read 3rd; Amendments made; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

FAST DAY.

On the Motion of EARL GRANVILLE, it was ordered—

"That The Lord Bishop of Salisbury be and he is hereby desired to preach before this House on Wednesday, the 21st of this instant March, in the Abbey Church, Westminster, being the Day appointed by Her Majesty's Royal Proclamation as a public Day of Solemn Fast, Humiliation, and Prayer."

POSTAL COMMUNICATION WITH THE CAPE—QUESTION.

MR. KENNEDY said, he begged to ask the Secretary of the Treasury whether, in the present unsettled state of the eastern frontier of the Cape of Good Hope, it was the intention of the Government to establish more frequent communication with that colony, by contract with a steam-packet company or otherwise?

MR. WILSON said, that the question of postal communication between this country and the Cape had been under the serious consideration of the Government during the last few months; but he was sorry to have to add that up to the present time they had not been able to come to any arrangement for an increased postal communication with that colony. They had hoped that the Legislature of the Cape of Good Hope would have been induced to put on a branch service from the Cape to the Mauritius, the Government of the Mauritius having established a communication between their colony and the Point de Galle, where the service was taken up by the Peninsular and the Oriental Steam Navigation Company. He believed that point had not yet been decided. It was, however, under the consideration of the Admiralty and the Post Office; and no time would unnecessarily be lost in effecting some arrangement upon the subject.

LONDON CEMETERIES—QUESTION.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he wished to ask the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether he was aware that at many of the cemeteries at the east of London—for instance, Keldey's Ground, Bethnal Green, St. James the Less, Bethnal Green, and the Victoria Park Cemetery—they are in the daily practice of burying many bodies in one grave, and do not comply with the conditions on which they have been allowed to continue open, and that nearly all the cemeteries in the neighbourhood of London still adopt the system of pit burial; and, if he were aware of this, whether he meant to prevent it?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he was not aware that the practice of what were called pit burials was in general use in the cemeteries in the neighbourhood of London. But a specific statement had been addressed not long ago to the Home Office with regard to four of those cemeteries, three of them being among those named by the hon. Gentleman, and the fourth being Abney Park Cemetery. An inspector had been ordered to inquire into the accuracy of that statement, and had given in his Report. It appeared from that document that Victoria Park Cemetery and Abney Park Cemetery were both exempted from the operation of the Act, being two of the cemeteries in Schedule B; so that the Secretary of State had not the power of ordering there a limitation or a discontinuance of the burials. It was otherwise with the remaining two. In Keldey's Ground some irregularity seemed to have existed, but that irregularity did not appear to have been considerable, and on the whole the Report was favourable to the management of that cemetery. He had further to state, that it was to be closed in a few months. With regard to St. James the Less, Bethnal Green, the Report had been most unsatisfactory. No order for closing it had been issued; but an order had been made that not more than one body should be buried in one grave. That order, however, had been entirely disregarded; and under those circumstances he (Sir G. Grey) had given such directions as would, he hoped, prevent the continuance of those abuses.

ADMIRAL OF THE FLEET—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN DUNCOMBE inquired whether it was intended to appoint an admiral of the fleet?

SIR C. WOOD said, that the office of admiral of the fleet was not an office of course, as was implied by the question of the hon. and gallant Member, but it corresponded to the rank of field marshal in the army, and there might be sometimes officers of that rank, and sometimes none. It was not intended at present to recommend the appointment of an admiral of the fleet.

STAMPED ENVELOPES—THE LETTER CARRIERS—QUESTION.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he begged to ask the hon. Secretary of the Treasury, when it is likely that the public will be able to obtain stamped sheets of paper and private envelopes for free transmission by post; also to call attention to the fact, that his promises, on the part of the Government, that the recommendations contained in the Report on the Post Office, relative to the letter-carriers of the metropolis, should be speedily carried out, remain unfulfilled?

MR. WILSON said, that the first question related to a matter of some importance to the public, and he was glad to have an opportunity of replying to it. There had been a great desire on the part of the public to be enabled to send to Somerset House paper and envelopes to be stamped with postage stamps; but there was a doubt whether, under the Act establishing the penny post, any paper could be used except that with a thread drawn through it, as directed by the Act. The Government had taken the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, and they had reported that no such precaution need be used, and the Treasury had given authority to the Board of Inland Revenue at once to stamp paper and envelopes, and he had today signed a minute directing immediate preparation to be made for that purpose. When, however, he stated that 8,500,000 of these stamped envelopes passed through the post every week, the House would see that it would take some time to prepare the requisite machinery before the stamps could with safety be delivered to the public. The Board of Inland Revenue had stated, that in two months they considered that they would be ready to receive paper and envelopes for stamping. It was obvious that much inconvenience to the machinery would arise from the stamping of small quantities, and it was necessary to put some limit to the quantity sent in at once. It was proposed that if not less than 10% worth of stamps, or 2,400 of them, were sent in at one time, they would be stamped free of any charge except the duty; but if smaller quantities were sent in, a fee of 1s. would be payable for the trouble and expense of altering the machinery. With respect to the second portion of the question asked by the hon. Gentleman, he had to state that the preliminary arrangements for carrying the recommendations of the Treasury respecting the letter-carriers into effect would be completed to-morrow, and the arrangement with regard to the additional payment would take place after the 31st of that month.

EDUCATION (No. 2) BILL.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: * Mr. Speaker, in the first place, I beg to express my thanks for the courtesy and fairness with which the noble Lord at the head of the Government has enabled me, on an evening usually devoted to Government business, to bring under the consideration of the House the Motion of which I have given notice. It is perfectly true that I might have laid my Bill on the table, following the example of the noble Lord the late President of the Council, and postponed any explanatory statement until I moved the second reading. But I was unwilling to take that course, partly because there are several portions of this great question of the education of the people to which I wish to draw the attention of the Government and of the House in a preliminary statement of this kind; and, further, because I confess I feel, in my position as an independent Member of this House—possessing no official power or influence—that to propose the introduction of a measure of this magnitude, without giving any explanation of the grounds on which I propose to do so, or of the nature of my measure, would be a course both unusual and disrespectful to this House.

Sir, I am in hopes that the House of Commons will consent, for a portion of this Session, to withdraw their attention from the absorbing interests of the war in which we are engaged, and give consideration to a question which I believe to be by far the most important and the most pressing of all questions of the present day, affecting the safety and welfare of the institutions of this country. After a brief interval of time—I trust after a few months—the war will have ceased, and peace will have returned; but, unless this House will consent to address itself seriously to the present state of public education, we shall still find ourselves surrounded by that mass of ignorance and of crime which is now tarnishing our national character, and, I believe, sapping and undermining our national prosperity. There is no question to which Parliament is more bound to address itself; and if the House will favour me with its attention, I think I shall be able to show that there is no subject to which it is bound to devote more anxious consideration. But even from the events of the war we may draw a sound argument in favour of the extension of education, for if there are still persons who doubt the policy and the wisdom of improved education—if there are still persons who think that to teach our fellow-creatures their duty to God and man—to cultivate their minds, and to raise them in the social scale, is to unfit them for industrial pursuits and the vocations of useful life—I think I may turn to recent experience of what education has done for the British soldier as a satisfactory, nay, a triumphant answer. No class of men ever made a more rapid advance in moral and intellectual improvement than the British soldier has done in the last forty years. What has been the result with respect to his efficiency? I appeal to the events of the last few months; at any period in the history of the nation has the British soldier proved himself more brave, more highly disciplined, or more enduring than in the present campaign in the Crimea, chequered as it has been by the most extraordinary combination of victory and disaster?

Sir, I can assure the House that I approach this subject not only with a deep sense of its importance, but also of the numerous difficulties with which it is beset. I am also so sensible of the almost impossibility for an independent Member of this House, without official power or influence, successfully to legislate upon this subject, that I think it right to explain the motives which have induced me to bring it forward, lest I should be charged with presumption for making such an attempt. In determining upon the course which I have taken I have been influenced by the belief that the Government of Lord Aberdeen, deterred either by the difficulty of the subject or some other reason, had abandoned all idea of legislating upon it. The House will not fail to recollect that, on the formation of that Government, the necessity of the improvement and extension of education was put in the very van of their professions, and shortly after they took office, the noble Lord the Member for London—a distinguished Member of Lord Aberdeen's Government—introduced a measure on the subject. I am not about to discuss the merits of that measure, though, I may venture to say, there was in it much that I approved, and much that was, in my opinion, worthy of discussion and consideration in this House; but that Bill was never taken even to a second reading. The noble Lord introduced it in an able speech, but after it was introduced the subject gradually dropped, and we heard no more of the Bill.

What occurred again last year? In the Session of 1854 the Manchester and Salford Bill—a Bill which, in my judgment, was one of the most important plans for the advancement of education in this country ever broached—was brought under the consideration of this House, and after years of labour, great expense, and most praiseworthy exertions on the part of a great number of gentlemen at Manchester, and, above all, after a combination of men of different religious persuasions in endeavouring to legislate on the subject, how was that Bill treated? It was rejected, in consequence of what I must call a paltry quibble, whether, according to the forms of the House, it was a public or a private Bill. The noble Lord the Member for London made a short speech upon that occasion, and left the House; the Treasury benches were empty—and the measure was discussed in the absence of, and without assistance from, Her Majesty's Government; in fact, throughout the whole of last Session, Government gave no intimation whatever of any intention to revive the question of education, and, as far as the House knew, it was totally thrown aside. It was under those circumstances, that, convinced as I am most deeply that it is a subject which must not be dropped, but that, sooner or later, it must be dealt with by Parliament, I determined, however inadequate I might be to the task, to undertake to grapple with it, and accordingly I gave notice that I should, during the present Session, bring in a Bill on the subject.

Parliament met before Christmas, when I renewed my notice. My Motion was fixed for the 25th of January, but on the 23rd, two days before my notice was to be brought on, the noble Lord the Member for London came down to the House and announced that he would bring in an Education Bill. That Bill was introduced a few days afterwards, and is now on the table. I say it without the least disrespect to the noble Lord, but I cannot help suspecting that I may justly claim the merit of both these Bills, for, in all probability, had it not been for my notice, we should not have had the Bill of the noble Lord; and I think the House will feel that after the notice I had given, after devoting considerable time and attention to the subject during the recess, I should not be justified in now receding from the task which I had undertaken. At the same time, I wish it to be understood that it is in no spirit of rivalry to the noble Lord the Member for London that I bring forward this measure. I gladly recognise the exertions of that noble Lord in the cause of education during a lengthened period of time, and had he last Session given the least intimation that he would deal with the subject, I should not have presumed to do so, but should have left it in his hands. The noble Lord, however, has now taken the matter up, and by doing so has practically recognised the necessity of our devoting our attention to the subject, and I earnestly hope that, by God's blessing, the exertions of the noble Lord, and the willingness of this House to entertain the question, it may at length be satisfactorily settled.

Before I explain to the House the present state of education in this country, I may be permitted to call the attention of the House, and particularly of Her Majesty's Government, to one point which is of the greatest possible importance in connection with the subject, and I am the more desirous to do so because it is not embraced either in the measure of the noble Lord or in the Bill I am now asking leave to introduce. I allude to the present constitution of the Committee of Council, and I must say, that I, for one, entertain a feeling of great dissatisfaction, which I believe to be very general, both with respect to the constitution and the working of that Committee. In the first place, I think it has become far too important, and is intrusted with functions of far too great magnitude, to continue any longer without being recognised as a department of the State, and distinctly represented in this House. My objection to the action of the Committee of Council is, that while Parliament is liberal—while we from year to year have been voting increased sums of money for public instruction—our grants are badly administered. Of course I do not pretend to deny that the Committee has done great good, or that the liberality of Parliament in voting increased sums has promoted education, but I think that those sums under the management of the Committee of Council have hitherto produced the minimum, instead of the maximum of good. If I remember rightly, we have risen from the paltry grant of 10,000*l.* or 20,000*l.*, twenty-two years ago, in the time of Lord Grey's Government, to the liberal sum of 300,000*l.* per annum, and I agree with those who think that no body of men ought to be intrusted with the administration of so large a sum for public purposes, without there being a responsible Minister in this House who can account for the manner of its employment. There is no precedent that I know of; but there is a somewhat similar case of recent occurrence—that of the Poor Law Board.

The House will recollect, that after the institution of the Poor Law Board, gentlemen of great ability and of the highest character were appointed Commissioners. Still, not many years elapsed before dissatisfaction began to arise, and the public demanded a change. The consequence was, that the Poor Law Board is now represented as a department in this House; and why should we not have a department for education? The Lord President of the Council is now, in fact, the Minister of Instruction; but I contend that the time has gone by when we can be satisfied with a kind of half-and-half department, practically superintending education, and yet not recognised in the House of Commons. I hope that the time will soon arrive when we shall see a Minister in this House responsible for the money which is expended, and able to give to the House and to the country any explanations which may be required.

In other countries the necessity for an Educational Department is recognised. In France, in Prussia, and in every canton in Switzerland, there is a Minister of Public Instruction; in America education is recognised as a public department of the State; and in Holland there is a department forming a part of the Ministry of the Interior. There are precedents enough abroad, and I think that those precedents, together with our own experience, establish the necessity for such a system at home. The first duty which the department would have to discharge is one of paramount importance, namely, the providing of efficient masters. That is a point to which, in a praiseworthy manner, the Committee of Council have devoted a great deal of attention; but I submit that they have not done it with wisdom or success. The fact is, that the thing is injudiciously done; the masters are so overtrained that they are, in too many cases, above educational duties, and they take to other pursuits. Mr. Kennedy, one of the inspectors, complains that those who have been educated in the training institutions betake themselves, in a great number of instances, to holy orders. Mr. Moseley, a very able inspector, takes the same view of the subject, and so, also, does the Rev. Mr. Mitchell.

In addition to this, I hold in my hand a letter from the principal of one of the largest training institutions, in which, after stating that every one who is mixed up with the practical work of education is very dissatisfied with the Government scheme, and that the funds are badly administered, the poor localities receiving no encouragement, while others get more than their share, the writer goes on to say—

"I do not believe that one in five of the pupil teachers ever become schoolmasters or schoolmistresses. Hence there is a great dearth of masters. In short, other trades pay better than that of a master, in proportion to the work done and the sacrifices made. The minutes of 1846, therefore, have failed in this important respect."

Surely such statements confirm my opinion that we ought to have the means of Parliamentary inquiry into these matters. I am afraid that it would be found, upon investigation, that not more than two-thirds of the pupil teachers ever become masters. It appears, therefore, that we are devoting the public money to educating persons who subsequently become clerks, or betake themselves to different pursuits from that for which they were intended. But more than this; I have said that the public money is misapplied, and I believe that it is misapplied in this way—that the grants which are annually voted by Parliament are given under the Minutes of Council to rich districts to the exclusion of poor ones. The minute under which the grants are issued requires that a certain proportionate sum should be provided by the locality, and the consequence is that the poorest districts, which are in most need of assistance, get nothing from the annual grants of Parliament.

I will illustrate this by a reference to eight parishes in this metropolis—four poor parishes and four rich ones; I will take the four poor parishes first. Clerkenwell, with a population of 64,763, has received 8*l.* 17*s.* 4*d.* for books; St. Giles's, with a population of 37,407, has received 3*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* for books; Shoreditch, with 25,511 inhabitants, has received nothing; and Shadwell, with 11,700 inhabitants, has received nothing. Now, contrast with this four rich parishes—St. Michael, Chester Square, with a population of 8,500, has received 465*l.*; St. Barnabas, or part of St. Paul, with only 8,000 inhabitants, has received 400*l.*; Kentish Town, with 5,000 inhabitants, has received 84*l.*; and Kensington, with 30,000 inhabitants, has received 2,197*l.* The four poor parishes, therefore, with an aggregate population of 138,900, have received 12*l.* 0*s.* 8*d.*, while the four rich parishes, with a population of upwards of 50,000, have received 3,908*l.* [Mr. COBDEN: Is that in one year?] No; from the commencement of the annual grant down to the present moment. That sum of 3,908*l.* granted to these four rich parishes has, no doubt, effected a great amount of good. I do not deny that; but is it the policy or the intention of this House, in voting so large a sum of money as it annually does for the purposes of education, that the rich only should be benefited, while the poor are to have nothing? because, practically, that is what it comes to. I attach great interest and importance to this part of the subject. The Bill which was brought in by the noble Lord the Member for London proposes to give increased powers to the Committee of Council, and I also propose to give increased powers to that department to which the duties of public instruction are attached; but while I am anxious to place increased powers in the hands of the educational department of the State, I must beg at the same time to state that I am not content to place those powers in the hands of the Committee of Council as it is at present constituted.

I will now venture to ask for the attention of the House, while I make some statements upon the present state of education in this country. I doubt whether the full extent of our deficiencies is generally understood. I have read and I have been told that this question may be left as it is ; that we are going on well ; that we have a liberal Parliament and an active Committee of Council, and everything is advancing ; but, Sir, I think that I shall be able to show the House that, instead of going on well, we are going on scandalously ill. As regards this great matter of public education, the state of the country is most threatening, and the time has arrived when this House is bound to give its most serious attention to this subject.

It will be my duty to lay before the House some very startling statements, but I shall carefully endeavour to avoid anything like exaggeration, and I shall make no statement without giving my authority, and in most cases I think the House will find that the statements which I shall make are drawn from official sources. When the noble Lord the Member for London brought this subject under the consideration of the House in 1853, I think he fell into the same error which has pervaded many similar statements. I think he fell into the error of taking too flattering a view of the question. The noble Lord entered into a history of the progress of education in the country from the very commencement of the first efforts that were made by this House in that direction. The noble Lord told us the increase that had taken place since that time in the number of schools and of scholars attending them; but throughout the able speech with which he introduced the subject he did not once touch upon the other side of the question. It is time that the country should know what is the real truth, and I shall endeavour to state it. What was the point upon which the noble Lord dwelt with the most satisfaction ? It was the increase in the number of children attending school between the years 1818 and 1833 ; and again, between 1833 and 1851. In the year 1818 the proportion of children at school was 1 in 17, in 1833 it was 1 in 11 and a fraction, and in 1851 the proportion had increased to 1 in 8 and a fraction. That, no doubt, appears to be an improvement, and to a certain extent I admit that it is ; but if we analyse the figures, and especially remembering that the statistics of 1833 have been called in question, we shall find that the ratio of advance between 1833 and 1851 is by no means equal to the ratio of advance between 1818 and 1833. I believe it to be a fact that many of the most important districts in England were in a worse condition in 1851 than in 1833. As instances, I may mention York and Liverpool. In Liverpool, in 1833, the proportion of children attending school was 1 in 7 and a fraction, while in 1851 it was 1 in 8 and a fraction ; so that the state of education in Liverpool has positively retrograded, and that is also the case with regard to York. But I may remind the House that the consideration of the number of children attending school forms by no means the whole of the question to which I wish to call attention, but that we must also consider what is the quality of the education received. Are the children who attend school properly taught ? I think that the House will perceive that this question is of greater importance than even the relative numbers of the children going to school at the different periods I have mentioned. In describing our present position, I shall regard it in four points of view—1st, the number of those who receive no education at all ; 2ndly, the quality of the education received by those who attend schools ; 3rdly, our comparative state with regard to the rest of the civilised world ; and, 4thly, the deplorable results of our neglect of this question.

The House is aware that we are indebted for much information to very able reports on the census by Mr. Horace Mann. It appears that the population of this country in 1851 amounted to 17,927,609. The number of children between 3 and 15 years of age was 4,908,696 ; of these 2,144,378 were at school, so that there remained very nearly 3,000,000 to be accounted for. To account for this number Mr. Horace Mann first makes a deduction of 1,000,000 for children engaged in work. I confess I am unwilling to admit that deduction ; I think that in any country where education rests upon a sound basis, children ought not to be allowed to work before they are educated, or, at all events, it is a matter of doubt whether it is right to recognise such a reason for not being educated. However that may be, Mr. Horace Mann makes a deduction of 1,000,000 for children engaged in work, the actual number returned as at work being, I believe, about 600,000. He then makes a deduction of 200,000 for children suffering from illness, and of 50,000 for those who may be educated at home. So that, even allowing these deductions—and I demur to the first—a very large number of children remains wholly unaccounted for. To proceed further, I admit it may be fair when treating of the labouring classes to deduct children below the age of 5 and above the age of 12, and I find the number of those children to be 647,856, and the result is, that the number of children between the ages of 5 and 12 not at school amounts to 968,557. I then come to the natural inquiry, why are they not at school? I ought, perhaps, in frankness to state to the House that the children considered not to be at school were so considered because they were not entered on the school books, but perhaps a portion of them might have been to school at some time or another; but Mr. Horace Mann has observed, and with great justice, that he does not know whether it is a greater evil to have a number of persons without education, and the rest of the community well educated, or to have the whole mass educated badly, and for too short a period.

But I return to the question, why were these children not at school? Some persons say that the reason is, because they are engaged in work; but that, I believe, is a mistake. I find that in Manchester the number of children between the ages of 3 and 15 were 69,500; of those 32,000 were at school, 7,000 were engaged in work, and there remained over 30,000 neither one nor the other.

The general result throughout the whole kingdom stands thus—that 41 and a fraction per cent are at school, only 12 and a fraction are at work, and 46 and a fraction per cent are neither at school nor at work. Now it will be seen from these figures that the number of children at work cannot be set down as the main cause of the existing deficiency in education. The real causes I believe to be partly the poverty and partly the indifference of the parents, and I think this indifference may again be attributed to two causes—their own uneducated state, and the badness of the education which is afforded in this country. Some of these unhappy parents have never been educated themselves, and therefore cannot appreciate the advantage of education to their children; others find the education in the schools to which their children could alone have access, so bad that they care not to send their children to partake of it.

Having now shown the House the large number of children who are not at school at all, let me pass on to a point which is not of less importance—namely, the inferior quality of the education which too many of those who do go to school receive. A comparison drawn between the education imparted in this country and that afforded in other parts of the civilised world is, I think, a melancholy one, so far as we are concerned; for I believe we shall find that, with the exception of Russia, Spain, Italy, and the Slave States of America, England is at the bottom of the scale. Thus, I find that in Switzerland, in several of the cantons, there are 1 in 4 and a fraction of the population at school; in Saxony 1 in 5; in the United States—New York and other of the free States—some 1 in 5, and others 1 in 6; in France, 1 in 6; in Wurtemburg and Prussia, 1 in 6; in Denmark, 1 in 7; in England, 1 in 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ . But this is not all. In these other countries 1 in 6 receives a good education, while in England 1 in 8 $\frac{1}{2}$  receives an education, in too many cases, of the most deficient and unsatisfactory character.

With the permission of the House, I will now proceed to state the nature of the difference which exists in the systems of these countries. What is the teaching in the elementary schools of Prussia? In Prussia every complete elementary school necessarily comprehends the following objects: 1, religious instruction, as a means of forming the moral character of children according to the positive truths of Christianity; 2, the German language; 3, the elements of geometry, together with the general principles of drawing; 4, calculation and practical arithmetic; 5, the elements of physics, geography, general history, and especially the history of Prussia; 6, singing; 7, writing; 8, the simplest manual labours, and some instructions in husbandry, according to the agriculture of the respective parts of the country. The instructions in religion, reading, writing, arithmetic, and singing, are strictly indispensable in every school. That is the system of Prussia. In Switzerland, the education given by the masters in the parochial schools includes—1, religious instruction; 2, reading; 3, writing; 4, linear drawing; 5, orthography and grammar; 6, arithmetic and book-keeping; 7, singing; 8, the elements of geography, and particularly of the geography of Switzerland; 9, the history of Switzerland; 10, the elements of natural philosophy, with its practical applications; 11, exercises in composition; 12, instruction in the rights and duties of a citizen. In Denmark, education is very widely diffused, there being very few persons, even among the lowest classes, who are unable to read and write. In that country a general code of regulations for schools has existed since 1817, and the condition of the primary education has, since that period, made a continuous and very satisfactory progress. Parochial schools are almost everywhere established, and here, as in Prussia, attendance at school is not optional, for by a late law all children from the age of seven to fourteen years must attend some public school. Children whose parents are unable to pay the usual school fees are educated at the public expense. The instruction in the primary schools includes, besides reading, writing, and arithmetic, history, geography, and natural history. In France, under the system adopted by M. Guizot, when Minister, by the statute of the 25th of April, 1834, upon the elementary schools, the instruction in these schools comprehends—1, moral and religious instruction; 2, reading; 3, writing; 4, the elements of arithmetic; 5, the elements of the French language; 6, the legal system of weights and measures; 7, geography, particularly of France; 8, history, particularly of France; 9, linear drawing; and 10, singing. Every elementary school is divided into three divisions, in which the pupils are ranged according to their age and the progress they make in their studies. The religious and moral instruction is the principal duty of the schoolmaster in each division, and all the classes commence and terminate with prayer. In Germany, generally, there is, it is said, the greatest desire among the lower classes that their children should enjoy the advantages of the excellent education provided for them. But the Governments of Wurtemburg, Hesse, Bavaria, &c., have not trusted entirely to this feeling, but have enacted regulations by which every individual is compelled to send his children to school from the age of six to fourteen years. In Hesse, for example—and its regulations are similar to those in the other States—the public functionaries transmit regularly to Government, once every six months, a list of the children in their respective districts who have attained their sixth year, and they are bound to see that they are sent to school. In the event of the parents being unable to pay the school fees, a statement to that effect is prepared by the parochial authorities, and the fees are paid by the public. In Holland there is scarcely a child ten years old, of sound intellect, who cannot both read and write. For these statements I am indebted to Mr. Kay's excellent work on the state of Education in Europe. I need not state to the House how perfect is the system of elementary instruction which prevails in America. I now come to England, and mark the contrast.

From the report of Mr. Mann, I find that there are 44,800 schools established in England and Wales, teaching as follows:—Reading, 98 per cent; writing, 68 per cent; arithmetic, only 61 per cent; English grammar, only 44 per cent; geography, only 39 per cent; music, 10 per cent; and industrial occupation, which, in my humble opinion, ought to be one of the primary objects of school training for the working classes, only 2 per cent! Such is the general character of the instruction afforded in this country. Now let me state to the House the condition even of the Church schools, and I shall do so upon the authority of the National Society as to their own establishments.

It appears that of the Church schools “not more than 30 per cent are legally secured for educational purposes; that 47 per cent of the whole are neither legally nor virtually so secured; that of the 47 per cent about 50 per cent are in dames' cottages, corners of churches, belfries, kitchens, or other rooms in parsonage-houses; and that the remainder are of an unsatisfactory character.” This, remember, is an account given by the National Society of the Church schools in connection with them. Now, let me turn to the authority of Mr. Horace Mann with regard to the character of about 30,000 private schools out of the 44,000 to which I have adverted:—

“A rough attempt to classify, according to efficiency, the 29,425 private schools which sent returns, produced the following result:—superior, 4,956; middling, 7,095; inferior, 13,879; undescribed, 3,495. The distinction, of course, is, in some measure arbitrary—the returns not always furnishing the means for an unhesitating judgment; but I believe it does not represent unfairly the actual state of things with reference to private schools.”

He adds these significant words:—

Sir J. Pakington

Thus in upwards of 700 out of these 13,800 inferior schools, or about 1-18th part of the whole, the masters or mistresses—the persons upon whom the efficiency of the school mainly depended—were unable to write their own names, and signed the returns for the purposes of the census with a mark! Can anything show more conclusively the miserable inferiority of the system in operation in this country? If you are disposed to console yourselves with the idea that you have one in eight and a fraction of the population of England at school, let me ask you to reflect what sort of schools they go to, whether the education they receive is one which ought to be offered to the people of this country, or whether it does not seem disgraceful to us when we compare that education with the instruction imparted in foreign countries, the particulars of which I have given to the House?

I must now turn to the deplorable results which have accrued from the insufficient character of the education imparted. When I shall have stated what these deplorable results are, I think it will be admitted that the attention of Parliament ought to be directed to the subject. First of all, I will touch for a moment upon a point, the importance of which will be acknowledged by every one who studies this question—namely, the connection between ignorance and crime. The House will be aware that it is difficult to obtain full information upon this matter. Our own statistics of crime are very imperfect. We have annual returns of the trials at our sessions and assizes, but the returns of summary convictions are not regularly and annually prepared. The only foreign country with regard to which I have statistical returns of the state of crime is Austria, and I am obliged, in dealing with the case, to draw a comparison between different years. I find that in 1846, when the population of England was 17,018,600, the number of persons committed for trial was 25,107, and the number summarily convicted was 35,749, making altogether 60,856 persons convicted of crime. The population of Austria in the year 1838 was 23,652,000, and the detected crimes amounted to 29,492. The result was, therefore, that, while the population of Austria was upwards of 6,500,000 more than that of England, the detected crime in England was double that of Austria. In Galatia and Dalmatia, the least educated of the Austrian provinces, crime was most prevalent. I give this statement for what it is worth, but it is a point which I could not omit, inasmuch as it shows that in Austria, which is one of the best educated countries in Europe, crime is greatly less than in England. In fact the difference is this, that in Austria 1 in 800 of the population is detected of crime, while in England about 3 in 800 are detected, making a difference of nearly three to one.

I will now give you some statistics connected with the state of education in the metropolis. In four parishes north of the Thames, — Stepney, St. George's-in-the-East, Bethnal Green, and Shoreditch—with a population of 358,601, I find that the total number of children is 44,824, out of which the total number at school, including ragged schools, is 18,897. In the four parishes of Lambeth, Newington, St. George's, Southwark, and Bermondsey, there is a population of 304,093, and the general result, taking the eight parishes together, is that there is a total population of 662,694, of which number, if one in six were at school, as there ought to be, there would be a total of 110,449 receiving education. I find, however, that the actual number at school, including ragged schools, is only 35,306, and, deducting 27,611, or one-fourth, for those educated in private schools, there still remains a balance in these eight parishes of 47,532 who receive no education at all. I can give the House no practical results of the ignorance which thus exists in London, but I think that those conversant with the subject and the state of the metropolis will have no very great difficulty in arriving at a conclusion as to what must be the state of 47,000 children in London who have no means of education held out to them.

I am now enabled to give the House some statistics of the state of education in the west of England, derived from official sources. In the Report of Mr. Riddock, Inspector of Workhouse Schools, given in 1853, in reference to the counties of Cornwall, Devonshire, Somersetshire, Dorsetshire, and Hampshire, he states—

"The new children thus admitted were grossly and absolutely ignorant. I have been painfully struck with the uniformity of ignorance which is shown to prevail among the newly admitted in all the returns sent to me. It is not only that children of twelve to fifteen years of age cannot read or write, but they are not acquainted with the Creed, or with the Lord's Prayer, and scarcely know that there is a God in Heaven. Personally, I have made inquiries in most of the unions in my district whether such cases were of frequent occurrence, and the invariable answer has been that they are the rule and not the exception. The most complete and heathenish ignorance seems to prevail among the children of those whom a temporary pressure obliges to apply for parochial relief."

Turning to Newcastle-upon-Tyne, I find that in the year 1851 that borough possessed a population of 87,000, and of this number 18,470 were children between the ages of five and fifteen. Mr. Stewart, one of the Government Inspectors, states in his official Report—

"For the education of this vast population there are but 119 schools, and only 28 of these are returned as public. In all the 119 schools there were only 7,553 children in attendance on the 31st of March, 1851, which leaves the enormous number of 11,447 children unaccounted for."

Mr. Stewart subsequently adds—

"These statistics certainly tend to establish the opinion that neglected childhood and juvenile crime stand to each other in the relation of cause and effect."

I will now give the House some statistics of the state of education derived from an entirely different source. Mr. Mitchell, one of the Government Inspectors, thought it his duty, as one mode of ascertaining the state of education in the eastern counties, to apply to the colonels of certain regiments of militia for information as to the state of education of their men. The regiments to which he applied were the Cambridge, the West Essex, the Essex Rifles, the Huntingdon Rifles, the East Norfolk, the West Norfolk, the Suffolk Artillery, and the West Suffolk. The aggregate number of militiamen was 5,677, and the only test applied in this case was whether or not the men could write their names. Out of the whole number of 5,677, only 2,051, or very little more than one-third, could write.

With respect to the state of education in the county of Worcester, I have applied for information to the chaplain of the county gaol—a gentleman upon whose authority I can implicitly rely; and he has given me a return, showing the education of the prisoners committed to Worcester Gaol from Michaelmas, 1853, to Michaelmas, 1854. The number committed during that period amounted to 1,118, of which number no less than 415 were totally ignorant, being altogether unable to read or write. The gentleman furnishing me with this information further states—

"The result of my experience is to fill me with sorrow at the woeful amount of gross ignorance on moral, religious, and useful subjects in the 't majority of cases."

Sir J. Pakington

That is the language of a gentleman of whose personal worth I can speak from long experience. I may now turn to the evidence of another gentleman, who, I believe, is known to many hon. Members of this House; at any rate by name. He has long devoted his attention to the welfare and improvement of the working classes, and he is, I believe, a man of the most unimpeachable character. I allude to the Rev. J. Clay, Chaplain of the Preston House of Correction. I hold in my hand one of Mr. Clays' Reports, and extracts from several others, and I find that in the Report of 1846 Mr. Clay writes thus—

"During three years' observation, the performance of my duty has brought me in contact with 1,733 men and boys, and 387 women and girls altogether unable to read; 1,301 men and boys, and 287 women and girls who knew not the name of the Sovereign; and 1,290 men and boys, and 293 women and girls so incapable of receiving moral or religious instruction that to speak to them of virtue, vice, iniquity, or holiness, was to speak to them in an unknown tongue."

Mr. Clay has been in the habit of ascertaining the exact state of the education of prisoners in Preston Gaol, by submitting to them certain questions, and by his Report in 1849 it appears that of the 1,949 persons committed to that Gaol, 48 and a fraction per cent were unable to read; 41 and a fraction per cent were ignorant of the Saviour's name, and unable to read the Lord's Prayer; only 10 per cent. were acquainted with the elementary truths of religion; 67 per cent. were unable to name the months of the year; 61 per cent. were ignorant of the name of the Queen; 62 per cent. were ignorant of the words "virtue" and "vice"; and 19 and a fraction per cent. were unable to count a hundred. I have before me Mr. Clay's Report of 1848, which presents the same general results. I was so struck—I may so struck with horror—on reading these tables, that I wrote to him to ask if there were no mistake, and if I could venture to state these startling facts to the House of Commons; and he wrote me back to say I might rely on their accuracy.

Sir, we are very prone in this country to boast of our institutions. We are very prone to boast of our representative system, and to imagine that we are setting an example to other nations. A little while ago we said, "If our army is not numerous, our military system is at least perfect." I think that dream has been somewhat rudely broken, and let us take care that in other matters of greater weight and moment to the welfare of the people, instead of setting an example to the civilised world, we do not become a laughing-stock to the other nations of Europe.

What can be more discreditable to us as a nation than to have such a state of things existing as that which I have now detailed? Is it a state of things which we should bear with patience and say, "We are doing very well; we are making liberal grants; we have an active Committee of Council, and the percentage of 1851 is better than the percentage of 1833; let us be content." Can we honestly be content? Is it consistent with the duty of Parliament that we should be content? I for one, Sir, will not be content. However unfitted I may be for the task upon which for I have entered, I will say this, that if Parliament permits the continuance of such a condition of things as I have just disclosed it will be neglecting one of the first and most paramount duties of a Christian legislature. Is the state of the African savage, or the North American Indian, worse than the state of the men of whom I have spoken? These are not instances of individual cases here and there. We find in one year, in one gaol an aggregate of 800 persons who never heard the name of the Saviour. We find in one year, in one gaol, 1,200 persons who never heard the name of Queen Victoria. We find in one year, in one gaol, 1,300 persons who did not know the months of the year. This, Sir, is ignorance not of religion only, but of everything, both secular and religious, which can tend to elevate human beings and make them worthy of the name; and Mr. Clay is right when he declares, in one of his Reports, "it is worse than barbarism;" because, while these unhappy outcasts know nothing of a Saviour, while they have scarcely heard of the existence of a God, while in every branch of proper and useful knowledge, they are darkly ignorant, on the other hand, they are conversant with vice, they are familiar with crime, and they are steeped in debauchery; and these are the men who, when they transgress the laws of their country, are severely punished, though it is hardly just to consider them as responsible beings.

Well, Sir, and then I am sometimes told that frightful as this evil is, it is impossible to afford a remedy, and when I ask why, I am told it is because one man is a Churchman, and insists on teaching the Catechism, and another man is a Dissenter, and will not receive the Catechism. I should like to know what these distinctions between Churchmen and Dissenters are to the hundreds, I may say thousands, of human beings who know nothing of even the primary truths of religion? Is it not a mockery? Is it not time we should try to discover some middle ground, on which Churchmen and Dissenters may meet, remembering the great cardinal doctrines of Christianity, in which they agree, and thinking more of them, than of those points of government and discipline upon which in many cases they chiefly differ. I do not ask the Churchman not to teach the Catechism. I am a Churchman myself and will not forego the Catechism. I do not ask the Dissenter to receive anything to which he objects; but I do ask, nay, I implore both Churchman and Dissenter to recollect the urgency of such a state of things as I have developed, and in a spirit of toleration and charity, to see if some mode cannot be adopted by which to spread knowledge amongst these miserable beings and teach them their duty to their country and their God.

These are the circumstances which have induced me to bring this subject before Parliament, and to propose a measure, the nature of which I will now explain. I do it with the greatest diffidence, knowing the difficulties by which the subject is surrounded, and, above all, I can assure the House I do it in no party sense, with no party object, and seeking no party triumph. On the contrary, I believe this subject will never be settled by the struggles of contending political parties, and it is my anxious desire to combine men of all opinions in the endeavour to solve this great question, and overcome a state of things which, I repeat, is dishonourable and discreditable to the country.

Although it is in my opinion one of the most doubtful points in my plan, I propose that the Bill shall be permissive. The noble Lord's Bill is also permissive. I confess I am not very fond of permissive legislation, and we have many instances in which legislation of that kind has not conduced to the public welfare; but, knowing the difficulties of the question, and not having the power which attaches to a Government, I thought it wiser to give the Bill that character.

I shall endeavour to assimilate the mode of proceeding with reference to education to the mode which has been adopted with such signal success with reference to the administration of the Poor Law. In my humble opinion the noblest page in the statute book of England is that which says no man shall be destitute. I wish to see a parallel page in the statute book which shall say no man shall be ignorant.

The areas, within which the measure may be made operative are, in corporate towns, the limits of municipal jurisdiction, and, in the country, the limits of the poor law unions. I propose that it shall be optional to the rate-payers of each district whether they will or will not adopt the provisions of the Act, and the Public Libraries Bill of the hon. Member for Dumfries has afforded me a precedent by which facilities may be given for collecting votes. In the event of a decision to adopt the provisions of the Act, I propose that an education board for the union or town shall be chosen by the rate-payers at large.

I thereby propose, the House will observe, and I do so without the least apprehension or alarm, to place the general conduct of the education of the country in the hands of bodies popularly elected. In the United States that plan has been found to work perfectly well, and, having watched the operation of the Poor Law in this country, my experience has given me confidence in the general ability, discretion, and good feeling of boards thus popularly elected.

I think that as it has been done with regard to the Poor Laws, so, in this matter of education, it is most desirable that those who probably from their position in society exercise the greatest influence in their respective neighbourhoods should be members of such a board. I therefore have followed the precedent of the Poor Law, and I propose that to qualify a member to sit on the board he should be a person rated at 30*l.* per annum. I also propose that all the magistrates of the district shall be ex officio members of the board. I then propose that the board shall have power to provide schools where necessary, to superintend the general education of the district, and to levy a rate for defraying the expense of maintaining the education of the people in that district. I propose that there shall be an education rate levied by these boards, and that the expenditure of that rate shall be intrusted to the boards, under the provisions of the Act, and I likewise propose that the boards shall act under the general superintending authority of the Central Education Department, as boards of guardians act under the Poor Law Commission.

This brings me to that question which I hope will meet with the most serious consideration of the House, as it has engaged mine for a long time; it is this, whether we can carry on the education of the country, or rather, I should say, whether we can improve or extend it in the manner in which it ought to be done, upon the voluntary system.

I have thought much of this subject, and I think that the more we know of it the more general has become the conviction that by the voluntary principle alone we cannot educate the people of this country as they ought to be educated; you can no more do it, than you can carry on a great war or defray all the annual expenses of the Government by a voluntary contribution instead of taxation. I might here give you abundant authorities in support of that view of the subject from persons well qualified to speak on the matter. But is it not the fact that one and all of us are almost daily receiving begging letters alleging the want of schools for the poor in localities of the writers? As a specimen, I have brought down the last letter of this description which I have myself received. It is from the incumbent of Eldon district, Sheffield, and runs thus—

"Sir, I beg leave to inform you that having been appointed to the newly-formed district of Eldon, Sheffield, containing a population of 5,500 souls, I built a church, which was consecrated in June, 1849, but it is still without a tower, and I have no schools built for the accommodation of the young. Chartism and infidelity avow in all directions their dangerous principles. The young grow up in ignorance and vice. The temptations of a large manufacturing town are felt in numberless ways. Under these circumstances, I am anxious to complete the work I have begun, and to raise a school for the reception of daily and Sunday scholars; but local resources are few and scanty."

All I can say is, that the local resources ought not to be few and scanty. I do not know anything of this Eldon district, but I know this, that if this district requires a church it must require a school—there must be the young to educate and to train; and I say that Eldon district ought to do it without resorting to these begging letters. I impute no blame to the individual clergymen who make these appeals, quite the reverse; they are right, the fault is not theirs; but it is discreditable to the nation to have these begging letters going about the country. I hold in my hand an extract from the Report of the Rev. Mr. Kennedy, in which he sums up his views on this great subject in these words—

"There are ten propositions on the subject which my observation leads me to affirm:—1. Elementary schools in general are not, at this time, being adequately maintained. 2. There is not a fair prospect, on the present system, that they will have a sufficient annual income. 3. On the contrary, there is, in a majority of places, a decline of income. 4. The endeavours to obtain yearly contributions to schools are harassing and vexatious, and the means sometimes resorted to for raising funds, such as high fees, and scales of fees, are injurious to the schools. 5. There is a painful and injurious uncertainty about the efficient maintenance of schools, also pernicious fluctuations of income, arising from such causes as the death of a benevolent landed proprietor, or of a liberal millowner, or the loss of a good master, undoing in a moment the work of years, and causing flourishing schools to fall into decay. 6. Many districts are absolutely unable from poverty to maintain good schools without extraordinary annual aid. 7. In districts where there is no absolute deficiency of money, or even where there is wealth, the schools are often suffered to languish, from parsimony, or from indifference, and from hostility to education. 8. It is desirable to abate the jealousies and ill feeling often at present engendered among different religious denominations by contests for subscriptions to schools, &c., and to enable every deserving school to have an independent income. 9. It is often very desirable, but not feasible through want of means, to admit some of the scholars free to schools; and, in some cases, wholly free schools are requisite. 10. The above-named evils cannot be remedied, nor the wants supplied, by any other means than by a rate for education."

We cannot go on as we are. The voluntary system has broken down. It is harassing and vexatious, as Mr. Kennedy says, and the only legitimate mode in which you can provide education for the people is by calling upon the people to contribute a rate for it. Therefore, that is one power which I propose to devolve on these boards so to be elected. They shall have power to levy a rate for the purpose of carrying on the education of the people; but I ought to add that I think these rates ought to be assisted by public grants from the Consolidated Fund. I do not think the whole burden of education ought to be thrown upon the local rate. I propose, therefore, that where the locality is called upon to provide a certain amount by rate, the public fund of the country shall contribute a fixed proportionate amount. I think this proposition is not only fair in itself, but is perfectly consistent with the course hitherto sanctioned and adopted by Parliament.

I now come to another point to which I beg the particular attention of the House. I fear that upon this point, perhaps more than any other, the proposal I intend to make may lead to differences of opinion.

But I have made up my mind, after the most anxious attention I have been able to give to the subject, that the education of the people ought to be free. I propose that in all the new schools which shall be established under these boards the scholars shall be free; and I propose that, in the case of scholars who may be sent by the board to existing schools no charge shall be made for the education of those scholars. I am aware that this is a point upon which great difference of opinion may prevail; but the more I have considered it the less weight do I attach to the objections raised against it. One argument, and, I think, the weakest though the commonest of all, is, that the poor do not value education unless they pay for it. I hold this to be not only a weak argument in itself, but that it is absolutely inconsistent with human nature. I should like to know what man there is in any class of society who when told he may get a good thing for nothing would refuse to accept it. I never heard of such a person; nor do I believe there exists any such feeling in the minds of the people in regard to free education. If I offer to a labourer a cottage rent free, does that man feel offended, and say he will not take it? If, indeed, I offered an industrious man a ruined cottage, he might fairly say, "I am very much obliged to you, but your cottage is good for nothing, and I would rather pay rent for a good one." And this is the nature of the present feeling as to free education. The feeling arises from two facts—one is, that the only known free education in this country is connected with endowed schools, the greater part of which are very inferior in their quality; and the other is, that, as education is now conducted, the people connect the idea of free education with pauperism, and, therefore, from these two causes they are disinclined to free education. But we must recollect that the education of the poor is not a question relating only to the welfare of individuals themselves, but affects the interest of all classes. It is the interest of the State that the people shall be well educated, and every precedent of free education is strongly in its favour.

Let me call the attention of the House to the example of the United States, and show it what actually occurred on this very question of free education at Philadelphia. In 1835 the state of education there was very similar to that we have now in England. The inferior schools were free schools, but the great majority of the respectable citizens sent their children to private schools, and the result was that in the free schools there were only 9,346 scholars. A change then took place, these schools were placed on a different footing, and instead of remaining inferior became superior schools; the elementary education given was good, the masters were not masters who could not just write their names, but were fit for their occupation, and the effect of the reform was, that in Philadelphia private schools were almost superseded, and, instead of there being only 9,346 scholars at the free schools, there were, in 1845, only ten years after the change, 36,665, and in 1852, 49,630. The most complete success attended the experiment, and the great bulk of the children of all classes met, as they ought to do, and received their education in common at the free school. The increase in the number of children in the public schools, after they were deprived of their pauper character, was astonishing, and offered a complete answer to the objections which had been frequently urged against free schools, proving distinctly that neither apathy on the one hand, nor a feeling of inferiority upon the other, will prevent the bulk of the people from availing themselves of the common school system. What happened in New York? In that city this question of free schools, or no free schools, became a subject of discussion and division, and so strongly was the public feeling excited on the occasion, that it was actually put to the vote, and the population of the State of New York, by an overwhelming majority, decided that there should be no payment; and I believe I am right when I state, that at the present time 700,000 scholars are deriving benefits from the free schools of New York, amounting to a proportion of one in five of the population.

Then, again, what has occurred in other countries? There can be no better educated country than Austria, but the education there is free; in Holland, also, the education is entirely free, and my belief is, that if you will make it free in this country you will avoid great difficulties, promote the interests of the kingdom, and the whole system will be sounder and better than if you persist in exacting the school pence. There are countries, it is true, in which

-school system does not altogether it in all those countries a certain on of the schools are free, and I
, the House whether in this country there would not arise very great practical difficulty in endeavouring to draw the line between those who should and those who should not pay? The persons who had to decide would give great dissatisfaction, a feeling of pride on one hand, and pauperism on the other, would inevitably be created, and the only safe plan is to make education entirely free. But the House will feel that, whatever may be the importance of this point, or the difficulties with which it may be connected, it does not essentially affect the scheme I have to propose. The House may strike it out, or adopt it, without destroying the measure, but I thought it right to explain to the House my views upon it.

Another and very important point in this Bill is, that in no instance whatever will it interfere with existing schools or existing interests. We must not, in our wish for improvement or extension, lose sight of the progress education has already made in this country. In many instances that progress has arisen from the agency of private benevolence, and it would be neither wise nor generous to attempt to check it. On that point I have to state distinctly that my proposal will interfere with no existing schools, it will be entirely optional whether they come into the unions or not, and even if they do I will respect existing schools upon two conditions, which I believe to be indispensable—the one is, that the school shall submit to a periodical and satisfactory inspection; and the other, that it shall be subject to the provisions of the Act with regard to religious teaching.

I have now touched upon all the provisions which I propose in this Bill, except, perhaps, the most important of all. On that subject I assure the House I feel great delicacy, and I hope it will grant me its indulgence while I frankly and explicitly state the view I take. I must venture to ask the House calmly to consider whether the dreadful state of things to which I have adverted, and which I believe to be true, does not demand improvement; and I ask them, too, to approach this religious difficulty—for it is to that, of course, I allude—in a spirit of forbearance and moderation. There can be no doubt this country is divided into two distinct parties on that question, one of which insists upon the imperative necessity of religious instruction, and the other on what is called the secular system. I avow that I am attached to the first of these two divisions.

Now, Sir, let me say I do not clearly understand what the secular system really is; whether those who advocate it contend that religious teaching should be altogether abandoned in the national schools, or whether the Holy Scriptures alone should be admitted, and all teaching upon doctrinal points excluded. However that may be, I must implore the advocates of the secular system to reflect on certain facts, which facts we must deal with, and which neither I nor any man can deny or get rid of. First of all, we have the existing fact that there is an Established Church in this country, and, further, that an immense majority of the people of this country are attached to it. [Slight murmurs.] I hear murmurs from hon. Gentlemen opposite, and I perfectly understand their meaning; but I beg the House to believe that in dealing with this part of the subject I am actuated by the most single-minded object. I know it is a question whether the aggregate numbers of the Church exceeds the aggregate of Dissenters, and I know that that question turns upon the mode in which you dispose of a certain number of millions of the population whom the Census does not class either as Churchmen or Dissenters. There remains, however, this fact, which cannot be denied—that the Church is in an overwhelming majority as compared with any other single denomination. This must, therefore, be considered as an element of the question, and I may remind hon. Gentlemen of the actual proportion of schools at the present time. I find from the Census returns that the total number of day schools supported by religious bodies is 12,708. Of this number the Church schools are no less than 10,555, while the number of Independent schools is 453, of Roman Catholic schools 339, of Wesleyan schools 381, and the rest of the schools are supported by various other denominations of Dissenters. Out of some 12,700 day schools established in this country, therefore, no less than 10,500 are in connection with the Church of England. I make no boast of this; I merely state it as a matter of fact. In dealing with this subject we must consider, not only the position of the Established Church, but the feeling of the country. Now, without raising the question as to whether the secular system of education is good or bad, but assuming for the moment that it is the best that could be adopted, my belief is that if you attempted to force that system upon the public of this country they would reject it by a large majority. If, then, we wish to remedy the fearful evils which exist, let us, as men of sense, consider not only what is desirable, but what is practicable. Your first duty, as men of business, legislating for a great empire, is to consider the feelings of the people. If the feeling of the people of England is, as I believe it to be, against the secular system, and in favour of the teaching of religion in the schools, I would say to those who think the secular system the best, "If that system be even as good as you think it is, have you the power of forcing it upon the people against their will?" For my own part I believe that you have not. We then arrive at this point—how can we reconcile this religious teaching, with which I believe the country at large will not dispense, with the most scrupulous regard for the conscientious opinions of individuals? This object I desire to effect by the Bill I have prepared, and if, when hon. Members see that measure, they should think the intention is not carried out, I can only say that I shall be most willing to consider any suggestions which they may offer. I wish to provide for religious teaching, but at the same time to pay the most scrupulous regard to the feelings and opinions of individuals.

I propose that schools in connection with every religious denomination recognised by the Committee of Council—be they Church, or Baptist, or Presbyterian, or Wesleyan—wherever they exist, shall be equally entitled to claim the benefit of the rate, but subject to this most important and indispensable condition—that no child shall be excluded from any school on account of his religious creed. I propose that no Church school shall receive the benefit of the rate unless its conductors consent to receive dissenting children, without forcing upon them the religious instruction of the Church. I propose, also, that children belonging to the Church shall be received into dissenting schools, and that every school shall receive the children resident in its neighbourhood without imposing upon them the religious creed of the founders of such school. Well, this broad rule will dispose of all existing schools; but, then, I come to the important question of supplying the educational deficiencies which are admitted to exist by the erection of new schools. I have been told that my Bill would be more favourably considered if I did not provide for the establishment of new schools; but I rejected that proposal, and if the House chooses to omit this portion of the measure, the responsibility will rest with them.

In discharging the duty which I have undertaken, I will not take the responsibility of submitting to Parliament a measure avowedly incomplete; and I hold that, in the present state of education, any measure would be incomplete that did not provide for the establishment of new schools. The question then arises, what is to be the nature of the religious teaching in these new schools? My proposal is, that the religious teaching of the new schools shall be in accordance with the religion of the majority of the persons in the districts in and for which they are established. Is this fair, or is it not? If the majority of any district in which a school is erected should be in connection with the Established Church, the teaching in that school will be in accordance with the religious doctrines of the Church, subject to the rule that dissenting children shall be admitted, without being compelled to receive instruction in Church doctrines. If, however, the majority of a district in which a new school is established should belong to any other religious creed, I would respect the feelings of that majority, and I propose that the religious teaching should be in accordance with the creed of the majority, subject to the rule I have already mentioned, that all scholars belonging to the Established Church, or to any other denomination in the district, should be received into the school. But to avoid local disputes and struggles, I shall propose that in all such cases the religious teaching of the school shall be decided by the Committee of Council for Education. Now, what alternative is there if this scheme is not adopted? I wish more particularly to address myself to those Gentlemen who are anxious to adopt the American system in this country. A very large meeting for the promotion of education was held at Manchester at the commencement of last year, and on that occasion I find that the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright) strongly advocated the secular system, and used these expressions—

"He could not see any connection necessarily between religion and arithmetic, for example, or between the doctrines of Christianity and any of those other matters which formed the ordinary branches of education. He admitted, of course, that if a man was thoroughly educated—and, speaking in a Christian country, he might add, if he was a complete Christian man—he must not only have that instruction which was to be in the ordinary routine of schools, but he must also have, from some source or other, a training and instruction in matters of higher moment; but then, there was no sort of connection between the teaching of religion and the teaching of those things as regarded the place where they or the teacher by whom they were taught."

I cannot attach too much importance to this statement of the hon. Member for Manchester. If there are hon. Gentlemen in this House who contend that religion has nothing to do with education, and that we should teach no religion to children, I can only say that with them I have nothing in common; to them I make no appeal. But I here find a distinct recognition by the hon. Member for Manchester of the extreme importance of teaching religion to children as part of their education. The question, then, as between us, becomes narrow and simple. It is merely by whom and where shall this religious education be given? The hon. Member for Manchester, in a subsequent part of his speech, threw some light upon his views on this subject. He said—

"The question was, why was it that a system which was established in America, which every body applauded, which all persons submitted to with probably greater satisfaction than they subscribed any other State impost whatever, could not be transplanted into one of our towns?"

We have, then, the opinion of the hon. Member for Manchester—first, that religion must be taught; and, secondly, that it should be taught by the adoption of the American system. And I will ask the hon. Gentleman to meet me in a spirit of candour, and tell me, can the American system be adopted in this country? The House will, in the first place, remember that in America there is no Established Church; and, secondly, that the different religious sects are distributed with much greater equality of numbers than in this country. No one sect greatly predominates in the United States. But, above all, let me remind the House of the mode and manner in which the teaching of religion to children is secured. We have valuable information on this subject from an able and distinguished gentleman, known to many Members of this House. Mr. Twisleton visited the United States, and gave great attention to the religious teaching in the common schools. He addressed certain questions to some of the most distinguished men in New England. Mr. Twisleton's work is entitled Evidence as to the Religious Working of the Common Schools in the State of Massachusetts. He addressed certain questions to Mr.

Webster, Mr. Everett, Mr. Bancroft, Mr. Winthrop, and other distinguished persons, inquiring what the system of teaching religion was in the State of Massachusetts, and how it worked. Firstly, whether it was found that the masters departed from the understanding, and forced their views upon the scholars; and, above all, whether the system answered. These gentlemen were asked, "Is it within your knowledge that, apart from the common schools, the children educated in them do practically receive instruction in the tenets of the religious denominations to which they respectively belong?" The answers to this question were all in the affirmative. There is no distinctive religious teaching in the common schools, but all the children receive elsewhere distinctive religious teaching according to the tenets of the faith to which they respectively belong. The question, then, is, how did they get it? And the answer is, "in two modes." It is chiefly taught them at home, or is taught them at the Sunday schools. Now, I will appeal to those Gentlemen who advocate the adoption of the American system in England, and let me ask, will they trust to the teaching of religion to the children of England at their homes? What is the home of thousands of those to whom I have alluded in Devonshire and Lancashire, and other counties? Many of the children in these homes have never heard the name of the Saviour, and they scarcely know the existence of God. This is England, but not America. You cannot compare the State of a young country like America, where the population is scant, where work is abundant, where poverty is almost unknown, with England, where we have a dense population, a pauper population, where education has been long neglected, and where the results are such as I have described to-night. If you acknowledge—and the hon. Member for Manchester does acknowledge—that religion must be taught, then you may derive additional confirmation in your views by reflecting that in all the countries of Europe the first item in the educational code is religious instruction. Will you contend that where a population so debased, so ignorant, and so irreligious, as exists around us, is growing up and increasing each year, the wretched parents can teach their children as much religion as they ought to have? No! if these children are not taught religion in your schools, depend upon it they will not be taught at all.

Well, Sir, but I may fortify my views by examples which I hope the House will not disregard. I will give examples of different countries, of Protestant and Roman Catholic countries. The first is Austria. There, according to Mr. Kay—

"The Roman Catholic, as the national religion, is that taught in the schools of Austria; but dissenters from this form of faith are neither excluded nor separated, nor are they required to engage in the religious services or peculiar ecclesiastical learning in these schools. In the Roman Catholic schools, the Jews, as well as the Protestants, and other Dissenters, arrive one hour after, and leave one hour before the other pupils, these two hours being occupied with religious services and instruction, such as was attempted in this country some years ago. There are other non-Catholic schools, particularly in Transylvania and the military frontier, Galicia, Moravia, and Silesia, Bohemia, and Cathisia, amounting to 2,037 primary schools, the religious instruction of which is in accordance with the creed of these countries, the oversight of which is committed to the clergy of each particular denomination."

Here, in Austria, a Roman Catholic country, is adopted exactly the system which I have ventured to recommend for England—namely, the teaching of the religion of the majority, with perfect toleration for the opinions of the minority. I will now read an account of the schools of Switzerland—

"In the majority of these schools the members of the different religious sects are received with a willingness and with a Christian charity which puts to shame our religious intolerance. Those who differ in faith from the master of the school are allowed to absent themselves from the doctrinal lessons given in the school, and are required to attend one of their own clergy for the purpose of receiving from him their doctrinal instruction. Even in Friburg, a canton governed by Catholic priests, who are themselves under the influence of the Jesuits, Protestants may be found mingled with the Catholics in the schools, and are allowed to absent themselves during the hours of religious lessons; and in Argovie, a canton which has lately so distinguished itself by its opposition to the Jesuits of Lucerne, I found that several of the professors in the normal school were Catholics, and that the utmost tolerance was manifested to all the Catholics attending the cantonal schools."

Here you have Roman Catholic countries and Protestant countries, and in Switzerland, Protestant cantons and Catholic cantons, all adopting this rule of teaching the religion of the locality, but receiving other denominations with all respect for their religious feelings. In France the same system prevails.

"It was long debated in France how the difficulties arising from religious differences should be overcome,—whether they should attempt to establish separate schools for all the different sects of Christianity; whether they should open the schools to all these various sects and banish from them all religious instruction; or whether they should open the schools to the different Christian persuasions, and commit the management of each to a master chosen from the most numerous sect in the department or commune of which it was the normal or elementary school.... They (therefore) adopted the third alternative, and resolved to place each of the normal schools of the different departments, and each of the primary schools of the different communes, under the management of a teacher selected from the most numerous Christian sect in the department or commune in which the school is situated. They further arranged that the parents who differed in religion from the master or director of the school should have the power of requiring their children to absent themselves during the period of religious instruction.... So far from religious education being overlooked in France, it is constantly referred to in the different decrees on the subject of education as of the most deep and momentous importance; and the religious education and moral character of the candidate masters are strictly examined into before they can receive their brevets de capacité, enabling them to conduct primary schools."

I have on several other occasions drawn the attention of the House to the signal success of the laudable exertions of the present Bishop of Manchester when at the head of that splendid school—King Edward's school at Birmingham—one of the best and largest educational establishments in this kingdom. The teaching of that school is that of the Church of England, but no Dissenting child has the doctrine of the Church forced upon him. The consequence is, that there are no denominations of Christians who do not freely and willingly come to participate in the benefits of King Edward's School at Birmingham, and religious difficulty and dissensions are unknown. At this moment the same system is going on at this school, and is contributing to the welfare of the great town of Birmingham. Well, Sir, let me ask, why is it that the system that gets over this great difficulty in France, in Austria, and in Switzerland, and which has been tried with success in some instances at home, is not good for general adoption? I shall be glad to hear an answer to this question. This principle seems to me to solve the difficulty, and if you approach it in the right spirit I see no reason why the difficulty should not be overcome. In a very large number of Church schools connected with the National Society the Catechism is not now insisted upon in the case of dissenting children. Such is the practice in many parts of England, and I hope that we may see it generally adopted throughout the country; for I am convinced that the only result of endeavouring to force any particular creed upon reluctant children will be, not to make them adopt that creed, but to drive them from the schools.

I will not longer detain the House. I have now explained the mode in which I propose to draw my Bill if the House will permit me to introduce it, and I have explained the manner in which, in my opinion, the difficulties which have hitherto beset this great and important question may be overcome. That Bill may, and probably will be, unsuccessful; but I feel a deep conviction that year by year the momentous nature of this question will become more apparent, and that ere long it must be settled upon principles similar to those which I have ventured to explain. Sir, I am willing to incur the risk of failure in a cause which I believe to be so important. I am willing to incur even more than the risk of failure. I am confident that by my own friends I shall be told that I have gone too far. Churchmen will say that I have conceded too much, and Dissenters that I have conceded not enough. I have endeavoured, however, with a single-minded object to deal with the question in a spirit of perfect justice and fairness to all, and in that spirit exclusively I venture to ask leave to introduce this Bill. Be its fate what it may, be the consequences to myself what they may, I can only say that it will always remain to me a matter of satisfaction that I have endeavoured to make some contribution to a cause upon which I most conscientiously believe that the character and future welfare of this country essentially depend.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill for the better encouragement and promotion of Education in England."

MR. HADFIELD said, he could not give in his adhesion to the principle laid down by the right hon. Gentleman. He would like to see some portion of the national taxation applied to the improvement and extension of education, but not in the way proposed. He attached very little importance to the statistics quoted by the right hon. Baronet, so far as they related to the system of education. The past thirty or forty years had shown the great efficacy of voluntary efforts. The right hon. Gentleman had claimed a preponderance of the Established Church in the matter of education, but how had he come to ignore Sunday schools, in which no less than 4,500,000 children were taught? Taking day schools along with them, there were upwards of 4,000,000 children receiving education. And the great fact ought to be proclaimed everywhere, that there were 260,000 voluntary teachers engaged in Sunday schools, without any remuneration whatever. Of the 4,500,000 children taught in Sunday schools, he believed not more than one-fourth belonged to the Church of England. There was the greatest anxiety on the part of parents to get their children into those schools; and he did not believe that if day schools were supported by rates, there would be any great increase of the children under instruction. When the Manchester Bill was introduced, it had been shown that there was no lack of schools; the difficulty was to get children to attend them. There was a common object among all parties in that House to promote education; but he doubted whether it could be done merely by levying taxes in its support. Such a system was calculated to weaken the efforts of voluntaries in all parts of the country. He should peruse the Bill of the right hon. Baronet with great attention, but he would protest in the outset against the principle of a compulsory tax for educational purposes. He thought that voluntary efforts, properly regulated, were sufficient to provide for the educational wants of the country.

LORD STANLEY: Sir, it would be equally difficult and superfluous in me to follow my right hon. Friend (Sir J. Paxton) through the vast variety of important details which he has discussed at such length. I do not intend to attempt it; but I wish to take this earliest opportunity of expressing, in the strongest and most decided manner, my approval of and adhesion to the general principle upon which my right hon. Friend attempts to settle this question. I think the present is a time eminently favourable to such a settlement. The state of public feeling upon the subject is in many respects different to what it was a few years ago. There is, Sir, a growing inclination and desire upon all sides to effect some compromise—to consent to some sacrifices of opinion—with a view of passing a measure of which the want is yearly more and more felt, and which shall be practically effective. Everything points to such a result. Theories, which a few years ago had great currency, have, after frequent discussion both in and out of the House, been condemned by public opinion. For instance, there is the voluntary system, which a few years ago was much more popular than it is now. Now, I am not going to argue upon the principle of the voluntary system, but I am considering how far it can practically be adopted. We have had Education Bills emanating from every section of the House, and I think it is impossible to look at their results without seeing that the purely voluntary principle is now supported but by a very small minority. The hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. W. J. Fox), five years ago, introduced an Education Bill founded upon the secular system. The noble Lord the present Colonial Secretary (Lord John Russell) two years ago, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich in the course of this evening, have each submitted propositions founded on a different principle. All these three measures, differing in many respects, agreed in this, that they recognise the principle of State interference. That principle, therefore, is practically recognised by a large majority, both in the House and out of doors. I think, then, I may assume that we have got rid of any practical proposition founded upon the purely voluntary principle. Well, then, in respect to a purely secular system—and I am not about to argue that question at the present moment—I know that a strong feeling exists in the minds of some persons in favour of that principle. For my own part I must say I have seen so much mischief done amongst the labouring population by the state of gross and utter ignorance in which they remained, that I hope I shall be pardoned in saying that I am disposed to support almost any feasible plan which would give them the elements of knowledge, and enable them to acquire useful information. I do not object to the secular system upon any ground of principle, but I think that in the present generation, and in the present temper of the country, it would be utterly impossible to carry out such a system. In the first place, you would have the clergy of every denomination against you. In England and Wales there are, in the ranks of the clergy, some 15,000 able, active, educated men, all exercising considerable influence in their respective localities, and possessing at this moment a great and deserved influence and control over the education of the people. Not only the clergy, but the feeling of a great mass of the laity, is against any system of education which does not include some mixture of religious teaching. There may be some persons so convinced of the superiority of a secular system that, for the sake of the advantages it might bring with it, they would be willing to wait even ten or fifteen years to see it established. Well, that is not the view I take of the question. I look to the present state of public feeling and public opinion; I see that some system must be adopted, and I believe the only system that will be successful is one which is, to a certain extent, denominational. Well, then, assuming these two principles, namely, the principle of State interference and of religious teaching, it remains for us to see what other requisites are necessary for an efficient educational measure. I think you will require to have in your system a full recognition of, and a satisfactory means of co-operation with, the various schools that are actually in existence. I do not think that any educational scheme will work successfully that undertakes the removal of the existing schools, and proposes to establish an educational system de novo. At the same time I am fully aware of the inefficiency of the existing means of education. I own that the existing schools are deficient both in number and quality; still we must admit that they do in a manner give instruction to a large portion of the population. To go no further than this fact, there are a great many persons who feel a deep interest in them, and who believe that they are doing a vast amount of good. Now, I am satisfied that any system which would propose to sweep those schools away would meet with such opposition that it could not pass through Parliament. Well, now, then, let us see what my right hon. Friend proposes to do for the schools that are actually in existence. In every way his measure will be permissive, and not compulsory. If all or any of the existing schools stand aloof from accepting his measure, they will remain precisely in the same position as they were in before the Bill passed. If they are willing to accept the aid held out by my right hon. Friend's measure, they will be permitted to do so on two conditions, which are of a simple and reasonable nature. The one is that of periodical inspection—a condition to which, I apprehend, there will be no objection. Indeed, such a provision follows almost as a necessary consequence from the principle of Government assistance. Nothing can be more just than that those who contribute funds towards the support of local schools should possess the means of ascertaining that their money has been satisfactorily distributed. That is a point which I think will not be disputed. Well, but the other condition of my right hon. Friend is perhaps of a more important and doubtful character—my right hon. Friend proposes to make religious teaching in all schools optional, and not compulsory. I believe that if you are to have denominational schools—and I assume that I have shown them to be absolutely necessary—it is only by such a provision as this that you can reconcile their existence as schools supported by the State, with common equity and justice to the various religious sects. A purely denominational system of education, made compulsory, would necessarily be productive of great unfairness to those sects that are small in number, whose members are scattered, and who would not have an opportunity of establishing a school of their own. If, then, you would do justice towards such religious communities, it is not enough to give the means for the establishment of a school, but you must also have some legislative provision to allow the schools belonging to the various sects to partake of the general advantages of your education, and this you can only do by dispensing with the attendance of the dissenting children during the time of religious instruction. Although I listened with great interest to my right hon. Friend's statement upon this point, I am not quite sure how far my right hon. Friend means to go in this direction; but I have no hesitation in saying that you will not be able to carry out this principle unless you lay it down broadly that the attendance upon all religious teaching is to be optional with the parents of the children. I do not think there can be any well-grounded objection against the principle of such an arrangement. I respect the feelings of a man who claims religious equality for himself, but I do not understand, and not understanding perhaps I do not respect, the feelings of those who will not allow any children to frequent their schools, unless those upon whom they can force their own religious teaching. I have little doubt but that my right hon. Friend's proposition upon this point will meet with opposition from various quarters. Of course, it will not satisfy those who desire to see a purely secular system established, nor yet those who adhere to one strictly denominational. But the principle, after all, is analogous to—I do not say identical with—that which for twenty years has worked successfully in Ireland, and of which the justice and fairness are now generally recognised. As to that part of my right hon. Friend's measure in which he proposes the establishment of new schools, I confess I think that it is open to serious objection. I am not insensible to the urgent necessity for the establishment of such schools which exists in many districts. I quite allow that the plan of making the religious teaching in each school depend on the tenets of the majority in that locality is the fairest and most acceptable that, under the circumstances, could be devised. Although, however, it is so fair and so equitable, that there may be no reasonable ground of complaint against it, still, I think, wherever you found new and free schools with the public money, and diffuse religious teaching upon the children there, there will be a good deal of angry feeling produced, and such a controversy will arise as will, in the majority of cases, render the success of your experiment doubtful. But that is not, after all, an integral part of my right hon. Friend's proposition; it is simply a provision which, if the House thinks objectionable, it can remove without in any way affecting the general principle of the measure. The Bill of my right hon. Friend will not compel any locality to pay for such schools; it will simply empower a majority of the inhabitants of a locality to establish them if such majority shall think fit. I regard that provision as particularly important (I mean the purely permissive character of the measure), because there are many persons who altogether object to any State interference in the matter of education, and contend that such an interference would practically amount to a system of centralisation. I can conceive that there are localities in which the system of free schools would be more desirable. I can also conceive that there are other parts of the country where the inhabitants are quite ready to pay the school fees, and therefore where free schools are not required. But what I dwell upon is, that this Bill, while giving assistance out of the funds of the State, in no way discourages, but on the contrary encourages and stimulates, the efforts of public bodies in various parts of the country, and also the efforts of private individuals. You recognise here the various principles which I believe to be necessary for a successful system of education. You recognise the principle of State assistance. You recognise the principle of religious teaching. You recognise the principle of including existing schools in your system. And, above all, you recognise the principle of local government and self-management. These, I hold, are principles upon which any measure of this kind, to be successful, must be founded. The rest of the Bill, important as it is, is comparatively matter of detail, which we shall have ample opportunity of discussing by and by. We are dealing now with the principle only; that principle I believe to be sound, and I know no other on which it will be practically possible to carry out a measure of education. I am much encouraged by observing that there is comparatively little difference in point of principle between the Bill of my right hon. Friend and that proposed by a noble Lord on the other side of the House (Lord J. Russell). And if the noble Lord who lately presided over the department of education should be able in the present Session to bring in his measure, I think that that measure and the measure of my right hon. Friend might well be referred to the same Committee with a view to their amalgamation. There are certainly no such differences of opinion as should prevent that course being adopted; and I hope that, as a result, we shall ultimately be able, not only to settle finally this question of education, but to settle it in a manner that will meet with the concurrence of a large majority both in this House and in the country.

SIR GEORGE GREY: I presume, Sir, the House will not at present be called upon to express a decided opinion on the measure which has been laid before them in detail by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich. I am desirous, on the part of the Government, to state that they give their willing assent to the introduction of this measure; and I am sure the House will agree with me in thinking that the right hon. Gentleman who has brought it forward is entitled to great credit for the spirit in which he has approached the subject, and for the comprehensiveness and liberality of his scheme. I only wish I could feel sanguine as to the proposed measure proving an effectual remedy for that defect in the education of the large body of the people which we all admit at present to exist. The right hon. Gentleman himself did not speak in a sanguine tone of its success, but I am certain that the discussion which the introduction of the measure will give rise to will be most useful and productive of great advantage. With regard to the basis on which the right hon. Gentleman has proceeded, I to a great extent agree with him, without pledging myself to all the statistics to which he has referred as showing the want of education among a large portion of the lower classes. Without drawing exactly the same inferences from those statistics, I still think that we must admit that there is a great portion of the children of the lower classes throughout this country who receive a very imperfect education, while there is a still larger portion who, there is every reason to believe, receive no education at all, but who are brought up in ignorance, the parent of crime, if, indeed, they are not actually trained by their parents to crime, in order to enable them to profit from the immediate fruits of the nefarious gains of their children. This is a state of things it must be admitted by all to be most discreditable to a Christian country. I must advert to one point which escaped the attention of the right hon. Gentleman, and which I believe to be most important. In comparing the statistics of education in this country with those of continental countries, he did not appear to bear in mind that in this country we have never adopted—and I doubt whether we are prepared to adopt—a compulsory system. I do not mean compulsory as regards the rate, but as regards the attendance of the children, and the penalties inflicted on parents for not enforcing such attendance. I believe this compulsory system prevails in America and in several continental countries. I do not see how we are to adopt it, but I am afraid that until we do we shall see that, notwithstanding increased provision for education, there will still be an indifference to education among a large portion of the community; and we must be prepared to see a large proportion of children remain uneducated. The right hon. Gentleman, however, has ample grounds for bringing this subject before the House, and he has given great consideration to the means of remedying the deficiency in the existing means for the education of the people. I quite agree with him that the voluntary system has failed to accomplish that object. It has done a great deal, and I by no means wish to undervalue the laudable exertions of those by whose voluntary efforts schools have been established and supported; but I am convinced that the voluntary system has not kept pace with the wants of our increasing population, and that it has utterly failed adequately to supply the defect in the education of the people which has been proved to exist. I was a Member of the Committee to which the Manchester and Salford Bill was referred. We there received much information on this subject. There were before that Committee three parties—the advocates of the voluntary system, those who approved the Manchester and Salford scheme, and those who advocated the secular system of education. The two latter agreed in the necessity of additional means of education, and in the principle of making a rate for this purpose; but the point on which they diverged was as to the mode of applying the money. With regard to the principle of rating I agreed with the majority of that Committee, that it was, under certain circumstances, in certain districts, desirable to supply increased means of education by a rate; but I am afraid the right hon. Gentleman will find, as we did, that the great and serious difficulty that will arise will be as to the mode of applying the money levied under its provisions. I think that the constitution of the Board of Education proposed by the right hon. Gentleman is sound and good. I do not say that it is not capable of improvement, but I think its principle is a fair one. The new scheme of the right hon. Gentleman, so far as it relates to corporate towns, is substantially the same as the Manchester and Salford scheme, which he proposes to extend to the country at large. I have no doubt that the district boards will have very different duties to perform from those performed by boards in large and populous places like Manchester, and I am afraid—although I do not see how he could make the presence of children compulsory—that the fact of the Bill being permissive will, in many country districts, render it nugatory, and that we are consequently debarred from looking for any large results from the measure. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that it is impossible to anticipate success for a general system of education that does not include existing schools—for you cannot, by a new scheme, supersede those schools which have been extended throughout the land, and are daily increasing. You must, as the right hon. Gentleman has done, give them the option of coming under the provisions of this Bill, subject to certain conditions which they will be required to adopt. With respect to the new schools, I confess I feel that a difficulty will arise. If I understand the right hon. Gentleman rightly, he intends that in districts requiring new schools the district board should be authorised to provide them out of the rates, and that in these schools the religious instruction is to be in accordance with the religious opinions of the majority of the inhabitants of the district. But take, for instance, a large district, in which the majority are members of the Church of England—would he, in such a case, make no provision for those who belong to other religious denominations? Now, I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that, as those who differ from the Church of England will be rated for educational purposes, some provision ought to be made to educate their children according to their religious tenets. The right hon. Baronet has said nothing as to the amount of the rate which it shall be in the power of the board to raise, and, although that may be a matter of detail, still it would be as well that the House should be made acquainted with its limit. [Sir J. PAKINGTON was understood to say that 6d. would be the limit.] With regard to the question of religious or secular instruction, I feel, from having attended closely to the evidence taken before the Committee on the Manchester and Salford Bill, that the difference between the advocates of the two systems is less than I had imagined. The secular system of education, as explained by its advocates, is not a system separate from the religious system; but the advocates of the secular system contend that the secular branches of education should be paid for by rates, and that religious instruction should be afforded through the agency of funds raised from private sources. I hope, the difference being so trifling, that there will be an approach to union between the two parties, and I do not despair of seeing them agree to work together on some common ground in promoting the important objects they have in view. It has been suggested that the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman and the Bill of my noble Friend the Member for London should be referred to a Select Committee. Now, to that I have no objection, except that I think we should only be travelling over the same ground that we have so often gone over before. If any hon. Gentleman will take the trouble to refer to the evidence taken before the Manchester and Salford Committee, he will find that the subject as regards large towns has been most fully and fairly discussed, and I think he will see that we possess as much information as is necessary. With regard to country districts the case may be different, and further inquiry may be necessary; but, as to the general question of statistics and the other points on which information is required, I believe that the evidence taken before the Committee to which I have referred is amply sufficient, without referring this Bill to a Select Committee. I presume the right hon. Gentleman will not press the second reading of the Bill before Easter. [Sir J. PAKINGTON: Hear, hear!] It is a measure that ought to be before the country for full consideration before any decision is adopted with regard to it, and I hope, when the time arrives for taking it into consideration, that we shall approach it with the earnest desire of promoting the great object which all must have in view, and of overcoming the difficulties which impede the progress of education throughout the country. I can assure the right hon. Baronet that, although I do not approach this Bill in any spirit of criticism, I think he has made an omission, or rather, I ought to say, he has not fulfilled an anticipation to which the early portion of his speech gave rise. I had anticipated, from that part of his speech, and from the strictures which he passed upon the Committee of Council on Education, that he was about to propose the establishment of a Minister of Public Instruction. Now, I am not prepared to say that the Committee of Council on Education is, under present circumstances, the best scheme which can be devised for its object; but I say that, under all the failures which have taken place in Education Bills, and under all the difficulties which have existed, that Committee has done an immense deal towards promoting education throughout the country, and raising the standard of education by improving the qualifications of the school-masters. The right hon. Baronet has pointed it out as one of the defects of the system, that it has made the standard of education of the schoolmasters too high. Now, that may be the case as regards some small schools, but I think that the great defect which first attracted the attention of this House was the low standard of education among the schoolmasters, and, in my opinion, great benefit has resulted from raising the standard. What the right hon. Gentleman has said is perfectly true, that you educate men as schoolmasters, and then, when they are qualified for that position, the pay is so small that they are tempted to trust to their talents for advancement in some other career, and to forsake that profession for which they were originally designed. That is no doubt true, in many cases; but the way to remedy such a state of things is not by lowering the standard of qualification in the schoolmasters, but by raising their pay, and making it to their interest to remain in a profession which, however humble and laborious, is not the less honourable. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman has done the Committee of Council on Education justice in the reference he made to grants to certain parishes in the metropolis. I thought at the time that exceptions had been made in favour of poor districts to that general rule, by which grants of money are given in proportion to the funds raised in the locality; and, on referring to the list of grants, I found that very large grants have been made to some of the poorest and most populous parishes. I asked the right hon. Gentleman if, in the case of Shoreditch and St. Giles, any application for a grant had been made and refused, and he could not give me any information on that subject. There may be other reasons beyond inability to raise funds which may prevent applications being made. Objections have, in some cases, been entertained on the score of the inspection which was inseparable from Government grants. I wish to point out to the House a few of the grants which have been made, to the poorest districts, extracted from a complete list of them in the last volume of minutes. There has been made to Spitalfields a grant of 770*l.*; to St. George's in the East a grant of 2,800*l.*; to St. Mary's, Tothill Fields, a grant of 1,350*l.*; to Whitechapel a grant of 1,060*l.*; and to the different parishes of Bethnal Green a sum of no less than 9,062*l.* If the general rule on which grants are made had been unreasonably adhered to, without exception, I must admit that there would be great force in the objections of the right hon. Baronet, but the instances I have mentioned will, I think, show the House that such has not been the case. With these few observations I will pleasure assent to the introduction of the Bill, and I sincerely hope that the discussion to which it must give rise will be attended with beneficial results in promoting that which all must concur in desiring—the extension of the education of the people of this country.

Lord ROBERT CECIL said, he fully concurred in thinking, with the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, that the measure of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington) did not differ essentially from the secular system of hon. Gentlemen opposite. The statistics of the right hon. Baronet were, he thought, overcharged, and the right hon. Gentleman had, he considered, drawn undue inferences from them. The right hon. Gentleman drew a fearful picture of the state of crime and the want of education in this country, but the most horrible features in his picture were drawn from the criminality of persons who were now adults, and whose education, such as it was, took place some ten or twelve years ago. Whatever force might be derived from that was consequently worthless for the purposes of the present question; for the very essence of the case of those who were satisfied with the voluntary system, or the system of the Committee of Council on Education, was, that education had made great and rapid progress within the last twenty years. A large portion, also, of the instances adduced by the right hon. Gentleman to darken the picture of social evil were taken from large towns, isolated plague-spots in the country—Gateshead, Preston, Tynemouth, Sheffield, Manchester, and Liverpool—in all of which the want of education was greatly above the average want throughout England and Wales. The right hon. Gentleman also laid considerable stress upon the Reports of the National Society on the schools under their management, but the only details of evils connected with those schools were those which were connected with the buildings, and he did not bring forward a single instance where the system of education in those schools was insufficient or imperfect. The noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) had dwelt in terms of commendation upon the permissive character of the present measure; but it seemed to him (Lord R. Cecil) that this permissiveness cut from under the noble Lord's feet the only ground on which he supported the measure; namely, that there was a great want of education in the country, and that it was owing either to unwillingness or inability on the part of the people to subscribe to the establishment and maintenance of schools, and to the Committee of Council on Education not extending their aid to districts where, from unwillingness or inability, the public did not come forward with the subscription necessary to obtain the Privy Council grant. Now, if people were not generous enough or rich enough to subscribe for the building of a school, he doubted very much whether they would be generous or rich enough to impose a rate upon themselves for that purpose. Great stress had been laid on the fact that the Bill did not attempt to override existing schools, but left things as they were. This seemed to be a perfect illusion; for the moment a parish imposed a rate upon itself for the support of a school, that moment they would find that all private sources of support for other schools would be dried up and cease altogether. As far as religious instruction was concerned, he looked upon the Bill as the secular system in disguise. The right hon. Gentleman likewise spoke of the necessity of maintaining the great vital doctrines of Christianity, in which we were all agreed; but he (Lord R. Cecil) was not aware of what those vital doctrines of Christianity were in which we were all agreed. Between a Unitarian on the one hand, and a member of the Church of England on the other, there could be no agreement at all; and would they draw a line between the Unitarian and the rest of the Christian community, and say, "We will educate all on this side, but none on the other?" He could tell the right hon. Gentleman that the Unitarians were in some places by no means an insignificant minority of the population. In Manchester they had two schools, and would no doubt be strong enough to swamp a school if they thought proper. They might withdraw half the children from the religious teaching of the school, and so the religious teaching would cease altogether. The schools would be thrown into the hands of those who despised dogmatic instruction; and slowly, by degrees, the instruction given would be reduced to the colourless teaching advocated by the friends of the secular system. He deprecated anything that could tend to confuse the outlines of belief—that attempted to unite sects that were irreconcileable to each other; and still more, anything that would give the children an impression that the religious points set aside in the schools were unimportant points, not worth fighting for—open questions, to be believed or not. The result of the system of teaching, as proposed by the right hon. Baronet, would be to make England a nation of infidels.

Mr. W. J. FOX said, although he could not join with the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) in giving his unqualified adhesion to this Bill, yet he felt grateful to the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Pakington), for the able, candid, and earnest manner in which he had brought forward this question. It was a gratifying circumstance that the House would have two measures on education before its consideration, emanating respectively from such influential individuals as the present Colonial Secretary and the right hon. Baronet opposite. The speech of the noble Lord, who had last addressed the House, indicated that some of those obstacles to the solution of this question which had hitherto proved so formidable, had by no means given way. The friends of national education must, however, endeavour to approximate as closely as they could, and agree to forego objects impracticable in the present state of society, in order to combine in the great work of elevating the poorer classes from their degraded condition. In this spirit this measure appeared to have been prepared, and in the same spirit it was to be hoped that it would be judged by all parties, whether they were attached to the secular or to the religious system, to Church of England, or to Dissenting schools. Whatever figures might be quoted in that House, showing that schools and teachers had accumulated, no one could gainsay the actual fact which the Census revealed, that out of every four persons who were married one at least made his or her mark instead of signing a name; when, also, a large proportion of the men enrolled in the militia regiments of many counties were unable to write their own signatures; and when, likewise, although the letters from private soldiers in the East showed an amazing advance of intelligence in the ranks of the army, the tracts distributed in the hospital at Scutari were nevertheless generally read by one person to four or five others, indicating that one out of five was about the proportion of those gallant invalids who were able to read. Now there was evidently throughout the country a failure in our schools as a system. You found this from the reports of the inspectors, one of whom some time ago declared that our schools generally were so poor and so inefficient that it would hardly gratify the friends of education even if every child in this country attended one of those schools. Directors of mechanics' institutions found that the great obstacle to their beneficial working was the want of elementary training among the people, and the experience gained in the course of the first session of the People's College lately established in London was of such a kind as led those at its head to endeavour to combine an elementary school with it, because they found that the minds of those they desired to enrol as their students were not sufficiently prepared. The Bishop of Manchester had lately made the very same complaint in opening an institution at Bury, and the experience of such institutions everywhere showed that sounder elementary instruction must be administered in the English schools. We might then, he thought, even without considering the extension of education, safely assume that a great improvement was absolutely necessary in its quality, if we would bring the country into a condition as regarded instruction which would be creditable to the national character. He would not attempt to analyse the provisions of the Bill now brought before the House, but he was highly gratified with the proposition — which he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would see no occasion to relinquish — that all the schools established under this Act should be free. He believed that the provision was of most material importance, and he thought it would meet to a great extent the objection of the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary that you would not get the children into these schools. The working classes generally showed considerable appreciation of superior teaching. If one school had been found better than another it was sure to be especially resorted to; and that had often been the case in defiance even of religious prejudices. One great advantage which he anticipated from freedom in the schools was, that it would afford an opening for the exercise of a very legitimate and wholesome influence on the minds of the working classes by employers. Every employer was desirous of having intelligent workpeople; and when young persons came to ask for employment, they might fairly tell them that they must first attend a gratuitous school in the neighbourhood. This was no mere speculation. It had been stated in evidence that 120 important firms in Manchester had declared their determination to make instruction, to a reasonable extent, a condition of employment in their establishments, provided there were free schools in the neighbourhood, so that the children could get this education without expense; and such a declaration on the part of employers, extending throughout the country, would stand very much in the place of the compulsory system. With schools which were perfectly free, it would be practicable to have, what had been attended with so much advantage in the United States, a graduated system of schools, commencing with schools of an elementary character, and rising gradually till they got to the very threshold of collegiate instruction. In America, one result of that graduated school system had been to lower the cost of education very considerably. One word with regard to the religious question. Had the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Pakington) attended to the speeches of the advocates of what was termed the secular system, he would not have been as surprised as he appeared to be at the observations made by the right hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. M. Gibson) on the occasion to which he referred, because he only expressed the opinions generally held by those who were in favour of that system. These persons did not object to religion being taught at all, but to its being taught by the schoolmaster — and they were supported in their view by the Government, who thought that linear drawing, perspective, and the ornamental arts might be usefully taught without any admixture of religious instruction. There were agencies at work throughout the country which would prevent even the children of profligate parents from being wholly destitute of religious teaching. Moreover, it was an unfounded notion that the poor were prejudiced against anything free. In Prussia, during the stormy political scenes of 1848, the school system remained perfectly unshaken, and only this alteration was made in it — namely, that, whereas, up to that time there had been a payment from the parents, the schools were afterwards, in obedience to the public voice, made perfectly free. This portion of the right hon. Gentleman's measure for making the schools free, he (Mr. Fox) deemed therefore of great importance, and he believed the establishment of such a system would lead to an elevation in the standard of instruction. As to the charge of eliminating religion from education brought against the advocates of what was called the secular system, this phrase arose from a mistaken idea of the character of a school. The school instructed; it did not educate. The entirety of education was far beyond the grasp of the schoolmaster; it depended upon a variety of agencies and influences far beyond him. The best agent in this work was, no doubt, a truly religious parent, and the next best was to be found in the generous exertions made in the Sunday schools—an agency which existed all over the country, and which would never fail to lay hold upon the forsaken child, endeavour to guide him in the way of religion, and do what could be done towards touching his conscience and purifying and elevating his soul. But he thought there were very serious objections to making the schoolmaster the religious teacher, for there was the danger of his converting the school into a mere proselytising shop, and also of rendering secular education subordinate to religious instruction. He should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman would seriously inquire whether the low state of education of which he complained, and which was for some reason or other the general characteristic of our schools, was not associated with the fact of those schools being connected with the Church of England and other religious denominations? A teacher was selected, not for his intellectual character, not for his extensive or appropriate acquirements, but for his religious character. He filled the position of a species of missionary. The secular education he was called upon to impart became a matter of secondary and subordinate importance to the religious instruction given, and he unscrupulously sacrificed it whenever he imagined that by so doing he could promote the higher object. This would be a noble state of mind for a missionary, a clergyman, or a Dissenting minister, but he maintained it was not a state of mind for a teacher of reading, writing, and arithmetic. What would be the result if the same feeling were made predominant in the counting house or in the camp? The whole of our schools were at present so closely connected with the various religious denominations that that very fact must necessarily tend to keep down the intellectual standard of the instruction imparted. But, surely, it would not depreciate religious education if the child were led to know that there was a place endowed with greater sanctity than the schoolroom, where his religious feelings were to be matured, confirmed, and expanded. If education were to be raised to a higher standard, he believed there was a power in knowledge which would in itself alone enable the child to exercise his own judgment with a proper acuteness and power. Education called the faculties into their appropriate exercise, and there need be no apprehension that a child would not be religious, even if he had not that specific and dogmatic teaching forced upon him which the noble Lord who spoke last seemed to think so very desirable. Let character have its formation and the mind its nurture and strength, and, though the mind were placed under a superstitious schoolmaster it would outgrow superstition; though it were under a fanatical schoolmaster, it would outgrow fanaticism; though it were under the worst of bigots, it would be likely in time to see its way charitably and generously; and, though it were under a sceptical schoolmaster, scepticism would, he believed, perish with its growth, and it would be open to the influences of truth, history, and science, and would find its way towards that religion which was in harmony with human nature and which raised human nature to its highest pitch. He felt sure that all who thought with him upon the question of education would not feel inclined to stand in the way of fair and grateful consideration of any propositions which might be laid before them by the right hon. Baronet.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he thought the friends of education were greatly indebted to the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Pakington) for the effort he had made to bring this subject under the consideration of the House. The right hon. Gentleman, acting consistently with his own predilections, had undoubtedly endeavoured to take a considerable step towards establishing a free system of national education, and had recognised, to a great extent, the principle of liberty of conscience. There was one statement in the right hon. Baronet's speech to which he (Mr. M. Gibson) must demur; he referred to the statement that the Manchester and Salford Bill was thrown out through a paltry quibble. As he was the Member who moved the Amendment which defeated the Bill on the second reading, he felt bound, in justice to himself, to defend the course which he took. Though it was not unimportant whether measures of that kind were private or public, the reason why the Bill was defeated was, that it did not meet with the concurrence of the Corporation of Manchester, who represented the great body of the rate-payers. When a private Bill was introduced in that House which would have taxed a locality contrary to the wish of the great majority of the taxpayers of that locality, and whom in this case he represented, he felt that he would be most legitimately discharging his duty in opposing its progress. The right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary had correctly represented the state of affairs in the Committee on the Manchester and Salford Bill, when he stated that there were three parties concerned; namely, the voluntaries, the世俗派, and the Manchester and Salford educationists. The Bill now sought to be introduced was to a great extent identical with that of the Manchester and Salford educationists. If ever any system of national education was to be adopted, the three parties to whom he referred must unite and endeavour in some way to settle their differences. He was quite sure, at least, that any two of these bodies could defeat the third, and before any system of national education could be established two of them must unite. The two which he thought most likely to unite, were the party of the right hon. Baronet opposite and the secular party. Those parties were both agreed upon the question of rates, the question of local management, and upon the principle, at least, of separating religious instruction from secular instruction to the extent, that persons of different religious denominations might be associated together in one common school; but the rock a head upon which they split was the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman, to make it a condition that in any school supported by rates some religion or other should be taught. The right hon. Gentleman thus involved himself in a scheme for teaching all religions and every conflicting form of theological opinion at the public expense. This was a difficulty hard to be overcome, because the sincere religious world would not consent to any plan that professed to teach all forms of religion at the public expense. If public education were to be supported by taxes and rates, they preferred that it should not go beyond secular teaching, and that religious instruction should be supplied by other means and in other ways. He was most anxious to co-operate with the right hon.

Mr. M. Gibson

Baronet, but he would ask the right hon. Gentleman what his hon. Friend behind him, the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner), would say, supposing he were one of a minority residing in a parish where the majority of the ratepayers were Roman Catholics, if that majority established a school, carried it on in strict accordance with Roman Catholic principles, and then called upon the hon. Member to contribute his rate towards its support? Why, the hon. Gentleman would treat the proposal with all the indignation with which he now treated the annual proposal to give grants of the public money to the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth in Ireland. The existence of a Church Establishment would make the difficulty very much greater; for it would, of course, be argued that it was absurd for the State to raise taxes to teach a religion which was opposed to the religion of the State Church. He should, therefore, for his part, decline to involve himself in the religious element at all. The right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary had very correctly described the secular plan of education. The advocates of that scheme did not prevent religion from forming part of a child's education; all they asked was, that certain hours in the day should be set apart for religious instruction, during which time no child should be compelled to attend, and that the school should be opened at other hours for secular instruction. They recognised the necessity of religious teaching being a part of education, but they maintained that if education was to be supported by public rates the schools must be free and accessible to all, which they never could be unless they were secular and not religious schools of a denominational character. There being three parties in the country on this subject, and two of them now being in a manner before the House, it was not unreasonable that the third—the secular party—should also be permitted to introduce a Bill. That party had a Bill ready, and some time ago a body of gentlemen who had taken a very active part in promoting the secular system of education had requested him to ask the permission of the House to lay it on the table. In accordance, therefore, with that request, and feeling that after what had passed that night it was of great importance, if the different parties ever were to agree, that their respective plans should all be laid before the House together, he would take this opportunity of giving notice that at as early a period as possible he would ask the permission of the House to introduce a Bill for providing a secular scheme of education.

Mr. ADDERLEY said, he thought the House was greatly indebted to the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Pakington) for his admirable statement of the condition of education in this country, and for the definite scheme which he proposed for remedying the present lamentable state of things which he had submitted to them. The best course, he considered, for the House to take would be to allow the Bill to be printed and circulated, before entering into its merits, in order that it might be compared with the rival Bill of the noble Lord the Member for the City of London. He did not feel, however, any particular deference for the noble Lord's Bill, which, he thought, had been crudely drawn and precipitately introduced. He could not help thinking that the noble Lord, finding that the right hon. Baronet was forestalling him on a subject in which he had always been accustomed to take a prominent part, had hastily introduced his ill-considered Bill, in order that he might still retain the appearance of taking the lead on the subject of education. But he could not consent, either with respect to education or colonial legislation, to wait any apocryphal period for the noble Lord's return from Vienna to discuss measures in that House. He thought that the present question was too important and urgent to be regarded as a matter of personal or party rivalry between any persons, and he would say, further, that the time for discussion was past and the moment for action had fully arrived, though it seemed to be considered as a thing of course that there should be an annual education debate, which had never yet produced any practical result. How many proposals on the subject of education had been discussed in that House, and elaborate resolutions had been passed without any difference of opinion in another place, and yet they had not moved a single inch towards carrying out the common object of them all. At the present moment there were two Bills before the House connected with education, both of which might be called denominational, and a third plan had just been referred to by the right hon. Gentleman who last spoke, which might be described as the secular plan. Perhaps the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord R. Cecil) might propose a fourth plan embodying the voluntary principle, and then there would exist a more complete confusion and mystification in respect to educational schemes than had existed for many years past. Each of these schemes, with the exception of the voluntary one, assumed the propriety of raising local rates for educational purposes; and that circumstance alone formed an important ground of union in devising some good national system. The denominational and the secular party were agreed upon that point; and as they formed nine-tenths of all the people in the country who had carefully considered that subject, there existed sufficient means of effecting an important part of the object. The voluntary party alone occupied a perfectly isolated position; but that party had almost dissolved of themselves, for they had consented to accept grants from the Privy Council for the maintenance of the greater number of their schools. It appeared to him to be clearly established that schools conducted on the purely voluntary system could not be maintained in a manner adequate to the exigencies of the country, and that if they could continue to exist at all they must be of a very inferior description. They might be maintained by a few individuals, who were prepared to make great sacrifices for the purpose of carrying out their opposition to Privy Council grants; but such patronage and support were necessarily precarious, like the resources and the lives of its authors. He should further say, that he believed the purely voluntary schools were, generally speaking, the worst schools in the kingdom. [“No, no!”] Why, in nine cases out of ten the voluntary system had broken down, and aid was received from the Treasury or Privy Council. Then, if all the best schools were already receiving public grants, the question to be decided was, what was the best mode of affording the public aid, not everywhere—but wherever needed—whether by Treasury grants or grants from local rates or from both combined? And here he must say, that all experience was in favour of local rates as the basis of national support in preference to Government grants, though he quite agreed with the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich that the Treasury grant might be continued in aid of the local rate, and that the organisation for inspection might be maintained. He was of opinion that, great as had been the good which the Privy Council system had effected, it had this fatal objection, that it placed all schools in England under one head, and though the person who presided over the system might be a highly educated and able man, he was yet not likely, from his position, to be acquainted with the requirements of all the localities in the country. Besides, he might be a theorist rather than a practical man, and, sitting in his office in London, he might endeavour to apply his favourite hobby to localities, whether it was adapted to them or not. He (Mr. Adderley) maintained that the instruction given to the poorer classes of the country should be mainly industrial, so that they might learn the means of earning their livelihood honestly. He disagreed from the noble Lord the Member for Stamford in his views regarding the Bill of the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Pakington); it was strictly denominational; nor did he believe that it was, as had been asserted, a secular system in disguise; nor could he believe that any scheme merely because it promoted the diffusion of knowledge would lead to those disastrous consequences to religion and the Church of England which the noble Lord seemed to dread. He believed that the most material points were held in common by Christians of all sects, and that, so far from the spread of knowledge among the schools of all recognised denominations being likely to increase infidel notions, it would tend to bring the hostile camps more closely together, to clear away the mists which now intervened, and to extend and strengthen sound views of religious truth. In such a case, the Church of England would, in his opinion, have nothing to fear. He would now say a few words on the leading features of difference that existed between the Bills of the noble Lord the Colonial Secretary and the right hon. Baronet. The principle of the two Bills was the same, but there were differences in detail of a very important character. The noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) proposed to leave the moving agency—the power of setting the schools in motion—in the hands of town-councils and vestries. There were many objections to this proposal, and one of the first was that town-councils and vestries were not likely to move at all. The House would bear in mind the case of Manchester, where the ratepayers were the first to petition Parliament to pass a measure to tax themselves for purposes of education. Here the ratepayers took the initiative, but the town-council stepped in and frustrated the measure. This furnished them with an example of the manner in which the Bill of the noble Lord would be likely to work. The right hon. Baronet, in his Bill, put the initiative in the hands of the ratepayers, the class who lie (Mr. Adderley) certainly thought ought to be allowed the initiative in volunteering such a tax upon themselves. According to the measure of the noble Lord, whatever scheme a town-council or vestry might propose was to be carried out if it received the sanction of the Committee of Privy Council. He need hardly say what a variety of schemes would thus be brought forward without Parliament having a word to say on the subject—all issuing from behind the screen in Downing Street, and producing a most complicated and confused state of things throughout the country; and he might observe, in passing, that there was a very great objection to the system of by-legislation in which the Committee of Privy Council was already allowed to indulge on this very important subject. He further thought the House would agree with him when he said that the proposal of the right hon. Baronet to place the management of the schools in the hands of the ratepayers was much preferable to that of the noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies. Then the noble noble Lord placed his scheme on local funds for its support, as was also done by the right hon. Baronet; but the noble Lord used them only as supplementary to any other funds "that might be available." This evidently pointed to money to be paid by the children. Now, he would not enter upon the question of free schools, but would only observe that, unless the scheme embraced a system of free schools it was not worth instituting. Free schools are the reverse of eleemosynary when paid for by rates on the people. What we required was a system paid for nationally wherever the eleemosynary or private patronage system failed, and placed on the footing of other great national schemes. There could be no doubt that the religious point was one of great difficulty. Whether the principle laid down by the right hon. Baronet was acceptable to the House or not remained to be seen; but he hoped it would be borne in mind that if any one could suggest an improvement upon that principle the right hon. Baronet had stated that he would be ready to adopt it. He believed that if this Bill, or some measure of a similar nature, was not adopted during the present Session, hon. Members would be wearied of introducing Bills, year after year, on the subject of education, which led to no practical result, but merely gave rise to fruitless discussions. He thought it discreditable to the country that such an enlightened assembly as that House should discuss this subject Session after Session, without arriving at any definite decision. The right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary had stated that one of the difficulties in the way of this measure was that something like compulsory attendance must be enforced, in order to carry out the system which it proposed to establish. For his own part, if it should become necessary to enforce compulsory attendance, he (Mr. Adderley) did not think such a plan would be attended with any great inconvenience; as, indeed, it was already partially tried in the case of factory schools. He believed, however, that the right hon. Baronet was incorrect in stating that it had been found necessary to enforce compulsory attendance in all those countries in which a system of this nature had been adopted, for he understood that no regulation of that kind existed in America, or at least in the New England States. The right hon. Baronet had also said that he thought there would be some difficulty with respect to the distribution of the rate, but he (Mr. Adderley) understood the proposition of the Bill of the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Pakington) to be that the tax, being generally and evenly levied, should be distributed by the managing committee to all existing schools of recognised denominations, according to the number of children they each contained.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I am sure, Sir, the House is greatly indebted to the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington) for the very interesting and able speech with which he prefaced his Motion, and which shows that he has applied his powerful and vigorous mind to the investigation of one of the most important subjects to which a public man can devote his attention. With regard to the measure he has proposed, until it is laid before the House, and we have had an opportunity of becoming acquainted with its details, I think it is premature to express any decided opinion as to the comparative merits of the scheme of the right hon. Baronet and that of my noble Friend (Lord J. Russell), to which allusion has been made in the course of the discussion. I must say, however, that I think some of the observations of the hon. Gentleman who last addressed the House, referring to the Bill of my noble Friend, were not perhaps exactly apropos to the measure under consideration, but somewhat anticipating future discussions. It is manifest, as the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Pakington) has stated, that there is a great necessity for some more efficient arrangement for the education of the lower classes. I cannot help thinking, however, that he has in some degree exaggerated the amount of ignorance, and the amount of consequent criminality, which exists in the country. I have no doubt that the instances he has mentioned were cases with regard to which he is in possession of facts that are accurately stated, but I think we are not justified in taking those instances as examples by which we should judge of the criminality of the country at large. I am happy to say that, as far as my own local knowledge extends, the districts with which I am acquainted certainly do not resemble, in that respect, the places from which the right hon. Baronet has derived his information. No doubt the religious question is one which may, I am afraid, oppose great difficulties in the way of those who take this subject in hand, but I agree with the right hon. Baronet in hoping that those who entertain different opinions upon this branch of the question may recollect that we all hold opinions in common, which ought to be, and which may be, the foundation of a common system of education, and I confess I do not agree with a noble Lord, who spoke on the opposite side, in thinking that differences upon religious subjects are so radical and so complete as to render it impossible that a common system of education should be adopted, applicable to persons of all denominations. Under these circumstances I accept, with the greatest pleasure and cordiality, the proposal of the right hon. Baronet to introduce this Bill. I think he has done right in postponing, until after Easter, the further progress of the Bill, for the House will then have before it the two measures of my noble Friend and of the right hon. Baronet. I must say, however, that I think the criticism in which the hon. Member who last spoke has indulged upon the Bill of my noble Friend does not seem to me very applicable. The hon. Gentleman has contrasted the greater liberality of the arrangements proposed by the right hon. Baronet with what he conceives to be the smaller degree of liberality of the measure of my noble Friend. The right hon. Baronet proposes that the management of the schools shall be confided to persons elected by the ratepayers, while my noble Friend proposes to place the management in the hands of the town councils and vestries. I think the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adderley) must surely forget that the town councils are a creation of popular elections. In either case, therefore, the managers will be elected by a completely popular suffrage. The House will have to determine which of the two plans it may be the more expedient to adopt, but, in point of principle, both measures are founded upon purely popular and general choice. I hope that the discussion which has taken place will satisfy the House on the present occasion, and I trust that hon. Gentlemen will reserve the expression of their opinions in more detail until the two Bills are upon the table, in order that we may be allowed to proceed with other matters which are equally worthy of the attention of the House.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir John Pakington, Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, and Mr. Adderley.

METROPOLITAN LOCAL MANAGEMENT.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, that after the unavoidable delays which had taken place in the introduction of the measure of which he had given notice, he was glad to have an opportunity, although the hour was late, to move for leave to bring in a Bill for the better Local Management of the Metropolis. It would be his duty to lay before the House a statement of the present condition of the metropolis, and of the manner in which its local affairs were now administered. It would also be necessary for him to enter into some details to show the necessity for fresh legislation, and the House would naturally expect him to explain the provisions of the Bill he was about to introduce to remedy the evils and correct the abuses that now existed. He should, therefore, in order not unnecessarily to trespass upon the time or to dwell too long on the patience of the House, refrain almost wholly from any prefatory remarks, and proceed at once to discharge the duty he had undertaken. He should rest his case on a plain statement of facts, upon which comment would be superfluous and argument unnecessary. And he felt convinced that it would be admitted on all sides that the time had fully arrived when this great subject should receive the serious consideration of the Legislature, and when some measure should be adopted to remedy the evils that now prevailed.

At the commencement of this session her Majesty was graciously pleased to say, in the speech from the throne, "Although the prosecution of the war will naturally engage your chief attention, I trust other matters of great interest and importance to the general welfare will not be neglected." Now he knew of no matter more important and interesting than the improvement of the first city of the empire. It was that to which he desired this evening to direct the attention of the House, and that was the matter which he had been charged by Government to bring under their consideration. Various Governments had promised, at different times, to introduce Bills in relation to this subject, but Ministry after Ministry had passed away without any attempt to legislate upon it. The last intimation given by a Government of such an intention was in the year 1848, when Lord Morpeth, then Chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests, introduced the Public Health Bill. The noble Lord declared that, although the Bill made no exceptions in England and Wales, and, strictly speaking, the metropolis was not excluded from its provisions, yet some preparatory and supplementary measures must be enacted by the Legislature before the provisions of the Bill could be made applicable to the case of the metropolis, owing to the great number of local bodies, and generally to the whole condition of a community outnumbering in itself the population of many continental states, and Lord Morpeth concluded by saying, "One of those measures I hope to introduce within a very short period." Seven years had elapsed since that period, and no measure of the kind had ever been brought under the consideration of the House. He (Sir Benjamin Hall) knew the difficulties with which such a subject must be surrounded, and the opposition that would be raised by interested parties against any measure framed for the benefit of the community; but still he hoped that the Bill he was about to introduce would be received with some favour by the Legislature, and he was satisfied that it was so framed as to be acceptable to the public at large, for whose benefit it was really intended.

Now, the first point he should have to establish was this,—what should be the area of the metropolis. In the course of the last session an hon. Gentleman, the Member for Pontefract, moved for a Committee to inquire into the expediency of buying up the various metropolitan bridges belonging to private parties or companies over which toll was levied ; and the motion he submitted was acceded to by his right hon. Friend, then, as now, the Chief Commissioner of Works, but on this distinct understanding, that no money should be voted out of the public treasury for the attainment of that object. It therefore became necessary in the discussions of the Select Committee, of which he (Sir Benjamin Hall) was a member, to determine what should be the metropolis. Some gentlemen thought it was advisable to determine that the metropolis should be that area over which the coal tax was levied, and which had a diameter of no less than 40 miles, of which St. Paul's was the centre. There were others who thought that the metropolis would be more properly defined by taking that area which was under the jurisdiction of the Metropolitan Police Commissioners—30 miles area—of which Charing-cross was the centre, and which included all those parishes parts of which were embraced in that area. Others were of opinion that the metropolis was better defined in a schedule attached to the Metropolitan Interments Act of 1852 ; while others, again, thought that the Registrar-General's district should more properly be regarded as the metropolis. Now, without referring to any of the arguments used in support of those different propositions, he would simply say that he proposed to take the Registrar-General's district, and call that the metropolis for the purposes of the Bill he would now introduce ; and he could give a very short and clear account of that district, by quoting from the report made by the commissioners appointed to inquire into the existing state of the Corporation of London in 1853, and which was presented in May last year. Those commissioners were Mr. Labouchere, Mr. Justice Patteson, and Mr. Lewis, now Sir G. Cornwall Lewis, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. They defined the metropolitan district, which he now proposed to take for the purposes of this Bill, in the following manner :—

" Since 1851 the metropolis of the Registrar-General has been used for the census and other statistical objects. The metropolis recognised by the Registrar-General is formed of 86 registration districts, extending from Hampstead in the north, to Wandsworth in the south, and from Stepney in the east to Chelsea in the west. Its greatest dimensions measured in these directions are 11 and 16½ miles. It is according to this division that the census of the metropolis for the year 1851 has been arranged. It appears that the entire metropolis within these limits contains an area of 78,029 acres, with 305,933 inhabited houses ; that its population was 958,863 in 1801, and 2,362,236 in 1851—having more than doubled in the last 50 years ; and that the value of its property assessed to the poor rate in 1852 was £9,964,348. But whilst the metropolis at large, as set forth in the Registrar-General's district, has rather more than doubled since 1801, in the following districts the population has considerably more than doubled since 1801 :—

District.	Population in 1801.	Population in 1851.
Kensington ... ...	20,485 ... ...	120,004
Pancras ... ...	81,770 ... ...	166,966
Islington... ...	10,212 ... ...	98,329
Stepney ... ...	34,900 ... ...	110,775

Now, from the whole tenor of this report of the commissioners on the corporation of London, it became evident that it was utterly impossible for many months to elapse before the Government of the day must bring in some measure for the better local management of the metropolis. He (Sir B. Hall) little expected at that time that he should be the person appointed by Government to undertake that office ; but feeling confident that it must be undertaken by somebody, in June last, in concert with his noble Friend the Member for the City of London, he framed a form of returns, for which he obtained an order from the House, and which would show the manner in which the metropolis was managed. They were very imperfect, but still much information might be derived from them. Even under an order of the House, there had been the greatest difficulty in obtaining information from the various officials, secretaries, clerks, and collectors, and it was only by the perseverance of his right hon. Friend, the head of the Poor-law Board, through whose department the return was obtained, that anything satisfactory could be laid on the table of the House. He should, however, be able to show that there were hardly any two parishes governed alike ; and when he should have made the House acquainted with the manner in which the local affairs of the metropolis were managed, the reason for such a measure as that which he hoped to lay upon the table of the House would be at once acknowledged. He would now mention a few parishes of the different metropolitan boroughs. Some time ago, on receiving a deputation from certain parishes, he made a statement to them about the mode in which their affairs were managed, and as that statement appeared in the public papers, he would avoid any reference to those parishes which were then spoken of, and would only refer to some other cases which had not yet come under the cognisance of the House and of the public. He would cite some cases in each metropolitan borough, and would begin with the borough of Finsbury. In the Liberty of the Rolls the vestry is composed of "the ancient inhabitants," that is, such as have served the office of overseer. The paving committee has 1,509 yards of streets, and pays 126*l.* a year in salaries, or 14*l.* a mile. St. Sepulchre has nearly 1*½* mile of streets, and pays 129*l.* for supervision. The commission is self-elected. Ely-place is 326 yards long, and 156*l.* 2*s.* is paid for its superintendence, being at the rate of 84*l.* 15*s.* per mile. In St. Giles and St. George, Bloomsbury, no person is entitled to attend or vote at the meeting for the election of vestryman, unless he is rated to the poor rate at an assessment of 25*l.*; and no person letting part of his premises can be a vestryman, although he may be rated at 500*l.* a year. In Islington the qualification is 20*l.* He would next advert to the borough of the Tower Hamlets. In Norton Folgate the vestry is composed of those inhabitants who have served, or paid fines for refusing to serve, either of the offices of overseer, constable or headborough. In Christchurch, Spitalfields, it is composed of those who have been either churchwardens or overseers. In St. Botolph Without, Aldgate, it is composed of persons who have served all the parochial offices, namely, headborough, constables, churchwardens, and overseers. The vestry has existed in this form from time immemorial, and is not constituted by any local act. In St. John Hackney, the vestrymen are elected by the inhabitants, but no inhabitant can vote who is assessed at less than 40*l.* a year. In Mile-end New Town the qualification is 12*l.* In St. Paul, Shadwell, 10*l.* In St. Mary, Stratford-le-bow, 15*l.* In All Saints Poplar, 30*l.* In St. George's-in-the-East, inhabitants can vote who pay 24*s.* a year to the poor rate; while in St. Anne, Limehouse, they must pay 48*s.* a year. St. Leonard, Shoreditch, has three paving boards; one of these, the High-street Commission, has one mile of street, and pays in salaries

118*l.* 2*s.*, self-elected and elected for life. Another, the Hoxton-square Trust, has 456 yards; salaries, 47*l.* the receipts being 46*l.*; rate per mile 186*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*; commission self-elected and for life. Old Artillery Ground 814 yards; salaries, 122*l.* 8*s.*; rate per mile, 264*l.* 13*s.*; self-elected and for life. St. George-in-the-East: the paving is under five separate boards; the lighting and cleansing under three boards, one of which pays at the rate of 16*s.* 7*½d.*, each for the supervision of 363 lamps. In the Borough of Lambeth, St. Mary, Newington, has two paving and four lighting boards, which are confined to the parish, and five other boards which also extend over other parishes. The average cost of the superintendence of each lamp is 11*s.* 6*d.* Of these boards seven are self-elected. Lambeth has nine lighting boards, and the average cost of the superintendence of each lamp is 11*s.*, so far as it can be ascertained. Next came the borough of Southwark. In St. George the Martyr the paving is under six different boards, and the West Borough Pavement Commissioners have 2*½* miles of streets, and pay 484*l.* in salaries, or 217*l.* per mile. They are self-elected, and for life; and there are two other boards similarly elected. In St. Olive, St. Thomas, and St. John, the East Southwark Commissioners pay 85*l.* for little more than six miles of road, or 136*l.* per mile; self-elected and for life. In St. John's there is a select vestry, elected by the parishioners, one-half by persons rated at 75*l.* and upwards; one-half under 75*l.*, and not less than 10*l.* Turning to Westminster, he found that the parish of St. George, Hanover-square, contained 1,161 acres, and was in three divisions. The part under the vestry elected under the provisions of Hobhouse's Act had 14 miles of road, paid in salaries 638*l.* or 45*l.* per mile, and was most admirably managed. When he turned to Belgrave, which was under a separate jurisdiction, he found it, if not one of the worst managed, certainly the most extravagantly managed in the metropolis. The Grosvenor-place trust had 12 miles of road. The salaries paid were 1,323, or on the average, 110*l.* 5*s.* per mile. Besides these there was another district, of, he believed, about 218 acres, lying below Grosvenor-place, which was without any jurisdiction, but was kept in order by the Messrs. Cubitt, who built the houses there, and, if they abandoned there present supervision, there would be no jurisdiction for paving purposes in that district. This evil, amongst others, he proposed to remedy in his Bill. In St. Mary-le-Strand, there were 480 yards of streets. The salaries 120*l.*, or 440*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.* per mile. In the Savoy there were 600 yards of streets. The amount paid in salaries was 84*l.* 15*s.* 9*d.*, or 248*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.* per mile. The case of the Strand was exceedingly singular. There were in the whole of the Strand Union 11 miles of street over which no less than seven different paving boards, each with its establishment of clerks, collectors, surveyors, and other officers, had jurisdiction, and to show in what manner the officers were appointed, it was only necessary to observe that one of the surveyors was, when appointed, a tailor, and another a law stationer. The cost to the rate payers for maintaining the official staff attached to these boards was 88*l.* a mile.

Then, as to the mode in which, under the existing system, the great thoroughfares were managed, in reference to the paving and lighting. In order to give an illustration of this, he would ask those whom he had the honour of addressing, to follow him in his description of the Strand, commencing at Northumberland-house and ending at Temple-bar. Between No. 1, Strand (near Northumberland-house) and Temple-bar, a distance of about 1,336 yards, or a little more than  $\frac{1}{2}$  of a mile, the street is divided into seven different paving boards. First is St. Martin's from the starting point to the centre of Cecil-street (between Nos. 84 and 85), a distance of about 480 yards. Up to this point the whole width of the street belongs to St. Martin's, but from Cecil-street to opposite the centre of Burleigh-street (near No. 112), a distance of 145 yards, only one-half the street (the north side), is under that paving board. The other half from Cecil-street (between Nos. 84 and 85) to No. 107, a distance of about 118 yards, belongs to St. Clement's. At No. 107, the district belonging to the Savoy commences, and for a distance of about 27 yards the street is divided between the Savoy and St. Martin's from opposite the centre of Burleigh-street (near No. 112) to opposite the east-side of Wellington-street North (near No. 135), a distance of about 83 yards, the street is divided between the Savoy and St. Clement's; and from this point to Duchy-place (between Nos. 137 and 138), a distance of about 25 yards, it is divided between the Savoy and

St. Mary's. From this point to the east end of St. Mary's church (near 161), a distance of about 226 yards, the whole width of the Strand belongs to St. Mary's, with the exception of a piece in front of Somerset-house. This portion is about 45 yards long, and 12 yards wide. It is repaired by the Somerset-place contractor. From the east end of St. Mary's church to Temple-bar, a distance of about 400 yards, the whole width of the Strand belongs to St. Clement's. The different paving boards along the Strand, from No. 1 to Temple-bar, therefore come in the following order:—1. St. Martin's alone; 2. St. Martin's and St. Clement's; 3. St. Martin's and the Savoy; 4. Savoy and St. Clement's; 5. Savoy and St. Mary's; 6. St. Mary's alone; 7. St. Mary's and Somerset-place; 8. St. Mary's alone; 9. St. Clement's alone—the distance being 1,336 yards or three-quarters of a mile, and there being nine divisions. Cecil-street, a street running from the Strand towards the river, with a carriage way about ten yards wide, is under two separate managements, namely, St. Martin's and St. Clement's. Along Wellington-street North, from the north end of Exeter-street to the south side of the Strand, a distance of 100 yards, there are four separate jurisdictions, namely, St. Paul's, Covent-garden, St. Martin's, St. Clement's, Savoy. It happens that St. Clement's division comes close up to the houses at the east side of Wellington-street North. The paving of the roadway for a considerable length of the street, is, therefore, done by that parish, but as the houses on the east side are in St. Mary's they cannot be rated for the repairs of the roadway. A precisely similar case, as regards the number of jurisdictions, occurs from the north end of Exeter-street, along Burleigh-street, to the south side of the Strand. Here the houses on the west side of Burleigh-street are in St. Martin's, the division between that parish and St. Clement's takes nearly the line of the footway, so that here again St. Clement's repairs the carriage way, and gets no rates from the houses on the west side of the street. St. Ann's Soho: The following are the boundaries of this parish, or that portion of it under the Paving Board: the west side of Crown-street, the west side of Moor-street, the west side of West-street. The east side of these streets belongs to St. Giles's. Upper St. Martin's-lane, the north side of Great Newport-street, the west side of Castle-street (as far as Bear-street), the north side of Bear-street, the north and west sides of Leicester-square, the north side of Spur-street : the other sides of these streets are in St. Martin's. The east side of Princes-street, the east side of Wardour-street. The other sides of these streets, with the exception of a short piece, are in St. James's. As in the case of St. James's, some of the most inconvenient boundaries are paved, by arrangements, by either one board or the other. St. Martin's, Charing Cross ; by an Act of Parliament, St. Martin's now paves as far as the Horse Guards. Nearly all the other boundaries of St. Martin's are along the centre of the streets. St. James's Picadilly :—Princes-street, Coventry-street, Wardour-street : only one-half of these streets are in the district of St. James's, but owing to the narrowness of the streets, much inconvenience arose as to the division of the paving ; arrangements have therefore been made between St. James's and the neighbouring boards for one or other of them to pave the whole width of the street in some of these instances.

Then nearly all the boundaries of the different jurisdictions in Westminster were in the middle of the street, so that one side of the street was governed by one body, and the other by another. This led to constant difficulties and quarrels between them, to the great inconvenience of the inhabitants. There was one great thoroughfare in this metropolis where the centre of the road was under one head as far as regarded the paving, but the lighting and watering, unfortunately for the inhabitants, rested with two other boards, one on the north and the other on the south. These two boards quarrelled, one of them saying, "We will have the watering done in the morning," and the other saying, "We will have the watering done in the evening." And the fact was that in the summer months one side of the road might be seen watered in the morning, and the other in the evening ; so that both sides were, in fact, covered with dust during the whole of the day, but the neighbours had of course to pay the rate. He entered into these details in order that the public might see the absurdity of the present state of things, and that if petitions should be presented against the Bill, the public might be convinced of the necessity of some immediate legislation on the subject being adopted.

Sir B. Hall

After instancing Piccadilly and St. James's-street as also affording illustrations of the inconvenience of great thoroughfares being under different paving boards, in consequence of one part of the thoroughfare being in one parish and another in another, he referred to Marylebone, the borough he himself represented, but he would not refrain from stating the case of that borough, and he was particularly anxious that the abuses should be known in order that they might not remain un-reformed, for he believed that one portion of them was managed worse than any other part of London. This was no fault of the inhabitants themselves, but he should be able to show where the fault lay. He would begin with the western part of the great borough which he represented, numbering about 400,000 inhabitants. One parish had 170,000, another 160,000, and the third about 50,000 inhabitants ; and the whole borough, having reference to its size, was perhaps the richest district in the world. But how was this large borough governed ? To begin with Paddington, he found that, in 1801, there were 1,800 inhabitants ; while in 1831, the number had increased to 13,540 ; and in 1851, when the last census was taken, the population amounted to 46,306. In 1837, when he first became connected with the borough, there were less than 1,000 electors ; last year there were 3,686. It was governed by a local act passed in 1844, under the provisions of that antiquated statute, known as Sturges Bourne's Act ; and a person must be rated at 10*l.* before he could have one vote in the election of vestrymen, being a higher qualification than was required to give him a vote for Members of Parliament as in that case the real and not the rateable value of the house must be 10*l.* The total number of assessments was 6,944.

so that one-eleventh of the ratepayers, or 607, had 3,642 votes, which was more than the number of votes possessed by 3,582 ratepayers in the same parish, and was more than half the number of assessments in the parish.

The vestrymen appointed a committee of eighteen to manage the affairs of the parish ; their decision might be overruled by the ex officio vestrymen, amounting to nearly forty under the Act. Every resident peer, privy councillor and member of Parliament, every judge and every magistrate was an ex officio member of the governing body of the parish ; and, besides those, the Connaught trustees appointed a vestryman, and the Grand Junction Canal Company another. There was this peculiarity about the constitution of the vestry—no innkeeper could be elected. In 1845 an attempt was made to upset this absurd state of things, and to introduce Hobhouse's Act, which requires half the rate-payers to vote, and a majority of two-thirds of those who vote must vote in favour of the adoption ; the consequence was, that though 1,991 supported the change, there being 1,212 against it, the proposed alterations could not be made. Three years must elapse before the proposition could be again entertained. It was again attempted in 1853, when 2,449 voted in favour of adopting the Act, and only eleven against it, but the number was slightly reduced below the requisite amount on scrutiny, and the ratepayers failed again. So much with regard to the western parish. He would now come to the eastern ; and there he found the most extraordinary state of local management that ever existed in any country—he referred to St. Pancras. Its population had increased from 71,838 in 1841, to 170,000 at the present time. There were sixteen paving boards ; and a great portion of the parish was without paving, and without any jurisdiction whatever. The manner in which so many different boards were created was this. When a person had some land which he wished to let out on building leases, he applied for an Act of Parliament. This had been the case with the Somer's-town, the Camden-town, the Southampton, the Bedford, and other estates. He would proceed to exhibit the state of things in a few of these districts. In the Camden-town district there were fifteen self-elected Commissioners, of whom about seven attended. There was no treasurer. There were four miles and a-half of road, and they spent 408*l.* 17*s.* for officers' salaries, the whole expenditure for paving, being 338*l.* exclusive of lighting ; they had incurred a debt of 11,100*l.* and had levied 1*s.* per pound upon the rateable value. There were no public pumps. Take the Doughty Estate : there were no public pumps—rate, 2*s.* 6*d.* in the pound ; there were eighteen Commissioners, and the sum expended for repairs 1*l.* 17*s.* 4*d.*, whilst there were expended for salaries 183*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.* ; debt 6,732*l.* On the Foundling Estate Paving Board the Commissioners were self-elected ; about ten attend ; they have one mile and a quarter of road, and expend 765*l.* 19*s.* 1*d.* in repairs, and pay 313*l.* 5*s.* 5*d.* to officers, clerks, &c. ; they have a debt of 20,476*l.*, which is fifty per cent on the rateable value, and levy a rate of 1*s.* 6*d.* in the pound, besides special rates. On the Lucas Estate Paving Board, they have about three-quarters of a mile of road ; pay 38*l.* 19*s.* for paving, and 117*l.* 14*s.* for salaries and collection. They have a rateable value of 5,867*l.* and a debt of 4,909*l.* No public pump. In Somer's-town there were twenty-one Commissioners, self-elected ; about eight attend ; they have not any treasurer, have three miles of road, and spend 538*l.* 7*s.* 8*d.* in repairs and 30*l.* in salaries ; they have a debt of 15,000*l.*, which is thirty-five per cent on the rateable value, and levy 10*d.* in the pound. One pump. On the South-Western district there were seventy-five Commissioners, self-elected ; attendance eleven. They have five miles of road, expend 983*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.* in repairs and watering, and 352*l.* for officers, besides a residence for the clerk and surveyor, and they have a debt of 5,500*l.*, and levy 1*s.* in the pound on the rateable value, which is 81,000*l.* On the Southampton Estate Paving Board, only twelve and a half miles of road, and the payments to officers amount to 677*l.* 4*s.* being more than 50*l.* per mile for official payments ; in other respects this board is well managed. With respect to Holme's Estate Paving Board, the amount authorised to be raised by the act is 1,500*l.*, but it is believed bonds to about the extent of 2,400*l.* have been issued ; Commissioners self-elected ; no interest or annuity has been paid since the year 1836 or 1837 ; for the last fifteen years no operations under the Act of Parliament have taken place, and the pavements and roads within the district are in a most dilapidated, dangerous, and dirty state, and under no efficient control ; the books and papers of the expired commission are believed to have been destroyed, and this return is signed by the surveyor to the board. Thus, it appeared that according to a Parliamentary paper, printed in 1850, those parts of this great parish which had any paving at all were governed by sixteen district boards, eleven of which are self-elected, and wholly irresponsible to the ratepayers.

There were 427 Commissioners, of whom 255 are self-elected. They had set up fourteen public pumps for the use of 170,000 inhabitants, of which one was returned as out of order. They had forty miles of road, and sixty-three officers of various sorts to superintend, and these sixty-three officers received no less than 4,000*l.* a year in salaries, or 100*l.* per mile ; and to complete the whole, they had incurred debts to the amount of 135,357*l.* —so that, excluding the Southampton district, which had little or no debt, these Commissioners, most of whom were self-elected, had incurred a debt of about 140,000*l.*, or exactly 5,000*l.* per mile, for which, of course, the ratepayers are liable and of which liabilities they had little or no knowledge. So much for the local government of St. Pancras under petty self-elected boards. Now, contrast St. Pancras parish with the parish of Marylebone, which was governed by one board, and this was the reason he instituted the comparison. In Marylebone the population was 160,000 in St. Pancras 170,000. Marylebone contained 1,560, St. Pancras 2,700 acres. The number of officers in Marylebone was four, in St. Pancras sixty-three. In Marylebone the cost of the staff was 657*l.*, in St. Pancras 4,000*l.* The debt of Marylebone was 16,000*l.*, which was chiefly created under the old unreformed vestry ; of St. Pancras 135,000*l.* on the paving boards alone. In Marylebone the streets were paved by the board, in St. Pancras they were, to a great extent, let out to contractors. He quoted this to show how much saving had been effected in Marylebone compared with St. Pancras, by having one board—the same as the vestry—and how expensive was the other under many boards. He would now give a summary of the management of the metropolis. It had a population of 2,233,108 ; number of inhabited houses 291,240 ; rateable value, 9,011,230*l.* exclusive of the City of London. The number of different local acts in force in the metropolis was about 250, independent of public general acts, administered by not less than 300 different bodies ; 137 of these had returned the numbers comprising these bodies, and they amounted to 4,738 persons. From the other boards there was not any return ; but taking the same average for them, there would be 5,710 more persons ; so that upon that computation the whole metropolis was governed by no less than 10,448 Commissioners. Besides these there were the following chartered bodies :—Lincoln's Inn, Staple Inn, New Inn, Gray's Inn, Furnivals Inn, Charter-house. There were thirty parishes containing 880,000 inhabitants, and assessed to real property, in 1843, at 3,900,000*l.*, which might probably amount to much more than 4,000,000*l.* at the present time, consequently they represented nearly one half of the whole value of the metropolis. On examination it appeared that these parishes were, each of them, governed either wholly, or in part, by Commissioners or trustees, who were self-elected, or elected for life, or both, and therefore in no degree responsible to the ratepayers. The House would naturally ask why all these evils had continued for so long a period of time, and no steps been taken to remedy them. Take the case of St. Pancras, one of the greatest instances of abuses that had ever existed in a civilised country. In the year 1834 these parties came to Parliament through their vestry. They desired their vestry to expend money for the purpose of remedying these abuses. The Bill was thrown out in the second reading. In 1837 a similar attempt was made with similar results, but at a heavy cost to the ratepayers. In the year 1851 they were more fortunate. He proposed a Bill, which was referred to a Select Committee. It passed through the Committee, and was sent up to the House of Lords, where it was thrown out, and, from that time to the present no step had been taken and no step would be taken, to remedy these abuses, because they spent 4,000*l.* on the former occasion, and the paving boards, over which they had no control, spent nearly 3,000*l.* in defeating the ratepayers, which the ratepayers had likewise to pay.

There were two other boards in the metropolis which had great powers of taxation, over which the ratepayers had no control. One of these bodies consisted of the officers appointed under the Metropolitan Buildings' Act of 1844, and the other body was the Commission of Sewers. The officers appointed under the Metropolitan Buildings' Act consisted of a registrar appointed by the Chief Commissioner of Works, at a salary of 1,000*l.*; an official referee, at a salary of 1,000*l.*; and other referees and officers, at salaries making a total of 5,510*l.*, who were paid partly out of the Consolidated Fund and partly out of the county rate. Besides these, there are fifty-two surveyors appointed by the magistrates in quarter sessions; they have incomes varying from 200*l.* to 1,600*l.* per annum, derived from fees, and the total amount received by them in 1853 was no less than 24,364*l.*; so that the cost of this establishment to the country and to the ratepayers was just 30,000*l.* per annum, over which there was no control whatever. He would not dwell upon this subject, because it was the intention of the Chief Commissioner of Works to introduce an Act for the purpose of amending the Act of 1846, but this he might say, that soon after he was appointed to the office he had now the honour to hold, the cholera was almost at its height, and it became his duty to inquire what these officers had done, whether they had prevented dwellings in cellars contrary to the provisions of the Act, and he found that they had greatly neglected their duty. He reported to the Secretary of State, and sent a copy of the report to the Chief Commissioner of Works; and when his right hon. Friend brought forward his Bill he should feel it his duty to call the attention of the House to these officers, because he thought that parties receiving salaries ought at least to perform their duties. He was waited upon by a deputation of these officers, who complained that they were hardly dealt with as their powers were limited under the Act, but he was prepared to show that they had not exercised for the benefit of the public those powers which doubtless they had; and one of them, who was the loudest in his disapproval of his report to the Secretary of State, he found afterwards had palpably neglected his duties. In police division B, there were 137 cellar dwellings. In police division D, comprising part of St. Marylebone and Paddington, there were 1,260. In these parishes there were two surveyors, one receiving 540*l.* 13*s.*, and the other 1,544*l.* 6*d.* per annum. In the police division E, comprising St. Pancras and other parishes, in which the surveyors received incomes varying from 100*l.* to 1,557*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.*, and in 1852, the amount paid to the surveyor in St. Pancras was 1,791*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.*, there were 183 of these dwellings. In division F, 232; divisions G and H, 870; in K and L, 109—making a total of 2,714 cellars used as dwellings, contrary to the provisions of the Act, according to the police return.

The other great grievance under which the metropolis laboured was the Commission of Sewers. They had been almost wholly irresponsible to the ratepayers. The Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers have jurisdiction over an enormous area, extending in some districts much beyond the metropolis; but there is a great portion of this area which has never come under rating, or been considered in any way by the Commissioners. In 1847 the metropolitan area was divided into seven separate districts (exclusive of the Regent's Park and Regent Street district), under the superintendence of as many separate Commissioners. They were as follows:—

Being a total of 1,065, exclusive of the Directors for the time being of the St. Katharine Docks Company. Amongst the names of the Commissioners were the Duke of Wellington, the Lord Chancellor, the Prime Minister, and other noblemen and gentlemen who could not attend to such matters. On the 30th November, 1847, the first six of the above Commissioners were superseded, and six new and distinct Commissions were issued, one for each district, but addressed to the same body of individuals, twenty-three in number. On the 4th of December, 1847, the St. Katharine Commission was superseded, and a new Commission was issued, appointing as Commissioners for that district the same twenty-three individuals who were named in the Commissions for the other six districts. The amount of debt due on November 30, 1847, when these Commissioners were appointed, was 64,133*l.* Besides these Commissioners, there were the Regent's Park and Regent Street districts, which were formed in 1824, under the provisions of statute 5 Geo. IV. c. 100, out of portions of the contiguous districts, and had its own separate body of Commissioners appointed under that statute. The debts did not devolve upon the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers, but remained a peculiar charge upon the district itself, and have been paid by the districts liable. In the year 1848, the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, under which one Commission of Sewers was established for the whole metropolis, excepting the City, was passed, and was brought into operation on the 1st of January, 1849, by the issuing of the first Metropolitan Commission of Sewers. Since that time five Commissions have been appointed, and the debts have constantly increased. At the time the first was appointed the debt was 63,489*l.*—

The number of Commissioners here given are exclusive of the Lord Mayor for the time being, and for other members chosen by the City of London, who are summoned only on matters affecting the City. Since the issuing of the present Commission, the amount of debt has been increased by a new loan of 140,000*l.*, and a contract has also been entered into for a further loan of 150,000*l.*, in pursuance of powers given to the Commissioners by the Sewers Act of last Session, enabling them to charge the rates with an additional debt of 800,000*l.*, so that the debt now existing, and to which the ratepayers are liable, amounts to the great sum of 587,074*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.* Thus it will appear that since the year 1847 there have been no less than seven Commissions—the old Commission existing in that year, a new one in part of that year, and a third in January 1849, a fourth in October 1849, a fifth in October 1851, a sixth in July 1852, and a seventh in November 1854, and that the debt now considerably exceeds half a million of money. The cost of the establishment was something extraordinary. In 1849 the cost of management was 28*1*/2 per cent on the amount of money received, and the following statement would show the actual receipts, amount of expenditure, and cost of management in the years 1849 and 1850:—

Since that period the amount levied by loans and taxation has been so great varying from 129,100*l.* in 1851 to 194,105*l.* in 1853; that the per centage of cost of management on the gross amount collected is less; but still the cost of management was in 1851, 16,430*l.*; in 1852, 14,551*l.*; and in 1853, 17,386*l.*

The Commissioners have attempted only one great work—the Victoria Sewer. The estimate of which was 28,854*l.*, and the cost, so far as can be ascertained, 41,472*l.*; but this, it is said, falls far short of the full amount. The time for completing the contract expired in March 1854, and the accounts have not yet been rendered. He proposed to supersede the Commission and place the whole under a different control.

He had now stated generally the way in which the metropolis was managed, and now the difficulty arose how the question was to be dealt with. Various plans had been proposed. One plan was to convert the whole metropolis into one general municipality, but the extraordinary magnitude of the metropolis rendered such a measure obviously inadequate, and the objections to it were well stated in the report of the City Corporation Commission. They said—

"London, taken in its full extent, is (as it has with literal truth been called) a province covered with houses; its diameter from north to south and from east to west is so great that the persons living at its farthest extremities have few interests in common; its area is so large that each inhabitant is, in general, acquainted only with his own quarter, and has no minute knowledge of other parts of the town."

"Hence the two first conditions for municipal government, minute local knowledge and community of interests, would be wanting, if the whole of London were, by an extension of the present boundaries of the City, placed under a single municipal corporation. The enormous numbers of the population, and the vast magnitude of the interests which would be under the care of the municipal body, would likewise render its administration a work of great difficulty."

of the metropolis under a single municipal corporation, without adverting to those more general questions of public policy which naturally suggest themselves in connection with the subject."

Another suggestion was that there should be charters of incorporation granted to the present boroughs. He thought the greatest inconvenience would arise from that. The Tower Hamlets contained 550,000 inhabitants ; Finsbury, 330,000 ; Marylebone, about 400,000. They were too large, and would probably be larger, and they must not legislate merely for the present, but for some time to come. Moreover, they would be imposing on the inhabitants of London that to which they were apparently much disinclined, in imposing on them municipal corporations, with the necessarily expensive staff of mayors, aldermen, and councillors. He remembered accompanying a deputation to Sir George Grey in 1851, upon the then condition of the metropolis, when his right hon. Friend intimated to the deputation, that if they desired to have corporations he would be ready to consider any memorial that might be presented to him, provided it was signed by the greater portion of the inhabitants of any borough ; but no response has been made. There was a third plan which was suggested by the Commissioners, which he proposed to adopt. It was put forward in these words—

"We see no reason why the benefit of municipal institutions should not be extended to the rest of the metropolis by its division into municipal districts, each possessing a municipal government of its own. What the form of this government should be, and what should be the number or extent of the districts, are questions not lying within the scope of our commission, and upon which we are not competent to express any opinion. We may be permitted here to remark, that the power of petition to the Crown for the grant of a municipal corporation given to Parliamentary boroughs by the Municipal Corporations Act, and by the Act of 1 Vict. c. 78, does not appear to us to be practically applicable to the metropolis. In order that a proper distribution of the metropolis into municipal districts should be effected, it would be necessary to take a connected view of its different parts and to arrange the boundaries and size of each district with reference to the other districts. Without such mutual adjustments, a proper combination of districts would be impossible, and such adjustments could not be made if charters were granted singly to Parliamentary boroughs. If a distribution of the metropolis into municipal districts is to be made, it ought, as it seems to us, to be made simultaneously, and with due consideration of the manner in which the interests of each part are affected by the general plan."

He (Sir B. Hall) would adopt this recommendation, which was, that the metropolis should be divided into municipal districts. In so doing, a connected view of the different parts could be taken, and the boundaries of each district made in reference to the other districts. He proposed to carry out these propositions without creating corporations. He proposed that ecclesiastical boundaries should not be interfered with, neither should he interfere with the poor law, nor with any power that the Poor Law Board might have. He had stated already that he proposed to take the Registrar General's district for the metropolis. There were thirty-six districts, with the exception of the City of London, which he did not propose to include, because another Bill would be brought in having reference to the City, and to the reform of the Corporation. The Bill would, in the first place, extend the provisions of Hobhouse's Act to all the parishes comprised within the Registrar General's district. There were two classes of parishes in the metropolis. The one he would call parishes sole, as not being in union ; the other, he would call united parishes, being in union. There were twenty-one of these single parishes, having a population of 1,456,363. The vestry of these parishes would be elected under the provisions of the Act he had referred to, and he proposed that the vestry that should be so elected should be the local board, instead of having a separate board, which would be superfluous, as if there was a second board, it must necessarily be elected in the same or somewhat similar manner. These twenty-one boards would represent an average population of 69,350 persons. He then came to the parishes in union, of which there were fifty-six comprised in fourteen unions, containing a population of 775,507 persons ; and he proposed that parishes in union should send to the district board a certain number of representatives, arranged according to their population. These union boards will represent, on an average, one board for 55,460 persons. The district board, thus created, whether as a parish sole or a group of parishes in union, would have the power of paving, lighting, and cleansing their respective districts, as would also the local boards to which he had referred. The local sewers of these different localities would be placed under the control of the different local boards. Representations were made to him that it would be utterly impossible for one board to manage the sewers of the metropolis, and he had placed them under local boards. These boards would have the power and duties of local boards of health, so far as related to the prevention and removal of nuisances. The rates, which would include the amount to be paid by the district board to a metropolitan board, to which he would presently refer, would, to save expense, be all collected by the collector of the poor rate. The rates for paving and lighting would be borne by the occupier, and where not otherwise provided for by lease or agreement, the sewers rate would be paid by the owner, as at present. In many of the parishes, and parts of parishes, there were heavy debts, and as regarded all such liabilities, he should provide that these debts should remain strictly chargeable on the places where they were created, and that they should be paid off, principal and interest, in fifty years, unless otherwise provided for. It was obviously necessary that while they provided for the local works being done by the local boards, there should be some general board for those works which must be considered of a general and not of a local character. Respecting this, the following suggestion had been made by the Commissioners—

"We suggest the creation of a Metropolitan Board of Works, to be composed of a very limited number of members deputed to it from the council of each metropolitan municipal body, including the corporation of the City. We propose that the management of public works, in which the metropolis has a common interest, should be conducted by this body. At present works of this sort can only be undertaken either by the corporation of London, from its own peculiar funds or under powers created for the purpose by special legislation, or by the Executive Government out of Parliamentary grants. It is manifest that a power of executing public works of general metropolitan importance, such as the construction of bridges over the Thames, or the opening or widening of main lines of street, accompanied by a power of metropolitan taxation, would, though founded on a basis of popular election, require efficient safeguards for its prudent and useful exercise. We therefore, think that the plans of the works to be executed should be submitted to a committee of the Privy Council, and its consent obtained before they are carried into effect. We may add that cases may arise where public works may be executed in the metropolis partly out of the metropolitan fund and partly from Parliamentary grants, and that in these cases a control of the Executive Government such as we have proposed would be indispensable. The Commissioners recommend in their 29th suggestion, that in the event of a division of the metropolis into municipal districts being made, a metropolitan board of works be created, composed of members deputed to it from the council of each metropolitan municipal body, including the common council of the City."

He proposed that this board should consist of forty-two elected members, two to be elected by the corporation of the City of London, and the remainder by the districts which would be found in the schedule attached to the Act. The chairman would make forty-three, and persons would be eligible, whether belonging to the district board or not. One-third would go out annually, and will be eligible for re-election. With respect to the chairman, he proposed that the members of the Metropolitan Board of Works should select three names, not necessarily from their own body, or from any district board, but that they should have power to select from the whole length and breadth of the kingdom three persons, any one of whom would be fit and proper to occupy the high office he would be called upon to fill, and thoroughly qualified to discharge the important functions attendant upon it. These names should be sent to the Secretary of State, and the latter should erase two, the remaining one to be the President of the Metropolitan Board of Works. He proposed that the chairman should be paid a salary of not less than 1,500*l.*, and not more than 2,000*l.* a year, and that he should hold office during good behaviour. This body would have power to levy rates for improvements, and also, when necessary, to take land out of their district for the purpose of outfall works, as at present it was not possible to carry out the drainage of the metropolis, because there was no power to make the arterial drains beyond a certain limit. This board would have power to make intercepting sewers for the purification of the Thames, and would be empowered to borrow money from the Treasury, to be repaid within fifty years. Also he proposed to alter the arrangement which divided a street into two districts. He did not interfere with the metropolitan police or magistrates; and, as he had before stated, the City of London was excluded from the Bill. A new Bill would, however, be introduced, transferring the coal duties to the metropolitan board. He had already said that the vestries of parishes were to be elected under the provisions of 1 & 2 Will. IV. c. 60; but there was one great inconvenience existing under that Act. Unless a parish was divided strictly according to law into ecclesiastical districts, there could be only one polling place in the whole parish for vestrymen. This was much and most properly complained of. In St. Pancras, for example, there were about 10,000 persons entitled to vote for Members of Parliament, and there were four polling places ; but there were about 20,000 persons qualified to vote for vestrymen, and they had only one polling place. The same inconvenience was felt in many other parishes, such as Islington, Lambeth, and others, where the ratepayers had now to travel a long distance to the polling place. If, therefore, the Bill should proceed, he would introduce a short Bill to amend the vestries in this particular. The Bill as it stood would give power to the local boards to put sewers in every street, and to give facility for draining the houses ; and, lastly, he should give powers for constructing the great intercepting sewers, so as to save the pollution of the Thames. He did not suppose he should be able to make the river the clear stream it was in Queen Elizabeth's time, when the Spanish Ambassador spoke of the noble river with its 200 swans swimming near the Tower ; but he hoped at least that he should see it cease to be the cloaca maxima of this great city. The next question to be considered was the supply of water. This was perhaps paramount, or at all events equal, to all others. Under the Act of 1852 an arrangement was made with the water companies, whether wisely or otherwise he would not stop now to argue, by which they were allowed till August next to obtain a fresh supply and to perform certain works. He could not, of course, interfere with the compact which Parliament had made with the water companies, but he proposed in August, 1855, to appoint a Commission to inquire whether the companies had fulfilled their part of the compact, and whether the supply of water was sufficient as to quantity, and good as to quality, and to report generally on the subject. Having apologised for the length at which he had troubled the House, the right hon. Baronet concluded by stating that, if permitted to introduce the Bill, he should fix the second reading for the 16th of April, thus giving a clear month for its perusal by hon. Members. He hoped that those hon. Members, and others who took an interest in the metropolis, would be so good as to favour him with any suggestions they might desire to make, with a view to perfect the measure ; and it would afford him great pleasure to consider them, and to adopt them, provided they were not inconsistent with the provisions of the Bill, which was based upon the principle of local self-government.

Motion made and Question proposed,

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill for the better Local Management of the Metropolis."

MR. FITZROY said, he could not allow this Bill to pass even its primary stage without making a few observations—first, as to the manner in which the Bill had been introduced, and, secondly, as to the important features contained in it. He must be allowed to say, notwithstanding his respect for the right hon. Baronet, that a Bill of such importance—involving changes affecting great interests and containing such novel principles—should have been introduced by a Member of the Cabinet more immediately connected with the internal government of the country, who would give to the Bill the weight of his authority. Considering the acknowledged ability of the right hon. Gentleman the present Secretary for the Home Department, and the laborious and sedulous manner in which he performed the duties of his office, it would have been more becoming, he conceived, that this important measure should have been introduced by him rather than by a Member in the position of the right hon. Baronet, who had also no particular connection with the subject he had brought under the consideration of the House. He had to complain also that no inquiry had been made so as to furnish the requisite information on the subject of this Bill, and if he had any doubt as to the inadequate information on which the Bill had been introduced, he had but to look to the speech of the right hon. Baronet, who had stated that his information had only been derived from imperfect returns made in answer to his own inquiries. He (Mr. Fitzroy) had seen some of the right hon. Baronet's information, and he must be allowed to say that it had been contradicted on several occasions, and would in a few days be again more fully controverted. He knew no precedent for introducing such a change as proposed by this Bill without allowing Parliament to obtain information in a clear manner, to which it might refer with certainty. They had, in the reformation they proposed to effect in the City of London, taken the statesmanlike course of issuing a Commission which consisted of men well known and of great experience, who, after sitting for many days, inquiring into the circumstances of the corporation of the City, had presented a Report, on which was founded the Bill shortly to be brought before the House. The Bill proposed to deal with nineteen-twentieths of the metropolis in this imperfect manner. One-twentieth had been dealt with, as he had just mentioned, in the proper course, by issuing a Commission, the weight of whose names would give authority to the recommendations which they presented to the House. On what principle could it be said that they were acting, when they dealt with only one-twentieth of the metropolis in this way, whilst nineteen-twentieths were treated in so hasty a manner? It was impossible to offer an opinion on the merits of the present Bill before the Bill affecting the City corporation was presented, as they could not determine till then whether the two Bills might not clash. The state of the metropolis might be as had been stated, but the House ought to have accurate information as to this, and a Commission ought to be issued, or, at all events, the subject should be referred to a Committee. He hoped some Member of the Government would state whether this Bill had been considered by the Cabinet, and whether it was introduced as a Cabinet measure. He would not follow the right hon. Baronet through all his details, as ample opportunity would be afforded for their discussion; but there had been one principle introduced into the Bill so startling, so perfectly new and unprecedented, that they should ask the House to consider it well before it sanctioned such a proposition as that of placing the sewerage under the direction of parochial delegates—men who would not be qualified for the office by any engineering knowledge, and as to whose ability no test was to be applied. He had looked through all the debates in 1848–9, 1851–2, and in last year, on the different measures respecting the Commission of Sewers, but he could not find that the strongest advocate for local self-government had recommended the adoption of that principle to the sewerage. Mr. Wakley, who was as firm an advocate of local self-government as the right hon. Baronet, had said with respect to a Sewerage Bill under the consideration of the House in 1851, that he recommended concentration of authority, but he had never hinted at placing it in the hands of the ratepayers. The sole control the right hon. Baronet attempted to place over these delegates—and he had treated this part of the question very gingerly and delicately—was through a chairman, to be selected from three names submitted to the Secretary of State; but what control could such a chairman have over such an incongruous body as these parochial delegates? With regard to the Sewerage Commissioners, their powers had been so restricted that it had been impossible for them to carry out the large drainage works which they had deemed necessary. It was the opinion of Lord Carlisle that the important work was best placed in the hands of a Commission. The proposition that works of such vast proportions should be left to be carried out by persons over whom there was no control appeared to him so startling that he could not believe that the House would entertain it. He had some knowledge of vestry affairs, and he could say that, in the large parish with which he was connected, if the sewerage were thrown upon the vestry they would have no means of carrying out the work efficiently. The right hon. Baronet (Sir B. Hall) had referred to the inconvenience of meeting conflicting jurisdictions on the surface of the same street, but how much greater would be the inconvenience of such a meeting in the sewers of a parish? Would the House, after long experience of the matter, and after the startling statements of the right hon. Baronet as to the effect of bad sewage upon the public health, consent again to consign the whole subject to an eternal chaos? And that certainly would be the effect of the proposed Bill. The only responsibility incurred by the persons who would have the charge of these important works would be that of meeting their constituents every three years. He did not think the Bill would bear investigation, and what appeared to him strange was, that it should be countenanced by the noble Lord at the head of the Government, who had hitherto professed to feel so much interest in the question, and who, in the Bill which he brought forward last year, proposed that Government should have a certain share in the nomination of persons to serve on the Commission of Sewers. If the Bill really proposed to vest the management of such important works in the hands of persons without responsibility, he should offer to it the most strenuous opposition.

Mr. LABOUCHERE said, he would not have thought it necessary to trouble the House with any observations but for the speech of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, and which, he thought, was calculated to raise a very unjust prejudice against the Bill which was now before the House. It was true that the question of the local government of the metropolis had come incidentally before the Commission upon which he had the honour of serving, and it appeared to that Commission that the abuses of the present system should be reformed. He felt bound to state that the present Bill appeared to him to be founded upon the principle of reform laid down by the Commissioners, and nothing which had fallen from the hon. Gentleman who last addressed the House had shaken his opinion that the principle of local self-government by a body elected by the ratepayers—a principle which had been found to work well in other towns—should, with certain variations, be applied to the metropolis. The hon. Gentleman said that the House would be acting upon imperfect information, but he would refer him to the evidence given before the Corporation Commission, and if he turned to the evidence concerning the parish of St. Pancras he would see the absurd consequences of the variety of jurisdiction; he would see that the present system gave rise to nothing but jobbing, mismanagement, and confusion. No doubt the parish of St. Pancras was one of the strongest instances, but the same kind of thing existed throughout the metropolis. Such a state of things could not be allowed to continue, although, at the same time, he willingly admitted that the Bill was of so much importance that the whole of its details would require the most careful attention of the House. He was prepared to give his assent to the general principle involved in the Bill, but he considered himself perfectly free to consider the details of it, and more especially that most difficult part of it which had reference to the sewage question. The main question, however, appeared to him to be whether or not it was expedient to substitute for the system of irresponsibility, of jobbing, and mismanagement which now existed in the metropolis, a simple uniform system which had been found to work well elsewhere. He thought the Government deserved great credit for introducing this Bill, and the thanks of the House were especially due to the right hon. Baronet (Sir B. Hall) for the great attention he had paid to the subject. He wished also to point out that in 1862 the coal duties would expire, and as it was not at all probable that they would be reimposed, where, he would ask the House, were funds for improvement to come from unless from a direct improvement rate? Such a rate, however, could not be levied but by a body in which the inhabitants had confidence. He had felt it to be his duty to bear his testimony to what he believed to be an important principle of a Bill which he believed might, by careful consideration, be made one of the most valuable measures of the age.

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON said, that while agreeing with his right hon. Friend and colleague (Sir B. Hall) as to the evils arising from the anarchical and anomalous state in which the Government of the metropolis was left, differed from him as to the value of the remedy now proposed. The Bill proposed to divide the metropolis into thirty-six districts, to be apportioned according to the existing artificial boundaries, irrespective of the levels and natural distribution of the area, which had hitherto been always more or less regarded in legislation on this subject. A quarter of a million of money had been expended, because man's artificial divisions had been followed in preference to those of nature in respect to the line of sewerage in one of the largest districts of London; and it was to be feared that those local jealousies and conflicting interests which had so unhappily prevailed in the seven existing divisions of the metropolis would be multiplied thirty-six times by this measure. They would also have thirty-six separate sets of officers, who were likely to be both under-skilled and overpaid. Moreover, the sewer-rate was a landlord's tax, and yet the whole power of deciding upon work, effecting the property of the long leaseholders and landlords of the metropolis, was to be confined to the temporary ratepayers; so that the Bill would create this anomaly, that London would be the sole place in England where the only persons excluded from the control of the expenditure would be those who had to defray it. But, further, there was a danger that the proposed local Parliament of forty-two Members would discuss politics instead of sewerage questions, and threaten to overshadow the authority of the Speaker and that of the Imperial Parliament.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I hope the House, Sir, will not be alarmed at the danger shadowed out by my noble Friend, that either you, Sir, will be dispossessed of the chair which you now occupy, or that the authority of this House will be imperilled by the encroaching spirit of the local Parliament now proposed to be created. Still less do I fear that the House will be deterred from granting leave for the introduction of this Bill through the disapprobation that has been expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Mr. Fitzroy). That hon. Gentleman found fault because the President of the Board of Health had been selected to bring in this very important and valuable measure. Now, the facts of the case are these: my right hon. Friend (Sir B. Hall) having more local knowledge on the subject to which this Bill applies than anybody else that I am acquainted with, communicated with me in the course of the last autumn, and submitted plans that he had prepared with regard to it; and as he, with great ability and industry, completed arrangements which appeared to the Government well adapted for the purposes they contemplated, it was thought that it would be very unjust to my right hon. Friend that he should not be the person to bring this measure before the House. And nobody is more cognisant of every part of the proceedings which led to the framing of the measure which is now under our notice than my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes. I quite agree with my right hon. Friend near me (Mr. Labouchere) that the principle of self-government which obtains in Parliament has been found most congenial with the feelings and habits of the people of this country. I am under no apprehension that the sewerage of the different metropolitan districts will be mismanaged by the local bodies to which it will be confided. Everybody who has at all looked into this matter must be perfectly aware that it is impossible for the general Commissioners of Sewers to direct simultaneously the arterial drainage of the metropolis, and apply their attention properly to the defects of the branch sewerage of every separate district. It has long been found that, while one central body ought to be entrusted with the superintendence of the general arrangements of the arterial drainage, other local bodies should be charged with the maintenance and repair of the sewers in their respective districts; and, in my opinion, the measure of my right hon. Friend will sufficiently accomplish both of those important objects. I will not detain the House by repeating the very cogent reasons which my right hon. Friend has assigned for the necessity of this Bill, or the illustration he has given of the advantages it will secure. I will only say that, instead of its being calculated to create chaos, I think it will dispel it, and substitute for the extreme confusion which now prevails a system of order and regularity, from which the metropolis will derive great benefit.

MR. STUART WORTLEY said, he believed that the corporation of London would cordially co-operate in the promotion of the objects which this Bill was designed to advance; but, looking to the great importance of the City of London, and the vast concentration of wealth within its limits, he must contend that it was entitled to a larger share of the representation in the council than the Bill of the right hon. Baronet proposed to give. The sewerage of the City of London was at present solely in the hands of the corporation, and he understood the management of that sewerage was to be left in the hands in which it at present was, and which were universally admitted to be very efficient. He understood it was proposed that the managing body for the whole metropolis was to consist of forty-two members. The City of London—not the corporation—was to be represented on that Board by only two members, who were to be members of the corporation. These numbers were calculated, he was given to understand, on the principle of population, but to give to the City of London no greater a proportion than as two to forty-two was to take a very narrow view of its importance. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Labouchere) had stated that the coal tax expired in 1862, and that he thought it very doubtful whether the Legislature would ever consent to its renewal. Now, there was a great delusion in the public mind with regard to this tax. The general impression was that the whole of it was taken by the City of London, but that was not the case. The coal tax consisted of 1s. 1d. in the ton, 9d. of which went to the Board of Works; and if the right hon. Gentleman who presided over that Board was prepared either in 1862, or at any earlier period, to take such a step, there could be no objection to hand over this 9d. to the proposed central board for the improvement of the metropolis. This tax of 9d. in the ton was the creation of modern statutes, but with respect to the other 4d., which went to the corporation, and which had been chiefly mortgaged to carry out improvements not wholly, but mainly within the limits of the City, that was not levied under modern statutes, but was an ancient right and possession, which, in 1862, would revive in the corporation under their old charters. This portion of the tax, therefore, would have to be dealt with in a different manner from that levied under the modern statutes, and he must protest against the supposition that, without some special arrangement entered into for that purpose, they could at once transfer this 4d. per ton, which, in 1862, would still remain the property of the corporation of London, to the central board in the way proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. At the same time, in order to carry out the improvements required in the metropolis, the corporation would be anxious to make every reasonable concession.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, he was much obliged for the promise of assistance given by the right hon. and learned Gentleman. The proper time for discussing the coal tax would be when the Bill was under discussion. He proposed that district sewers within the City of London should not be interfered with in any way, directly or indirectly, by any local or metropolitan board, but that they should remain under precisely the same control as at present. He could not conceive that anything could be better managed than was the sewerage of the City of London, and his hope and belief was that persons would be found to manage the sewerage of the other districts of the metropolis equally well with that in the City. With regard to the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Stuart Wortley), that the corporation was not sufficiently represented by two members in the proposed Board, he would state that he had calculated that representation on the basis both of population and of value, but that was a matter quite open for further consideration.

Question put, and agreed to.

Leave given.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir Benjamin Hall, Sir George Grey, and Sir William Molesworth.

PUBLIC HEALTH, ETC., BILLS.

MR. APSLEY PELLATT said, he would now beg to move the Instruction of which he had given notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to whom the Public Health and Nuisances Removal Amendment Bills are referred, to hear Counsel on behalf of such Petitioners as have prayed to be heard by Counsel."

MR. MUNTZ said, he had an Amendment to move to the Instruction of the hon.

Member for Southwark, which he hoped the House would agree to.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "referred" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "to hear two Counsel upon each class of Petitions praying to be heard by Counsel."

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. T. GREENE said, he should oppose both the Motion and the Amendment. The Committee would act with entire impartiality, and hear all the evidence that could be brought forward on both sides, and he therefore trusted the House would not agree to either proposal, as the appearance of counsel would only have the effect of lengthening their proceedings to an indefinite extent, and would do no good.

MR. SPOONER said, he should support the Amendment, because the Bill meddled in a most extraordinary way with very great interests, who ought to be heard before it came out of the Committee. He suggested that the original Motion should be withdrawn. The Amendment would be sufficient to quiet the doubts and fears of parties out of doors with regard to the Bill.

Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question put—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to whom the Public Health Bill, and Nuisances Removal Amendment Bill, are referred, to hear two Counsel upon each class of Petitions praying to be heard by Counsel."

The House divided:—Ayes 18; Noes 48: Majority 30.

RECALL OF THE EARL OF LUCAN— REPORT OF THE BATTLE OF BALAKLAVA.

Copy of a Letter from Major General The Earl of Lucan (dated 5th March, 1855), to the Adjutant General, repeating his Application for a Court-martial on his Conduct on the Day of the Action of Balaklava on the 25th October last; and the Adjutant General's Answer to Major General The Earl of Lucan, dated 12th March 1855—Laid before the House (pursuant to Address of Monday last).

THE EARL OF LUCAN: * I rise, my Lords, in pursuance of notice, to move for a copy of Lord Raglan's report of the Battle of Balaklava. I consider it due to your Lordships and to myself not to forego this, the first opportunity which has occurred to me, to make a statement of what was my conduct on the day of that battle, and at the same time to show what has happened since in reference to it. Up to the present moment I have most scrupulously abstained from saying one word in this House upon this subject in my own vindication, however prejudicial to me such silence was likely to be, as it has proved. Having applied for a court martial, considering such a court the most competent from its composition to entertain and dispose satisfactorily of charges of so exclusively a professional character, as long as I could hope to have such a tribunal I considered it best became me to be silent in this House; but my applications for such a trial, however earnestly made, have been as resolutely refused. I have, therefore, I feel, no other course open to me than to present myself before your Lordships, confidently hoping that you will kindly indulge me with your attention, and give to my statement a fair and impartial consideration.

I am assured that a military investigation has been so refused, on the ground of there being no precedent. My Lords, I believe that it is equally unprecedented that an officer of high rank should be summarily recalled from an army in the field, and that charges should for the first time, at the end of four months, be brought against him (he being left in the meantime in the command of his division) without his being allowed an opportunity of meeting and refuting them. When I seek to clear my character by a statement here, this House is warned by the Minister of War not to allow itself to be made an arena for the discussion of military discipline, and your Lordships are told to be cautious not to trench on the prerogative. There is no noble Peer in this House more inclined than myself to respect the prerogative. I freely admit that Her Majesty has, and should have, the power to call to and recall from the army any officer she shall think fit. But, I tell the Minister of War, that where he, as the adviser of the Crown, advises the exercise of the prerogative, he must not allow himself to found a recall on charges professionally disparaging and disgraceful without giving the party an opportunity of denying them. As, in the case of a private individual, any one of your Lordships might dismiss from your employment any person you thought fit, but you would not be allowed to make charges of a disgraceful nature against him without his having the opportunity of disproving them. I cannot suppose that in this House, however much your Lordships may be disposed to respect precedent, or however much your Lordships may be again disposed to hold the prerogative sacred, you will prefer either precedent or prerogative to justice.

It will be necessary, I fear, to trouble your Lordships at some length, and in the statement I am about to make it shall be my endeavour, as it is my wish, whilst exculpating myself, not to inculpate others. It is my wish to make my statement as clear as possible, and to do so I shall have to take your Lordships to the Battle of Balaklava.

At about eleven o'clock of the 24th of October that excellent soldier, Sir Colin Campbell, I cannot allow myself to mention in this House the name of that officer with whom I was acting in concert for four months without stating that a more gallant or useful soldier there is not in the army, informed me that a spy had come in, and that he wished me to see him. Having examined this spy together, we considered his news so important that Sir Colin Campbell at once wrote a report to Lord Raglan, and I had it conveyed to his Lordship by my aide-de-camp, who happened on that day to be my son. The spy had stated that 20,000 infantry and 5,000 cavalry were marching against our position at Balaklava from the east and south-east. My aide-de-camp told me that he had delivered the letter to General Airey, who made no reply; and that he subsequently met Lord Raglan, who only said that if there was anything new it was to be reported to him.

It was the habit of the cavalry at this time to be always mounted an hour before daylight. I proceeded to fort No. 3 on the plan, a copy of which is in the hands of many of your Lordships. This was the extreme fort of the position. At dawn I perceived that heavy columns of infantry were advancing from the direction of the Tchernaya River and Kamara Range. I immediately placed my cavalry in position, and posted my horse-battery on the right of No. 3 fort. The Russians immediately opened fire, and attacked Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4 forts, occupied by Turks. No. 1 was only taken after a very respectable resistance. I am anxious to say so, because I consider that they got less credit than they deserved. The other three were all evacuated, and with the forts the enemy took nine English guns.

After the evacuation of these forts by the Turks (having previously arranged with Sir Colin Campbell to do so), I threw my cavalry back to give his guns in position clear range, and took post in line facing to the east, between forts 4 and 5. My cavalry were then well placed to take in flank any Russian forces marching against Balaklava, when, to my great discomfiture, I received from Lord Raglan an order which I shall number 1. It was as follows—

"Cavalry to take ground to left of second line of redoubts occupied by Turks."

This order was immediately obeyed, and the cavalry were placed en masse facing the north, looking into Inkerman valley. Very shortly after order No. 2 reached me, desiring that eight squadrons of heavy dragoons should move towards Balaklava to support the Turks, who were said to be wavering. The heavy dragoons had already proceeded some distance, when I perceived through the orchard that a body of Russian cavalry was coming over the hill. I rode at speed, and just succeeded in joining the leading squadrons of Greys and Enniskillen dragoons as they were rounding the orchard, and had only time to wheel them into line, and to order an immediate charge under General Scarlett. The enemy was advancing in a dense column, with their flanks protected by two wings; these, so soon as they found that they outflanked my four squadrons, wheeled about inwards and totally enveloped them; on which I attacked them with the 5th Dragoon Guards in the rear and in flank with the 4th Dragoon Guards, when the whole mass of the enemy, amounting to at least 3,500 men, was repulsed and routed by eight small squadrons of about 700 men—only one-fifth of their number.

I should do little justice to this gallant heavy brigade and their gallant general if I did not take this opportunity of stating how much I considered they had distinguished themselves. I believe there never was an action in which English cavalry distinguished themselves more, and I do not think that there is a disposition in this country to attribute sufficient importance to this heavy dragoon charge and to do it full justice. The French, than whom there are certainly no better soldiers, nor officers who more perfectly understand the art of war, do full justice to it, and pronounce it a brilliant feat of arms, and one adding lustre to our British cavalry. I know it has been imputed to me that I did not pursue the routed enemy with my light cavalry as I should have done. To this I will not allow myself to say any more than that they had been placed in a position by Lord Raglan, that they were altogether out of my reach, and that to me they were unavailable.

After this charge the cavalry were dismounted, and the wounded and prisoners were being removed, when an aide-de-camp of the Commander in Chief brought me order No. 3. I wish your Lordships to observe that the heavy cavalry were at this moment standing on the ground occupied by the Russian cavalry in the plan. No. 3 order was to this effect—

"Cavalry to advance and take advantage of any opportunity to recover the heights. They will be supported by the infantry, which have been ordered. Advance on two fronts."

It is necessary here to observe that the copy given in Lord Raglan's letter of the 16th of December is incorrect, and materially so. In the original, which I hold in my hand, and which your Lordships can see, there is a full stop after the word "ordered," and the word "Advance" is written with a large A, therefore making two distinct sentences. In Lord Raglan's copy the two sentences are made one by the omission of the stop, and by a small a being substituted for a large one. Therefore, whilst in the original, the order was for the cavalry to advance, in the copy it applied to the infantry. I do not wish to impute anything to Lord Raglan on account of this difference, as it is possible that the error was in the copy with which I furnished his Lordship. The cavalry were in consequence immediately mounted, and moved to the positions in the centre valley and on the ridge, as shown in the plan. No infantry had at this time arrived from the heights of Sebastopol. I remained myself between my two brigades, anxiously waiting their arrival. When they did arrive, instead of being formed for an attack, or to support an attack, they were, the greater part of them, sitting or lying down with their arms piled.

From thirty to forty minutes had elapsed and the whole of the infantry had not arrived, when Captain Nolan galloped up to me with No. 4 order, in my opinion a fresh order, quite independent of any previous order, and having no connection with No. 3 or any other order. Indeed, I do positively affirm, that neither by my Lord Raglan, or General Airey, or any other person whatsoever, did I ever hear or suppose that any connection whatever existed, or was intended to exist, between this new order No. 4 and No. 3 the preceding one, or that they had the slightest reference to each other. No. 4 order is as follows—

"Lord Raglan wishes the cavalry to advance rapidly to the front, follow the enemy, and try to prevent the enemy carrying away the guns. Troop of horse artillery may accompany. French cavalry is on your left. Immediate."

Your Lordships should be told, that when Lord Raglan gave this order, he was upon very high ground, and a quarter of a mile to my rear, from whence he could well see the whole position of the enemy; and you should be again told, that his Lordship at this time fancied, and he was not the only man who laboured under the same false impression (for I could produce half a dozen persons to testify to it), that the enemy were carrying away our guns from numbers 1, 2, and 3 redoubts, and therefore sent this order. I had, perhaps, better read from my letter to Lord Raglan of the 30th November how I acted on the receipt of number 4 order.

The extract is as follows—

"After carefully reading this order, I hesitated and urged the uselessness of such an attack, and the dangers attending it. The aide-de-camp, in a most authoritative tone, stated that they were Lord Raglan's orders that the cavalry should attack immediately. I asked, 'Where, and what to do?' neither enemy nor guns being in sight. He replied in a most disrespectful but significant manner, pointing to the further end of the valley, 'There, my Lord, is your enemy; there are your guns!' So distinct, in my opinion, was your written instruction, and so positive and urgent were the orders delivered by the aide-de-camp, that I felt it was imperative on me to obey, and I informed Lord Cardigan that he was to advance, and to the objections he made, and in which I entirely agreed, I replied that the order was from your Lordship. Having decided, against my conviction, to make the movement, I did all in my power to render it as little perilous as possible. I formed the brigade in two lines, and led to its support two regiments of heavy cavalry, the Scots Grey and Royals, and only halted them when they had reached the point from which they could protect the retreat of the light cavalry in the event of their being pursued by the enemy, and when, having already lost many officers and men by the

My Lords, this I think is the time to show your Lordships what an aide-de-camp is. In page 59 of the Queen's Regulations, which cannot be violated with impunity, under the head of aides-de-camp, it is ordered, "all orders sent by aides-de-camp are to be delivered in the plainest terms, and are to be obeyed with the same readiness as if delivered personally by the general officers to whom such aides-de-camp are attached." I ask any military man, I ask the noble Duke near me (the Duke of Richmond), who was aide-de-camp to that great man, the late Duke of Wellington, whether an aide-de-camp is not the organ of his general? And whether a general officer who took upon himself to disobey an order brought by an aide-de-camp, verbal or written, would not risk the loss of his commission? If this were not so, why could not an orderly dragoon convey orders as well as an aide-de-camp? An aide-de-camp is chosen because he is an officer of education and intelligence, he is, therefore, supposed to deliver an order more correctly, and is considered as being in the confidence of his general. Shall I be told that Captain Nolan was not in General Airey's confidence? Why, he told me himself that he had given to Captain Nolan his instructions verbally, and it was only when that officer was turning his horse away, that he detained him, and committed the instructions to writing. I would ask any reasonable man, after this, whether any mistake was or could be committed by Captain Nolan? And how could I, at the time, or can now, doubt but that Captain Nolan was instructed to deliver to me the positive order to attack which he did?

My Lords, I must direct your attention to this. In the order it is stated, "French cavalry is on your left," evidently for the purpose of informing me where the French cavalry were, an admission that they were out of my sight if not out of my reach, and again informing me that it was a combined movement in which they were to join and assist me. I felt, ordered as I was to advance immediately without an opportunity of sending to ask for further instructions, that I could not fail to perform my part of this combined movement, and so leave the brunt of the affair to be borne by the French cavalry alone.

Under these circumstances my course was clear to me; and I considered it a positive duty to order Lord Cardigan to advance with the light cavalry brigade, and to lead the heavy cavalry brigade to its support.

Your Lordships are so well acquainted with the details of this charge, and so fully appreciate the extraordinary valour and gallantry displayed by the light cavalry on that occasion, and also the steadiness and bravery of the heavy brigade, more particularly the Scots Grey and Royals, the two regiments most exposed, that I would only add, that the brilliancy of the charge and the gallantry displayed by the whole of the cavalry, were never surpassed at any former period. Your Lordships should be told that the infantry, which I was informed was coming to support me, was composed of two divisions, the 1st commanded by His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, and the 4th by an officer whose death the army and the country so much deplore, both my seniors, and therefore both my commanding officers. In the evening of the action, I saw Lord Raglan; his first remark to me was, "You have lost the light brigade." I at once denied that I had lost the light brigade, as I had only carried out the orders conveyed to me, written and verbal, by Captain Nolan. He then said that I was a lieutenant general, and should, therefore, have exercised my discretion, and not approving of the charge, should not have made it. He subsequently said that I had not moved sufficiently in advance in the previous movement; but he never attempted to show then, or has he ever allowed me to suppose since, until the present time, that he ever intended that No. 4 order was at all to be connected with the preceding order.

The day but one after the battle of Balaklava, General Airey called upon me in my tent. The moment he entered, I said, "General Airey, this is a most serious matter. You may depend upon it, it will create a great deal of talk and dissatisfaction at home." He replied, "These sort of things will happen in war; it is nothing to Chillianwallah." I said, "I know nothing about Chillianwallah; but I tell you, General Airey, that this is a most serious affair; and, what is more, I tell you that I do not intend to bear the smallest particle of responsibility. I gave the order to charge under what I considered a most imperious necessity, and I will not bear the blame." General Airey then tried to convince me that the order was not imperative; and after some conversation with him upon other matters, and when he was leaving my tent, I said to him, "Now be careful, General Airey, that no responsibility is placed upon me in this light cavalry affair, as I will not bear any." His reply was, "You may rest satisfied, Lord Lucan, you will be pleased with Lord Raglan's report."

Perhaps I had better here call your Lordships' attention to the fact, that throughout the whole of this conversation General Airey, though he had signed the two orders numbers 3 and 4, which I received from Lord Raglan, never gave me any reason whatever to suppose that there was any connection between the two. Had the last order had any reference to the preceding one, would he not naturally have said so? But he did no such thing on this the first occasion, nor has he ever on any subsequent occasion.

Now, my Lords, I could not anticipate that so much injustice would be done me by Lord Raglan; or, that all the injustice which I have experienced at home would have been done me. In my simplicity, I even omitted to send a copy of the order to England for my justification before my friends and the public,—who, let me observe, do not appear always to deal very fairly with the absent. There is a French saying—"Que les absens ont toujours tort;" it would, perhaps, be more properly said,—"Que ceux qui se taisent ont toujours tort." I did nothing until Lord Raglan's report of the battle of Balaklava reached the Crimea on the 28th November. The mention made that I had acted under a misconception of orders, from its injustice as I felt, exceedingly hurt and grieved me. Articles in newspapers, and letters from my friends, calling for explanations, impressed upon me the necessity of a public explanation of my conduct and of facts. I, in consequence, on the following day after the arrival of the mail, called upon Lord Burghersh. I said to him,—"I come to you more as the nephew of Lord Raglan than as his aide-de-camp, as it is my wish to make a communication to his Lordship, and I do not wish to give him the least pain or offence." I expatiated at some length on Lord Raglan's charging me with a misconception of orders, and said that the British public, as shown by the newspapers, and my friends in their letters, were calling upon me for a justification, which I could not withhold. I then asked Lord Burghersh to propose to Lord Raglan to receive me, that I might talk over with him in a friendly way, how I might act to do myself justice in a manner the least annoying and offensive to him. Lord Burghersh called on me the next day, and said, that if I desired it, Lord Raglan would, of course, see me; but that he was very much engaged with writing. I replied—

"I can believe that Lord Raglan would rather not have any conversation with me on this subject, and having thought the matter over, it has occurred to me that it would not be objectionable to Lord Raglan if I were to write a letter to him explaining facts, and to request him to send it to England, there to receive the same publicity as his report."

Lord Burghersh brightened up, and said—

"Lord Raglan can have no objection to that, if that is all you require. From what fell from you yesterday, I thought you would require more."

I answered—

"I require nothing more on earth than that the English public should know the facts of the case."

And I added—

"If in my letter there should be anything offensive or displeasing to Lord Raglan, if he will be good enough to point it out, I shall have much pleasure in altering it."

Now, my Lords, I don't think that this was an unfriendly or a disrespectful communication to make to my Commander in Chief. I wrote the letter that very night, as the post was leaving on the 1st or 2nd of December. I had it delivered early next morning, and really believed that it had been sent by that post; when, on the 4th of December, General Airey's aide-de-camp called upon me, as he said, to talk to me about the hutting of the cavalry, and concluded with the expression of a wish that I would call upon General Airey, who was ill, to talk upon the subject. I did so the following day. General Airey, after talking to me in a rambling manner about the hutting of the cavalry, produced my letter, and said—

"The real object of my wishing to see you is with respect to this letter."

I replied—

"That letter! I believed it to have been half way on its road to England by this time."

He said—

"No, Lord Raglan thinks that the letter is very unnecessary. You have received the thanks of Her Majesty, and the thanks of the Minister of War (printed copies of which he held in his hand); surely you ought to be satisfied."

I answered—

"General Airey, I don't know why I am to be so particularly grateful. I think that both Her Majesty and the Minister of War have said quite as much as Lord Raglan's report would have warranted; but if you put the question to me, whether I am charmed with this report of Lord Raglan, I say, I think that his Lordship was exceedingly scanty in my praise. I wanted nothing more than justice; but when I recollect, that with seven hundred men I routed three or four thousand, and under the most disadvantageous circumstances repelled their attack, I do not see in that report anything with which to be much enamoured. I have only touched upon this subject in consequence of your having broached it, as, had you not done so, I never should have expressed my dissatisfaction to yourself or any soul living."

General Airey said—

"Lord Raglan is very much annoyed by this letter, and declares that no power on earth shall induce him to change his report."

I replied—

"I have not the least wish that he should change his report, nor have I in my letter expressed such a wish. It would, I consider, be unreasonable in me to ask him to do so; for I cannot but suppose that he made that report, believing it to be true. I have no right, therefore, to ask him to change it. I only ask him to carry out what I understood to be agreed upon, namely, that my statement of facts should be sent to England."

General Airey, no very unskilful diplomatist, then thought he would take a higher tone, and resort to menace. He said—

"Lord Raglan will be so much annoyed that he will send to England for another general officer to command the cavalry."

I replied, that I should much regret it, but that I could not help it. Further, that my letter had been written by agreement with Lord Burghersh, and that in that letter Lord Raglan was not asked to change his report.

Upon that General Airey again altogether altered his tone, saying—

"Oh! if you don't ask Lord Raglan to change his report, he can have no objection, I should think, to forward your statement."

And upon this we parted. On the 9th of the month, General Airey wrote to me, saying that Lord Raglan wished very much that I should have some conversation with him (General Airey). I went to him immediately. He began, with my letter in his hand, saying—

"Lord Raglan does not like this letter at all; he says that you have charged him with injustice, and he cannot allow any officer in the army to say such a thing of him."

I replied—

"I did not know that I had, and asked him to point it out to me."

After beating about for some time, he put his finger on the word "unmerited." I said that really I considered that a very strained construction to put upon that word; moreover, that I had proposed to Lord Burghersh to remove or change anything that might be displeasing to Lord Raglan, and, that after ten days it was strange he should then make such an objection. General Airey, again, as on the former occasion, adopted the fortiter, and said that Lord Raglan was dissatisfied with the state of the cavalry. I said that I was not satisfied with it myself, but begged to know whether I was to consider this as the opinion of the Commander in Chief, communicated to me by the Quartermaster General of the army? And also, whether I was to consider that his Lordship was dissatisfied with me as their commander? He denied having intended to say this, and an angry discussion ensued, after which he reverted to the suaviter, and said—

"As you have expressed your readiness to Lord Burghersh to remove or alter anything Lord Raglan might dislike in the letter, and as he has not expressed any wish that you should do so, he cannot now object to forward it."

We then parted with the understanding, as I conceived, that the difficulty about the word "unmerited" was explained away, and that my statement was to go. My Lords, I heard no more of this letter, and supposed it had gone to England by the next post. It does not, however, appear to have been forwarded till the 18th of December, but to have been detained those eighteen days in Lord Raglan's possession.

I must here observe that there has been nothing approaching to a quarrel between myself and Lord Raglan, and that all our communications were as friendly since, as they had been previously, and as much so as between his Lordship and the other divisional officers. My Lords, I consider that this is the time to call your attention to Lord Raglan's letter of the 16th of December, the existence of which I had no knowledge of till it was forwarded to me by the Minister of War, so lately as the 5th instant. I shall read it in extenso, and comment on it as I go on; and I will make this engagement with your Lordships, to refute every sentence, and every word that it contains. It commences—

"My Lord Duke—I regret to be under the necessity of forwarding to your Grace the copy of a letter which has been addressed to me by Lieutenant General the Earl of Lucan. When I received it, I placed it in the hands of Brigadier General Airey, the Quartermaster General, and requested him to suggest to his Lordship to withdraw the communication, considering it would not lead to his advantage in the slightest degree."

My Lords, I have told your Lordships what did pass between me and General Airey. No doubt he did wish me to suppress my letter, and endeavoured to induce me to do so; but that he did ask me to withdraw it, I boldly and solemnly assert not to be the fact. Lord Raglan continues—

"But Lord Lucan having declined to take the step I recommended, I have but one course to pursue, that of laying the letter before your Grace, and submitting to you such observations upon it as I am bound in justice to myself to put you in possession of. Lieutenant General the Earl of Lucan complains that in my despatch to your Grace of the 28th of October, I stated that from some misconception of the instruction to advance the lieutenant general considered he was bound to attack at all hazards. His Lordship conceives this statement to be a grave charge, and an imputation reflecting seriously on his professional character, and he deems it incumbent upon him to state those facts which he cannot doubt must clear him from what he respectfully submits is altogether unmerited. I have referred to my despatch, and, far from being willing to recall one word of it, I am prepared to declare that not only did the lieutenant general misconceive the written instructions that were sent to him, but that there was nothing in that instruction which called upon him to attack at all hazards."

My Lords, Lord Raglan is endeavouring to fasten upon me an expression that I considered myself bound to attack at all hazards, words used exclusively by his Lordship, though undoubtedly the aide-de-camp did give me an order to attack immediately. Lord Raglan proceeds—

"There was nothing in that instruction which called upon him to attack at all hazards, or to undertake the operation which led to such a brilliant display of gallantry on the part of the light brigade, and, unhappily, at the same time occasioned such lamentable casualties in every regiment composing it. In his Lordship's letter he is wholly silent with respect to a previous order which had been sent him."

And for this reason. I received four orders totally distinct, having no reference to each other; and therefore why was I in the discussion of number 4, to discuss number 3, more than either of the other previous orders? And I defy any person to trace the least connection between the two last.

Again—

"The previous order was in the following words:—The cavalry to advance, and take advantage of any opportunity to recover the heights. They will be supported by infantry, which have been ordered to advance on two fronts."

I have already shown your Lordships this to be a misquotation of the order; and that it was the cavalry and not the infantry that were ordered to advance on two fronts.

It was a fact, that the Duke of Cambridge, commanding the first division, received no order to give the cavalry any support. Nor did Sir George Cathcart, for that gallant officer told one of my aides-de-camp that he was unable to give any assistance, not having received any authority to do so. Under these circumstances I did all I could do. I placed my division in the position which Lord Raglan's aide-de-camp told me to take, and there waited for the co-operation of the infantry, but which was never given. From thirty to forty minutes elapsed between the receipt of the two orders. If the former order had been badly carried out, Lord Raglan was in a position to see it, and had only to send an aide-de-camp to point out my error. The cavalry were ordered to advance and take advantage of any opportunity to recover the heights. Did any opportunity occur, which I neglected? Was I to create the opportunity myself? Or, was I to do more than to profit by the opportunities created by others? As to recovering the heights, I declare that there was not a single Russian on the heights to the westward of No. 3 redoubt; for, after the heavy dragoon charge in the morning, the enemy evacuated 6, 5, and 4, forts. Indeed, No. 4 was subsequently occupied by Sir George Cathcart. If, as I contend, there were no Russians until you came to No. 3 fort, and they were all either in that fort or beyond it, I should wish to ask any military man how I was to execute this order. Is it to be supposed that Lord Raglan intended the cavalry to attack the fort? Or, is it not more reasonable to suppose that the infantry were to attack the fort, and that the cavalry were to wait for the opportunity of cutting off the retreat of the enemy when the assault had proved successful? I ask, will this order admit of any other construction? I am very certain that had I acted otherwise than I did, I should have been charged, and justly charged, with imprudence and incapacity.

In fine, as I have already said, there were no heights occupied by Russians to recover; but there were three forts, and I know that it was intended that the infantry should attack and retake them; and it was the wish of Sir George Cathcart to make the attempt; but it was not attempted, because it was considered that they could not be held, and that it was not worth the loss of life that must necessarily attend their assault. I think I have shown that thus far there is not a single sentence in Lord Raglan's letter that I have not refuted and shivered. Lord Raglan proceeds—

"So little had he sought to do as he had been directed that he had no men in advance of his main body."

The fact is, Lord Cardigan's brigade was so much in advance that I received a communication from his Lordship through his aide-de-camp objecting to stand where he was, because the position was so much in advance, and he expected the batteries on the left to open upon him.

"He made no attempt to regain the heights."

I have already stated that firstly, there were no heights, but forts to regain, and secondly, that I had not the promised co-operation of the infantry. Lord Raglan continues—

"and was so little informed of the position of the enemy that he asked Captain Nolan what and where he was to attack, as neither enemy nor guns were in sight."

Now, if your Lordships will only read my letter, you will readily understand the tone and manner in which these questions were put. I was sensible of the absurdity and uselessness of the order; and when he persisted in his orders to attack, I said, "Attack, Sir!—Attack what, and where? What guns are we to recover?"

Captain Nolan pointed to the further end of the valley, and said—

"There, my Lord, are your guns and your enemy."

I have already stated the erroneous impression which prevailed, that the Russians were at that moment taking our guns from forts 1, 2, and 3, and the spot pointed at by Captain Nolan was in the direction they would have been taken. Now, the guns were not moved at all that day, and to use a popular word just now, the whole was a misconception. The letter proceeds—

"This is the lieutenant general's own admission. The result of his inattention to the first order was, that it never occurred to him that the second was connected with and the repetition of the first. He viewed it only as a positive order to attack at all hazards. (The word 'attack,' be it observed, was not made use of in General Airey's note)."

But, my Lords, the order to attack the enemy immediately from Lord Raglan was delivered to me by Captain Nolan. And again, is it not trifling to pretend that there was no order to attack when I was desired to advance rapidly to the front, to follow the enemy, and to try to prevent the enemy from carrying away the guns ? I ask any military man, whether such an order means anything but attack ? Could it be pretended that we were to advance slowly under a cross fire of batteries ; and having reached the enemy were not to attack them, but to halt with our hands in our pockets ? The idea is too puerile and absurd. But to proceed ; I was told that in carrying out this operation, a troop of horse artillery may accompany. Your Lordships will observe, that the word "may" is here introduced. I therefore considered so much of the order discretionary, and did not take the troop. When I inform your Lordships that the artillery would have had to proceed up a long valley, much of it ploughed land, under a cross fire of batteries, and without a chance of ever bringing their guns usefully into action, your Lordships will, I think, consider that I exercised a wise discretion. Had the troop of horse artillery accompanied me, the horses must have been killed and the guns lost. The letter proceeds—

" He was informed that the French cavalry was on the left and he did not invite their co-operation."

This is a most extraordinary charge. They were out of sight on the other side of the ridge of the Inkerman valley, and much nearer to Lord Raglan and General Canrobert than to me. I knew not what was the force of French cavalry, how commanded or what orders they had received. Moreover, my advance was to be immediate, and I could not have communicated with the French cavalry in less than a quarter of an hour. My Lords, you might be inclined to suppose that we had not the co-operation of the French cavalry ; when, on the contrary, we had it, and it was most useful to us. Three squadrons of French chasseurs most gallantly attacked a Russian battery in flank and reverse, silenced several of its guns, and thus rendered the greatest service to my heavy brigade. It is next said—

" He had the whole of the cavalry at his disposal ; he mentions having brought up only two regiments in support."

It is true that in my letter of the 30th of November, I only mentioned two regiments ; but it is equally true that the whole of the five regiments were brought up at proper intervals, and I am inclined to think that they had all casualties. Lord Raglan may well, after such a lapse of time, have forgotten how the troops were employed, but from his position he must have known it at the time. The letter proceeds—

Now I cannot help thinking that I took every precaution in my power, and I should like to know what precautions Lord Raglan expected of me which I did not take. And it is added, "from want of due consideration." It must, I think, my Lords, be very evident that I did not jump into this business, but that, on the contrary, I gave it the fullest consideration. Then it is stated that I acted on the supposition that the enemy were not in such numbers as they really were. Now, my Lords, considering that I had been in the field since six o'clock in the morning, and always, more or less, in the face of the enemy, I should be glad to know why it was supposed that I did not know something of their force. My Lords, I believe I have now answered every charge contained in Lord Raglan's letter. I pledged myself to refute every accusation, I said that I would not leave a word unanswered. I believe I have fully fulfilled the undertaking I gave, have not left two words together, but have torn the letter to rags and tatters.

I must now notice the letter of the Commander in Chief. When I find myself obliged, in my own defence, to mention any communication from such a quarter, I shall not fail to show that respect which I have accorded to my Commander in Chief ever since I became connected with the service. I must premise that the letter placed on the table of your Lordships' House, contains a paragraph more, and not an unimportant one, than the letter originally enclosed to me. This paragraph states—

" It is to be regretted that the lieutenant general, acting upon a misconception of a written order, did not show that order to Lord Cardigan."

Of course, my Lords, if the Commander in Chief pronounces it to be the duty of a lieutenant general to show his orders to his two major generals, however novel such a doctrine is to me, it must be my guide in future. But I certainly never conceived it to be the duty of a divisional general to do so. And there was no more reason to show the order to Lord Cardigan, than to General Scarlett, because it was not intended to be an operation of one, but of both brigades ; and for which reason I placed myself in the rear of the one, and in advance of the other. I cannot understand how it could be possibly my duty to discuss an order with one of my major generals, unless it was to throw upon another a responsibility which ought solely to attach to myself. The noble Viscount proceeds—

"And that influenced by the authoritative tone and disrespectful manner of the aide-de-camp, he did not decide upon his own judgment."

With the greatest respect, I ask the Commander in Chief why he supposes that I allowed myself to be influenced in any way, except by a sense of duty, in carrying out the orders I received? I do not know where the noble Viscount has been informed, but I ask the noble Viscount to tell me how I showed myself to be influenced by the tone or conduct of the aide-de-camp? I altogether deny that I was influenced by anything said or done by that aide-de-camp. I was influenced by a sense of duty which imposed upon me the necessity of carrying out what I considered to be an imperative order; and, therefore, I say to impute to me that I allowed my feelings or temper to influence my conduct is not doing me justice. The letter proceeds—

"Supported by the concurrence of his major general, that the charge ought not to be made."

I deny that it was necessary to ask the concurrence of anybody, or that a divisional general should consult with his brigadier. I consider a lieutenant general to be unfit to be at the head of a division if he does not feel himself fully qualified and fully able to carry out the instructions of his Commander in Chief. I never could conceive it to be the duty of a divisional general to consult with his brigadier, and I should most reluctantly adopt such a course. I have since my return heard strange things in the way of private criticism. I have been told, "you should have had moral courage enough to disobey your general." I say to you, my Lords, I had not the moral courage to show myself insubordinate, and to hold my opinion as superior to, and overruling that of the Commander in Chief. Then I have been told, it is asked why I did not head the light cavalry charge? Because, had I done so, I could not have commanded the cavalry division. It seems to be imagined that I was unexposed in the affair. All I can say is, that my aide-de-camp was killed, I was myself wounded, my horse was hit by two balls, another staff officer had his forage cap shot off his head, and another had a ball in his horse. Of five, four were either hit themselves or their horses.

The reason of my recall is stated by the late Minister of War to have been, that I placed myself towards my general in a position which made it most advisable that I should be recalled. I could only have placed myself in that position by my letter of the 30th of November. To the noble Duke that letter must latterly have appeared to have been very uncourteous and insubordinate. Perhaps the noble Duke did not always think it so. Perhaps at one time he thought it calm and temperate. If he did, I believe he only entertained what is at the present moment the universal opinion; and it is on account of that letter so considered, and so universally approved of, that I am, ostensibly at least, recalled from my command.

It has been thought that I had had a quarrel with Lord Raglan, when, in fact, I never had a word of difference with his Lordship. Lord Raglan never found fault with a single act of mine, or said that I could do anything better. Subsequently to my letter, he very kindly appointed officers to my staff at my nomination. I have not only been in communication with Lord Raglan in respect to my division, but on subjects quite foreign to my command, such as transport, ambulance, and other matters.

And I therefore think, that when the noble Duke conceived it to be expedient, or necessary to recall me from my command in consequence of any supposed bad feeling between Lord Raglan and myself, the noble Duke acted under a misconception.

Your Lordships will, I think, be surprised that this recall, unexpected as it was by me, came as unexpectedly on Lord Raglan. I have been assured that his Lordship has said that he never recommended it, that he could not account for it, and that he knew nothing about it. My authority is General Estcourt. He told me, when I was putting my foot on board the ship to come to England, that Lord Raglan was quite as much astonished as myself; for although he did not deny that he had made observations in support of his report; he had said or done nothing to occasion what had happened, and it was altogether unexpected by him.

Your Lordships should be told how I obtained my command. So soon as I heard that troops would be embarked for active service in the East, I did, as I have done before, I wrote to the Commander in Chief, and offered my services. Not expecting much cavalry to be sent, I asked the Commander in Chief to appoint me to the command of a brigade of infantry, and stated that, having been in that branch of the service, I believed myself to be qualified ; and that having served a campaign in Bulgaria, and being accustomed to foreign armies, and to live with foreign officers, I thought my services might be acceptable and useful. The noble Viscount, in the kindest manner, and, as I believed, of his own accord (for which I have always felt that I owed him personal obligation) wrote to say that the Government having decided upon sending out a division of cavalry, he offered me the command of it. I very soon embarked, and I arrived in the East, previously to the arrival of any part of my division. Unlike many of my brother officers, I was blest with continued good health, and the consequence was, that from the time the cavalry landed, till the noble Duke so summarily recalled me, I was never absent one hour, one moment from my duties, and I believe I am not overstating it, when I say, that there was no divisional general in that army who studied the care and welfare of his division, and exerted himself more incessantly for those objects than I did.

If I can say that I was always at my post, and always zealous in the discharge of my duties, I can also say that I have not been altogether an unsuccessful general. During the time that I was at the head of the cavalry, our piquets and outposts were never surprised ; the flanks and rear of our army were never disturbed by the enemy's cavalry ; nor was our baggage, nor were our communications inconvenienced by attacks from the Cossacks. I assert boldly, that on every occasion all was done by the cavalry under my command that my orders justified and that my small numbers rendered possible ; and I had the good fortune to command and carry out all the details of the heavy dragoon charge. I cannot, therefore, be told that I have proved myself an unsuccessful general. What did Sir Colin Campbell—in concert with whom, as I have already said, I had been serving for four months—say to me :—"I shall always remember this : that whilst others have been croaking, grumbling, and dissatisfied, you have always laughed at every difficulty." This observation, my Lords, coming from a soldier like Sir Colin Campbell, is very flattering. I know, also, that the adjutant general of the army has said—"When they recall that officer they recall the man who, when others were skulking and running away, has never once flinched from his duty, but was always at his post."

It is contended by some that I need not have obeyed this order, that I ought to have had moral courage enough to have disobeyed it. Is this the opinion of military men, and of the highest authorities in the Crimea—English or French ? I say, it is not ; but that the order was imperative and absolute, leaving me no choice whatever how to act. There was not a commanding officer of the ten regiments of my division who did not consider the order one necessary to be obeyed. It is generally admitted that, had I disobeyed this order, I should for ever have been held responsible for the loss of the guns, which it was erroneously imagined were being removed. That such would have been the censure thrown upon me, that I could not have shown myself to my division ; that my existence would have become intolerable, and I must have destroyed myself. These are the opinions of every officer in the army whose opinion is worth having. I have been giving you, my Lords, the opinions of living officers ; I will now give you the opinion of an officer who, unfortunately for the army and for the country, is now lost to us. I mean Sir George Cathcart. I will read your Lordships his opinion of that cavalry charge, and of my conduct in respect to it.

It is well to observe that I never saw Sir George Cathcart from the time that the army reached Balaklava until his death. This is a letter which Sir George Cathcart never could have anticipated that I should see. I only became informed of its existence by accident. It was written to Lady Cathcart by her husband, and taken from his body after he fell ; and the bullet which killed him had passed through this letter. It was written on the 2nd of November, three days before the battle of Inkerman, and eight after that of Balaklava. The extract to which I wish to call your Lordships' attention says—

"I have another opportunity of writing to you. You will read about the affair at Balaklava, in which the light cavalry brigade suffered so severely. It was a most gallant but unfortunate affair. Neither Lord Lucan nor Lord Cardigan were to blame, but on the contrary, for they obeyed orders. But those who gave the orders are much to blame for ordering the impossible. I was sent for with my division to set matters to rights, and did so as soon as we could arrive, but we had six miles to march."

Without wishing, my Lords, de me faire trop valoir, I may, I believe, say, that so long as I held the command of the cavalry division I discharged my duty. I have, however, been summarily recalled, and in a way, and in language not to allow me to console myself with the idea that my recall was a fair exercise of the prerogative, but that it was a recall in disgrace. In the noble Duke's letters he does not allow himself to say one word in palliation of the recall. I defy your Lordships to put your fingers upon one sentence in the letter containing a word of comfort. You might have endeavoured to have softened this recall (to the Duke of Newcastle), but you were afraid to offer one word of consolation.

My Lords, with such letters of recall, and under the circumstances in which I unhappily find myself, it is impossible but that I should consider myself recalled in disgrace. I have positively felt my position to be such, that I have not been able to allow myself the honour and satisfaction of waiting upon the Queen at a levee, fearing that my presence might be embarrassing to Her Majesty, and I cannot be insensible, that whilst every officer of any rank, on his return from the Crimea, has been specially honoured by Her Majesty, I have been considered, and, in my opinion, most naturally so considered, as, under the circumstances, unfitted for such an honour.

I fear, my Lords, I have troubled your Lordships at too great length, but I felt, to do myself justice, that I could not compress more what I had to state. Before I conclude, to the Government I say: You have wronged, grievously wronged, as zealous a soldier as Her Majesty has in the army. If my statement has, as I cannot doubt it has, made any impression on you, give it your attention; and if you are in any way doubtful that you have done an injustice, I ask you this, and no more: reconsider my case, and give me a court-martial and a fair trial.

The noble Earl concluded by moving—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, for a Copy of the Report of Field Marshal Lord Raglan of the Action of Balaklava, and also a Copy of the Report of Lieutenant General the Earl of Lucan to Field Marshal Lord Raglan of that Action."

THE EARL OF CARDIGAN: My Lords, I regret that I feel myself called upon to address your Lordships on this occasion, because I came down with the firm determination and wish not to mix myself up in this question; and I deeply regret that I should be called upon to make any remark, or to take any part in the proceedings. My Lords, I only rise to correct a statement made with respect to myself. When the noble Earl, in his address, said that I sent my aide-de-camp to the lieutenant general, to state that the force of the enemy was so numerous in the front of the Light Brigade that I felt it difficult to hold my ground—["No!"]—yes, those were his very words, I sent no such message whatever. In the message I sent I said, that as I perceived a movement was going to be made, I begged to point out that the hills on both sides of the valley leading down to the valley at right angles with it, in which was the Russian battery, with the cavalry behind it,—that these hills were occupied by Russian riflemen and artillery. I sent this message; and when the lieutenant general came in front and ordered me to attack the battery in the valley, behind which was placed the large force of Russian cavalry—which had been perfectly perceptible to myself and to the whole of the Light Brigade for at least twenty minutes—my reply was, "Certainly, Sir; but before I go I must be allowed to point out that the hills on both sides of the valley leading to the battery are covered with Russian artillery and riflemen." The answer I received was, "I cannot help that, they are Lord Raglan's positive orders." I immediately obeyed orders; and so true was the report I had made with regard to the Russian artillery and riflemen that we had not advanced twenty yards before Captain Nolan, who was galloping about in front at about the distance of 100 yards from the Light Brigade, and in no way leading the charge, was killed by a shell from one of those flank batteries which I had pointed out. I have nothing further to say. I only wished to remove any misconception as to my having said that the Light Brigade was not safe in the position in which they were placed.

LOD PANMURE: I am sure your Lordships will agree with me in thinking that a more painful discussion than the present has never been brought before this House, and that you have never seen a gallant officer, whose courage, be it remarked, has never been accused, placed in such a position as that in which we have witnessed the noble and gallant Earl placed to-night. The noble and gallant Earl has gone into detail as to his services in the East, and has given the history of certain great and gallant actions in which he was engaged with great minuteness, which may have been extremely interesting, but, at the same time, your Lordships will perceive this is a subject into which it is impossible for me, or for any Minister, to follow him; it is a subject upon which I cannot presume to have an opinion. I must say I am somewhat surprised at the course which the noble Earl has taken, not only in making statements which it is impossible for me to contradict or even in any way to modify, but also in making statements impugning the discretionary power of his Commander in Chief, and the orders and counter-orders given to him upon that eventful day in the valley of Balaklava. No one can regret more deeply than I do the issue of what has been called the "misconception" of an order by the noble and gallant Earl. The disastrous effects which attended that misconception were lamented throughout the length and breadth of England; but I cannot say that the charge of the Light Cavalry, which will never be effaced from the history of the British army, was altogether vain, because it has carried into the heart of the enemy a terror of the British cavalry that I am quite convinced will be of great and good service upon future occasions, for the very appearance of those squadrons in some future well-fought field may perhaps put to flight the squadrons of Russia even without the necessity of a collision. I had anticipated that the noble and gallant Earl—for gallant I admit him to be in every sense of the word—would have dwelt upon that part of his case upon which he has on former occasions laid so much stress—namely, his demand for inquiry at the hands of a court-martial. But the noble and gallant Earl has simply referred to that point in the latter part of his speech; he has contented himself with a vindication of his military conduct, and with laying before your Lordships what he terms the injustice of the report to which he has referred; but he has altogether omitted to touch upon any of the doubts which I am sure must have arisen in his mind as to the legality of his claim to a court-martial and the expediency and propriety of granting such an inquiry. With reference to the recall of the noble and gallant Earl, I have simply to refer to the statement in your Lordships' hands. He states that it might have been more courteously worded, and expressed with more deference to his feelings as a soldier; but I refer you to the document itself, and I think it sufficiently sets forth that that recall was in no way connected with any doubt as to the gallantry of his conduct in the field. Differences had arisen between the noble and gallant Earl and his Commander in Chief with regard to the term used by the Commander in Chief in the despatch wherein he attributes the unfortunate result of the cavalry charge to a misconception of his orders by the noble and gallant Earl; and it was quite evident to Her Majesty's Government that, although personal civilities and courtesies might have continued, the confidence which ought to exist between the Commander in Chief and an officer commanding a division in his army had, to a certain extent, been shaken. It therefore appeared to the Government and to my noble Friend the Commander of the army—and I entirely coincide in that opinion—that it was for the benefit of the public service and for the advantage of the army itself that one or other of those officers should be recalled, and, with all deference, I think your Lordships will agree that the Lieutenant General commanding the cavalry was the person to whom the recall ought to have been directed. The noble and gallant Earl says that he is entitled to a military inquiry into his conduct upon this eventful occasion. Now, if this had been a question confined to the noble and gallant Earl, there might have been less difficulty in coming to a decision upon it; but your Lordships will perceive that in this, as in all other military matters, a precedent set in the case of the noble and gallant Earl must be followed throughout the army—what is law for him must also be law for the meanest private; and the question arises whether there are grounds in the complaint of the noble and gallant Earl which would justify him in calling for inquiry, any more than a man in the ranks who may have been censured by his superior officer, and who would claim a right to have that censure revised by a military court. There is no law which can guide this case, except that law by which all armies are governed—either the Mutiny Act, or the Articles of War, or the custom of war. I have looked with care into the Mutiny Act and the Articles of War—I have reviewed under the most competent advice all the customs of war in cases similar to the present, and I cannot find in the one or in the other any ground whatever for granting the inquiry before a military court which the noble and gallant Earl has demanded. There are cases under the Mutiny Act in which a soldier has an option of being tried by a court-martial or of submitting to certain punishments, such as forfeiture of pay or imprisonment; but these cases are specifically laid down in the Act of Parliament, and they are specifically recorded in the Articles of War for the information of the soldier, and among none of them can the case of the noble and gallant Earl be ranked. But it may be said that the peculiar circumstances of this case ought to make it an exception to the general rule. I cannot see any ground for their so doing. And here let me draw a distinction with respect to a word which has been frequently used by the noble and gallant Earl. He says that certain charges have been brought against him by Lord Raglan in his despatch. Now, no charge, in the technical sense of the word, has been brought against him, and I will presently show your Lordships that, in the technical meaning of the phrase, no charge could be brought against him by Lord Raglan. His conduct has been described by Lord Raglan as a misconception of orders which led to unfortunate results. Has not such conduct as that been attributed to officers and general officers in former days over and over again? During the Peninsular campaign did the Duke of Wellington never say that, owing to the misconception of one order, or the non-fulfilment of another order by officers, certain great operations had miscarried? And did the Duke of Wellington ever dream of bringing those officers to a court-martial for such errors, or did those officers ever demand a court-martial in consequence of such observations having been made in his despatches by the Commander in Chief? If you are to recognise the right of every officer to be tried by a court-martial who may make the claim on the ground of his feelings having been injured by remarks made by his superior officer, there would be an end at once to all discipline in the army, to all the power of the Commander in Chief, and to all his control over his troops. But suppose we were to recognise the right of the noble and gallant Earl to an inquiry, by whom are the charges against him to be framed? Are they to be framed by Lord Raglan himself? [The Earl of LUCAN: Hear!] The noble Lord who expresses his assent, knows little or nothing of military law—["Hear!"]—if the noble Earl (the Earl of Lucan) assents to that proposition he knows little or nothing of military law, or he would be perfectly aware that the first maxim of military law is, that any officer or soldier who shall have been guilty of any crime for which he may be brought to a court-martial, if he shall have been employed upon any duty before the court-martial takes place, such employment absolves him from the crime he has committed. The person who would have had to frame the charges against him has condoned his offence, and could not, therefore, proceed to make those charges against the individual whom he had so employed. While I admit that the noble and gallant Earl is competent to perform gallant and glorious actions in the field, I will not yield to him in the technicalities of military law, and I think he will find that I am putting a proper interpretation upon them. If then, my Lords, Lord Raglan cannot frame these charges, is the Judge Advocate General to frame them? If I am right I believe that that learned functionary, had he been ordered to frame them, would have said, at the very outset, "These charges will never hold water. The crime or act has been condoned by the general officer in command of the army. It is impossible, in such a case, that the sentence of the court-martial could be confirmed, or that the carrying out of any such sentence could be recommended." Upon these grounds, therefore, I say that even if it were expedient, it would be impossible to grant a court-martial in this case. But I rest the whole facts of the case with regard to a court-martial upon the question of discipline. I resisted the demand of the noble and gallant Earl on the question of discipline from the very beginning, for I believe that to grant a military inquiry in this case would be to strike at the root of the whole discipline of the army. My Lords, let us look at what happened last year. A military Commission sat upon the promotion of officers in the army. What can be so great an offence in the eyes of an officer as to see himself passed over in a promotion? That military Commission, however, recommended that promotions for merit should be made by selection, and that officers of noted and general merit should be promoted out of their turns, and over the heads of other officers who were their seniors. This, too, was to be done without any other reason being given than the merit of the individual officers promoted. Now, if all the officers over whose heads other officers were promoted for merit were to complain of being passed over, and were to claim an inquiry into their merit as compared with those promoted out of their turns, I apprehend that it would be impossible to carry out the recommendations of the Commission. I think that the more your Lordships look into the present case the more you will be convinced that, without imputing to the noble Earl anything whatever that could touch his reputation as a soldier, either in point of courage in person, or of conduct in the field, or upon any other matter except on those points of misunderstanding which have arisen between him and Lord Raglan, the Government could not have adopted any other course than that of recalling the noble and gallant Earl from his command in the Crimea; and that they can, without casting any reflection on the noble Earl, refuse the inquiry for which he asks. I am afraid I can hold out to the noble Earl no expectation of our reconsidering the determination to which we have arrived: and I am afraid I can give no answer to the ex parte statement which he has made of the events which have attended the campaign in which he has been engaged. I only hope and trust, after the appeal which the noble and gallant Earl has addressed to your Lordships—after the opportunity which your Lordships have kindly given him of stating, in his own vindication, all the acts of his public career—that here this unfortunate and unhappy controversy will rest; and I do hope that when this ex parte statement of the noble and gallant Earl goes forth to the Crimea, it will not add to the anxieties of the gallant general to whom we are all so deeply indebted for the exertions he is making for his country in the field of battle, nor render the position he occupies still more painful than it must have been from all that has passed in this country during the last few months.

VISCOOUNT HARDINGE: As the noble and gallant Earl alluded to me in the latter part of his address, I trust your Lordships will allow me a few words in explanation. I may say, first of all, that I perfectly concur in the remark of my noble Friend behind me, the Minister of War, that the statements which we have heard from the noble and gallant Earl must be considered to have been made ex parte, inasmuch as we have heard from the noble Earl an account of conversations which have passed between himself, General Airey, Lord Burghersh, and Lord Raglan. It is perfectly impossible for me, or for any other Peer in this House, to be able to answer on the instant such statements as the noble and gallant Earl has made to the House. I have the highest confidence in the honour and integrity of my noble Friend (Lord Raglan), and I should be the last person to believe that my noble and gallant Friend (the Earl of Lucan) would wilfully misrepresent anything that has occurred. I am, therefore, placed in this painful position, that I am called upon to hear the explanation of the noble Earl of what has passed between him and Lord Raglan and General Airey; while at the same time it is impossible for me to suppose that Lord Raglan, upon those terms of friendship which the noble and gallant Earl has represented, could have sat down to pen such a despatch as that of the 16th of December, in which he states, respecting the noble Earl—

"I have referred to my despatch, and, far from being willing to alter one word of it, I am prepared to declare that not only did the lieutenant general misconceive the written instruction that was sent him, but that there was nothing in that instruction which called on him to attack at all hazards, or to undertake the operation which led to such a brilliant display of gallantry on the part of the Light Brigade, and, unhappily, at the same time, occasioned such lamentable casualties in every regiment composing it."

The despatch goes on in the same strain to state very minutely what the impressions of the noble Lord were. Lord Raglan says that—

"The noble Earl was so little informed of the position of the enemy that he asked Captain Nolan, 'where and what he was to attack, as neither enemy nor guns were in sight. This, your Grace will observe, is the lieutenant general's own admission.'

The noble and gallant Earl has stated in his explanation, that he obeyed the orders of Captain Nolan; but it was his duty to have obeyed the written order of Lord Raglan, and to have paid no attention to what Captain Nolan said. There can be no doubt from the following passage that Lord Raglan considered his order discretionary, and not imperative. Lord Raglan writes—and I believe it is an important point for the consideration of your Lordships—be it observed, was not made use of in General Airey's note) an unknown enemy, whose position, numbers, and composition he was wholly unacquainted with, and whom, in consequence of a previous order, he had taken no steps whatever to watch. I undoubtedly had no intention that he should make such an attack—there was nothing in the instruction to require it—and therefore I conceive I was fully justified in stating to your Grace what was the exact truth—that the charge arose from the misconception of an order for the advance, which Lord Lucan considered obliged him to attack at all hazards."

I trust your Lordships will pay particular attention to the words of this despatch, which was written some time after he had received the letter of the noble and gallant Earl. Is it likely that a man of the strict honour and veracity of Lord Raglan would have persisted in stating in such strong and unmistakable terms, that he never meant his order to be considered as an imperative order of attack, if the fact were not so? I am, therefore, of opinion that Lord Raglan is speaking the exact truth, and that he never meant that an attack should be made at all hazards. On the contrary, I have every reason to believe that he meant to place a discretionary power in the hands of the noble and gallant Earl. He says—

"I entertain no wish to disparage the Earl of Lucan in your opinion, or to cast a slur upon his professional reputation, but, having been accused by his Lordship of having stated of him what was unmerited in my despatch, I have felt obliged to enter into the subject, and trouble your Grace at more length than I could have wished in vindication of a report to your Grace in which I had strictly confined myself to that which I knew to be true. I had indulged in no observations whatever, or in any expressions which could be viewed either as harsh or in any way grating to the feelings of his Lordship."

I cannot say that I have read the private correspondence of Lord Raglan, either to the noble Duke (the Duke of Newcastle) or to my noble Friend behind me (Lord Panmure), but this I can say, that, in all the correspondence of Lord Raglan which I have seen, upon no occasion has my noble Friend indulged in a single reflection in which the credit or honour of the noble and gallant Earl has been called in question. Now, what is the statement of the noble and gallant Earl? He says—

"After carefully reading this order, I hesitated and urged the uselessness of such an attack, and the dangers attending it. The aide-de-camp, in a most authoritative tone, stated that they were Lord Raglan's orders that the cavalry should attack immediately. I asked him 'where and what to do?' as neither enemy nor guns were within sight. He replied, in a most disrespectful but significant manner, pointing to the further end of the valley, 'There, my Lord, is your enemy; there are your guns.'

The noble Earl then says that he decided against his own conviction, he being a lieutenant general, upon making the attack, and he observes—

"I did all in my power to make it as little perilous as possible."

He then goes on to say—

"I considered at the time—I am still of the same opinion—that I followed the only course open to me. As a lieutenant general, doubtless, I have discretionary power; but to take upon myself to disobey an order written by my Commander in Chief, within a few minutes of its delivery, and given from an elevated position commanding an entire view of all the batteries and the position of the enemy, would have been nothing less than direct disobedience of orders, without any other reason than that I preferred my own opinion to that of my general, and, in this instance, must have exposed me and the cavalry to aspersions against which it might have been difficult to defend ourselves."

Surely, when the noble Earl talks of possible aspersions, it shows that his decision to attack was taken, not upon any impression which he had of Lord Raglan's order, but upon the fear which he entertained of aspersions from his officers and soldiers. He then goes on—

The noble Earl also referred to my letter, in which I state :—

"It is to be regretted that the lieutenant general, acting upon a misconception of a written order, did not show that order to Lord Cardigan, and that, influenced by the authoritative tone and disrespectful manner of the aide-de-camp, he did not decide upon his own judgment, supported by the concurrence of his major general, that the charge ought not to be made."

Surely, my Lords, I am justified in making that assertion, because at the time the letter was written I had seen Lord Cardigan, and had his opinion, and not only did he think the charge ought not to have been made—that it was useless and worse than useless—but that he had never read the order, that he had never been consulted, and when two men of the same age and of the same rank—[The Earl of LUCAN: No, not the same rank]—or nearly the same rank—I do not wish to hurt the feelings of the noble Earl with respect to his rank, but both are in the Army List as major generals; and when I asked Lord Cardigan, "If you had received an order written by Lord Raglan, and signed by General Airey, should you not, before you made the attack, have considered you had discretion to send it to Lord Lucan," he answered, that he considered the order left the lieutenant general full discretion, and that he thought it the duty of an officer in command not to obey implicitly, on such an occasion as that, an order which would imperil his men, but to exercise his discretion. I must say that I think on all occasions a cavalry officer has a right to exercise his discretion much more than an officer of infantry, because cavalry have from the rapidity of their movements far more opportunities of making efforts and changing the disposition of their force as the occasion may suddenly arise. Under those circumstances, I conceive that the noble Earl had a perfect right, considering the wording of the order, to exercise his discretion upon it. That is my opinion, and I take it that it would be that of any man who saw the terms used by Lord Raglan in the despatch which the noble Earl has contravened. I do not mean to say the noble Earl may not be right in the disposition of his troops. I will not enter into a discussion upon that; but I say that the whole statement of the noble Earl is ex parte as far as it goes; and although I do not blame the noble Earl for anything that has been said, either in the course of this debate, or upon any former occasion, I say that, from the tone of Lord Raglan's despatch, there appeared to be a difference of opinion between him and the Earl of Lucan, upon professional grounds, so strong that it would not be advisable for them to continue in the same position, because they would not act well together. I was asked my opinion, and I said that it was not advisable that a commander in chief and an officer so high in rank as a lieutenant general commanding a division, should be upon such terms, and therefore I gave my advice to my noble Friend behind me (the Duke of Newcastle), who acted accordingly. I can only say, my Lords, with regard to the general merits of the question, I should be extremely happy if the noble Earl could have a court-martial by which his conduct might be examined; but I am bound to observe that, in the records of the army, there is no instance in which an officer in the position of the noble Earl has claimed a court-martial. I believe he cannot do so on legal grounds; as to doing so as a matter of favour, it is equally impossible on that ground. When the lieutenant general arrived in this country it was my duty to consult the Judge Advocate General, and the strongest opinion was given by that officer that it was impossible that the noble Earl could claim a court-martial; first, for the reason given by my noble Friend behind, that the acts which he was supposed to have committed were overlooked at the time; and, secondly, because it was impossible to frame any charge against the noble Earl. My noble Friend took the objection that the noble Earl had served since. I recollect the case of a soldier in the 40th Regiment, in the Peninsula; he was about to be punished, but while under sentence was allowed to go into action, and was afterwards, having performed his duty and been exposed to danger, most severely punished. Upon that occasion the officer was brought to a court-martial and cashiered, the charge against him being that he had, contrary to the Mutiny Act, used the services of a man and afterwards punished him for an offence committed before such service was rendered. I therefore concur with the Judge Advocate general that the subsequent services of the noble Earl would disqualify him from having his conduct investigated by a court-martial, and I do not believe there is any precedent for it. At the same time, I must say that, personally, I, for one, greatly lament the step taken of recalling the noble Earl, the more especially as I had a material part in recommending him to Her Majesty's Government for the appointment; but I believe Lord Raglan is perfectly incapable of making a statement in such strong terms as that which has been alluded to unless he believed every word of it.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: I think your Lordships will concur with me in expressing great regret that the noble and gallant Earl should have brought this subject before the House. No doubt it is natural for my noble Friend to wish to stand well before the people of England, but I submit that my noble Friend ought not, because he is a peer, to be in a position to demand that which would not be granted to any one else. If your Lordships in this House interfere with the discipline of the army, there are men sitting not very far from you who will follow your example, and the consequence will be, the army will be placed under democratic power. My Lords, I am not going into the discussion of those points which have already been touched upon, but I regret to hear particular acts, accusations, and private conversations brought forward in this House. I think my noble Friend ought not to have lent the weight of his high character to the attacks which have been so unjustly made upon Lord Raglan—the man who landed the British army in the Crimea, who stormed the heights of Alma, who fought the battles of Balaklava and Inkermann, and who has done, more than any other man, that for which every other man in this country who wishes for peace must feel deeply grateful—he has promoted and cemented more than any other man the firm alliance and brotherly feeling which is reciprocated between this country and our brave and gallant ally. My Lords, I know that my noble Friend did not wish to attack Lord Raglan, and no doubt he did not wish to attack Colonel Estcourt or Colonel Airey—officers with whom I have no personal acquaintance—but, I ask is it right or is it just to allow these men to be lowered in the opinion of the army by detailing those conversations? My noble Friend, with respect to Colonel Airey, said he began in a sort of threatening tone, and then assumed a more diplomatic manner. I say that telling such things is not the way to teach the officers or the men of the British army their duty, but it is the way to teach them to look down on men holding high and responsible situations. I go not into the question as to whether or not my noble Friend misunderstood the order. He appealed to me, and, reading from the Queen's regulations, asked whether an officer is not bound to obey the order of an aide-de-camp? No man can doubt for a moment that he is so bound to obey it, but I can tell my noble Friend what a most gallant general officer did in the Peninsular war—Major General Crawford, who commanded the Light Division. One of the aides-de-camp, who brought him a written order, behaved pretty much as I am afraid this officer did to the noble Earl—gave him his advice when to attack and where to attack. General Crawford's answer was,—“When General Crawford asks the opinion of Colonel A., he will have the goodness to give it, but not till then.” Now, that is the way in which I should have acted in this instance. My noble Friend says that he received a further order from Captain Nolan, besides the written order. Now, if that is the case—if my noble Friend acted upon the verbal order—what, in Heaven's name, was the use of sending the written order at all? The written order ought to have been the one attended to, and my noble Friend ought to have disregarded what the aide-de-camp said. Captain Nolan was no doubt a very brave and gallant officer, and it is far from my intention to say anything against him, but he was a man, who had written a book upon the capabilities of cavalry, which contained the most fantastic notions as to cavalry being always able to destroy formed infantry; and it was not to be supposed that he would shrink from the opportunity of proving them to be true. If I had been in the position of the noble and gallant Earl I should have said to that gentleman immediately, “When I ask for your advice, give it to me; in the meantime, go back to your general and report.” As my noble Friend has appealed to me, I have no hesitation in saying, as far as I can understand the matter, I should have looked to the written order, and that in advancing the cavalry I should not have read that order as he did, as an order to attack at all hazards.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I should not have risen to address your Lordships on this occasion, but for the purpose of expressing a hope which I am sure is shared by many of your Lordships, that after this, in many respects painful, though perhaps unavoidable debate, we may be spared the continuance, or, at all events, a repetition of it. I am not at all prepared to say that there may not be, as the noble Lords the Minister for War and the Commander in Chief have stated, that there are legal and technical, as well as substantial difficulties arising out of the exigencies of the public service, which might render it impossible, or, at all events, inexpedient to grant the court-martial or the military inquiry for which my noble and gallant Friend asks. But, then, I cannot refrain from saying that if it were impossible so to grant that inquiry—if it were impossible to afford to my noble and gallant Friend an opportunity of vindicating himself from the charges (I do not use the term in the technical sense) made against him, and from the imputations cast on his professional character, and which seriously affect him in the opinion of the army—perhaps of his Sovereign—and in the opinion of the country at large—if it were impossible to do this, then, I think, it was most unfortunate that that second letter of Lord Raglan, containing these serious charges and imputations, was ever placed officially by a Minister of the Crown in the hands of your

Lordships, as indicating the reasons of my noble and gallant Friend's recall. If my noble and gallant Friend had merely complained of the expression as to his misconception of these orders, and if he had appealed to a Minister of the Crown for a court-martial, or an inquiry of any description, to investigate whether, in point of fact, he had misconceived those instructions or not, I should then say that my noble and gallant Friend, however hard his case might be, had no ground to stand upon. But when an officer high in command finds himself charged by his superior with the heavy crime of disobeying a positive order, and finds that that charge is officially declared by the Minister to be the reason why he is recalled and brought back to this country—I will not say in disgrace, but with his professional character to a certain degree affected—then I say that his case is one of extreme hardship; and it is one as to which I am quite sure every man in this House, military or non-military, must deeply sympathise with my noble and gallant Friend. Upon one point I differ from my noble and gallant Friend the noble Duke behind me (the Duke of Richmond). I cannot blame my noble and gallant Friend for that, having urged, entreated, and besought for some means of vindicating his professional character before that which no doubt would be the fittest tribunal to investigate such a question—namely, a tribunal composed of military officers—he should have availed himself of his seat in this House to make that plain, straightforward, unvarnished, manly statement which your Lordships have heard to-night. I am not about to depart from the wish I expressed in the outset, and to set the example of neglecting the suggestion I then threw out, by entering upon any discussion as to the merits of the question, or the degree of responsibility resting on my noble and gallant Friend from the first or second order received by him. I must, however, be permitted to say that my noble and gallant Friend appears to me to have been placed in a most unfortunate dilemma, and I do not see what possible exercise of discretion, what possible judgment or knowledge of his profession could have saved him from one of the horns of that dilemma. The noble Viscount the Commander in Chief (Viscount Hardinge) has insisted a good deal upon this point—that, holding the high position of lieutenant general in the army, it was the duty of my noble and gallant Friend to exercise a large discretion with regard to the order he had received, more especially as it concerned an advance of cavalry. Now, my noble and gallant Friend upon a previous occasion, when he received the first order to advance the cavalry and occupy the heights, did exercise a discretion so far as regarded the extent to which he should advance the force under his command; and then we find in a subsequent letter of Lord Raglan, that upon the fact of his having so exercised his discretion is founded a charge of disobedience to a positive order. In the second instance, my noble and gallant Friend, receiving (in consequence, as Lord Raglan says, of his having disobeyed the first order) a peremptory command from Lord Raglan, naturally conceives that no discretion is left to him, and executes that peremptory order, upon which he is told that he ought, as lieutenant general, to have exercised discretion, and to have disobeyed the order, although it was brought by Lord Raglan's own aide-de-camp. Now, I will not say whether my noble and gallant Friend was justified in the whole course he took upon the one occasion or the other; but I will ask, with the charge hanging over him of having unduly exercised his discretion in the first instance and of not obeying his orders, what would have been said of him if he had abstained from obeying a second order addressed to him consequent upon his non-compliance with the first order, and had again acted according to his discretion? I do not wish to say a single word which may be considered as disrespectful to Lord Raglan, or to express any opinion with respect to matters which seem to require a judgment peculiarly military; but it does appear to me that my noble and gallant Friend, by the opposite charges made against him, has been placed in a position of extraordinary difficulty; and, although there may be one man in 10,000—certainly not more—who would venture to incur the moral responsibility of such a double disobedience of orders, I think it cannot be made a charge against my noble and gallant Friend, that he conceived himself bound by such positive orders to take a certain course marked out, even though he might not think that course a judicious one. I may be permitted also to say, with regard to the responsibility attaching to my noble and gallant Friend as lieutenant general, that, on the one hand, he is charged with not having assumed a proper degree of responsibility, and, on the other hand, the noble Viscount the Commander in chief says, my noble and gallant Friend ought to have consulted with the Earl of Cardigan as major general, because they were nearly of the same rank—forgetting that my noble and gallant Friend had the local rank of lieutenant general, commanding the division, and that Lord Cardigan, as well as Major General Scarlett, were major generals of brigades, acting under the orders, and, consequently, not approaching to the rank, of my noble and gallant Friend. I beg your Lordships' pardon for having gone so far into the question as I have gone; but I will repeat my hope that, after the defence of his conduct made by the noble and gallant Earl this evening—after a statement entered into by him which I am sure must have gone straight to the heart and the feelings of every man among your Lordships, as I think it will throughout the country generally—this will be the last occasion on which we shall hear in this House discussions upon questions which undoubtedly, if habitually brought before this House, cannot but give rise to much serious inconvenience. My noble and gallant Friend will have the satisfaction of knowing that, at all events, he has had the opportunity of making his own defence, clear and unequivocal as that statement was, before your Lordships and the country; and whatever opinions may be formed as to the responsibility attaching to him—if there be any responsibility—with regard to that brilliant but unfortunate charge of the Light Cavalry at Balaklava, he need be under no apprehension that his countrymen are likely to forget the important military services rendered by him or are likely to forget that on that day he had the merit of ordering another almost equally brilliant and more successful charge of the Heavy Brigade, under the command of my old and valued Friend Brigadier General Scarlett—a charge which covered with glory the troops engaged in it and which must reflect the utmost credit upon the general who directed it. My noble and gallant Friend has, besides, the satisfaction of knowing that he has come before your Lordships and the country with the full consciousness that he has a good case; that he is anxious to have his conduct investigated in the closest and most searching manner by military and professional men; that if he is deprived of such an inquiry it does not rest at all with him, since he has sought, courted, and entreated the fullest investigation into every part of his conduct; and, satisfied with that knowledge, I trust he will from this time permit the subject to drop in this House, and will throw himself and his character (and I am sure he may safely do so) upon the justice and the good feeling of his countrymen.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE: My Lords, I will not, any more than the noble Earl who has just sat down, enter into the merits of the question between the noble and gallant Earl and Lord Raglan, for I feel strongly that there is no Member of your Lordships' House who is in a position either to confirm or refute the assertions which have been made by the noble and gallant Earl in bringing his case under your consideration. I feel, my Lords, that if I were to attempt to make any vindication of the conduct of the Commander in Chief of the army in the Crimea, I am so imperfectly informed—as all your Lordships necessarily are—with regard to the facts now, for the first time, brought under our notice, that I should find myself most inadequate to the discharge of such a task, without doing injustice to that noble Lord. At the same time, I am bound to say that the noble Earl who has just spoken (the Earl of Derby) has done injustice to Lord Raglan on one point, for I do not understand his Lordship to make any complaint of his first order for the cavalry to advance not having been obeyed by the noble Earl (the Earl of Lucan). All I understand Lord Raglan to say is, that he sent the subsequent order in consequence of seeing that the first had not been obeyed. I will not, however, enter upon that subject; and, as I am not about to discuss the case as between the noble and gallant Earl (the Earl of Lucan) and Lord Raglan, still less will I enter into the question whether or not there should be a court-martial. This point is one with regard to which I feel myself bound to defer to the military authorities, and to the legal authorities conversant with military law. I am bound to accept the decision on this part of the case as stated by my noble Friends near me, and to believe that they have advised the Crown in the course which has been taken on sufficient data—on data, let me add, which have been strengthened by the opinion of the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond). At the same time, my Lords, I cannot help regretting, for the sake of the army, that it is not thought advisable that such a court-martial should be granted, because undoubtedly it will go forth to the public that a general commanding a division, and having a seat in this House, has advantages over every other officer in the army which he ought not to possess. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) has complained that my noble Friend the Secretary of War had furnished to Parliament the letter which contained the imputations against the noble and gallant Earl; and he went on to observe that the publication of that letter entirely changed the position in which he stood. But the noble Earl forgot how that came to pass. It occurred from the circumstance of the noble Earl (the Earl of Lucan) being a Member of this House, and coming down to the House and reading a letter which had been sent to him by Lord Raglan, containing the despatch written by me on the occasion. Undoubtedly when an ex parte statement was laid before the House by the noble and gallant Earl, then, and not till then, did my noble Friend (Lord Panmure), feeling that it gave an unfair advantage against the Commander in Chief in the Crimea, send to the noble and gallant Earl the despatch of Lord Raglan, stating his case, and leaving it to the noble and gallant Earl to produce that letter, if he thought fit, and thus put the House and the public in possession of the whole facts of the case. So far from this being a cause of complaint against my noble Friend, I think he acted in a fair and candid spirit towards the noble and gallant Earl, by enabling him to see what the case was against him before he brought it under the notice of the House, and that he did no more than was required by justice to the noble Earl at the head of the army in the Crimea in subsequently laying his Lordship's letter on the table of the House. I am ready to join the noble Earl opposite in expressing an earnest hope that this discussion may not be drawn into a precedent. I speak with all possible feeling towards the noble and gallant Earl. I sympathise with him, and can truly say I never took a more painful course in my life than in writing that despatch to which he has so often referred; but I cannot help thinking that the interference of this House in such matters is not likely to raise it in repute with the country. The noble and gallant Earl has stated that he did not know whether Lord Raglan had or had not addressed to me some documents of a character different from that which had appeared respecting him. I can relieve his mind of any such suspicion. There are no public documents at the War Office except those that have been produced, and, as regards any private letters sent to me by Lord Raglan, the noble Earl is well aware that in the private letter which Lord Raglan addressed to me giving an account of the battle of Balaklava, he did not refer to him in unfavourable terms, and, on other occasions, when he did refer to him, he has always done so in the kindest possible spirit. The noble and gallant Earl says I at one time considered his letter calm and temperate. I undoubtedly did consider that letter calm and temperate, and I do so still. The noble and gallant Earl has made use of a private opinion which I expressed, and that opinion I have not altered; but did I not, when I expressed that opinion, accompany it by an expression of my belief that it was of such a character that, if it came before the public in any way whatever, it could not fail to be detrimental to the public service, and that on no account ought it to be published? A complaint has been made that the recall of the noble and gallant Earl was not accompanied with any expressions of sympathy. I can only say, that if the noble and gallant Earl's feelings were hurt by the mode of communication, I have to regret that such expressions of sympathy were not employed; but, at the same time, I think it will be admitted that expressions of sympathy in official despatches like these are rather out of place. Opposed as I am to the noble and gallant Earl, I must say that I never felt anything more personally painful to me than the duty of recalling him from the Crimea; but I was compelled to discharge that duty by a sense of what I owed to the service and the country. Though I do not complain of the course which has now been taken by the noble and gallant Earl, I must say I have listened to this discussion with the greatest regret, because I do not believe it is one upon which the House can with propriety enter, and because it cannot in any way conduce to the public interests.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE deprecated the doctrine of the noble Duke (the Duke of Newcastle), that the privilege of the House should not be availed of by noble Lords, when the question at issue was a justification of the personal and professional character of a Member. He thought, on the contrary, it was a great advantage that a Peer should have the opportunity, under such circumstances, of proving himself worthy to sit in that House. So far, therefore, from the noble and gallant Earl being wrong, he (the Earl of Hardwicke) thought he was perfectly right in vindicating his character; for no place was so proper to do so as that House. He (the Earl of Hardwicke) did not understand the sudden squeamishness that had been exhibited on that point. The same course was constantly taken in the other House of Parliament; and the country had just seen a gallant naval officer, who, not being himself in Parliament, had procured a friend to bring his character and conduct under the investigation of the House of Commons. Of course no light cases should be brought before Parliament, but when the case involved the honour and the fitness of a man who held a high command in the fleets or army of the Crown—when the professional character of that man was traduced, and when he was refused vindication elsewhere, then Parliament was the fitting and proper place to appeal to for justice.

THE MARQUESS OF BREADALBANE thought the noble Earl took quite a mistaken view of the privileges of their Lordships' House, which were only given them for useful public purposes. When a Peer became an officer in the army or navy he was as much amenable to military law as the meanest private in that service, and to take advantage of his privilege to bring before that House questions which ought only to be submitted to the military or naval authorities, or to be decided on according to military law and usage, was not, he thought, a use of those privileges which would tend to the public advantage.

THE EARL OF LUCAN: It is not my intention to make any reply upon the general question; but I will make a reply to the noble Duke. The noble Duke has made a charge against me of betraying confidence, by referring to some private letter.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE: I have made no such charge.

THE EARL OF LUCAN: Pardon me, but I heard you.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE: I did not say so. I said the noble Earl had asked a question whether I had not expressed my opinion that his letter was calm and temperate. I said I had expressed that opinion, and I adhered to it; but that, as he had quoted my opinion, I would ask him a question whether I did not also express another opinion as to the publication of that letter.

THE EARL OF LUCAN: My answer is, that the noble Duke expressed no other opinion. If the correspondence can be termed private, it is not private by my seeking. I made no private communication to the noble Duke. The noble Duke thought right to make me a private communication. I made a reply, not private again. If I recollect rightly what was written by the noble Duke was simply this: A gentleman called on my behalf on the noble Duke, and asked him when it was his intention to publish my letter of the 30th of November—a letter, which, as I have stated, was written by agreement, with and by consent of Lord Raglan; and the noble Duke, in writing to me, expressed his hope that the letter would not be published, and gave his reasons for it; but, if I mistake not, he told this gentleman that I should not publish this letter until my conduct was attacked before the public, and that when I was attacked it would be my duty to publish it.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE: It is necessary I should enter now into further explanations with reference to this private communication, which the noble Earl says was none of his seeking. I say it was none of my seeking; but it does happen, very unfortunately, that the witness between us is no more. It so happened that the noble Earl and myself employed the same private solicitor; and while I held the office of Secretary for the War Department that gentleman called upon me and produced the letter, dated the 30th of November, some ten days before I received it from Lord Raglan. He desired me to read it. I asked Mr. Parkinson for what purpose he produced the letter to me, and I told him it placed me in a very difficult position. Mr. Parkinson then said he had been authorised, as the legal adviser of Lord Lucan, to publish the letter in The Times newspaper, and he felt that was not a wise or proper course to pursue; but, at the same time, he was placed in difficult circumstances—he was in the habit of endeavouring to act as the friend as well as the legal adviser of his clients, and he came to ask me what I thought of the matter. My answer was, "It is out of my power to give you any advice; if I were a private individual, being one of your clients, and on terms of friendly relationship, both with yourself and Lord Lucan, I should have no objection, but I must decline to give any advice in the position in which I stand." Mr. Parkinson said Lord Lucan had desired him to ask me whether I had received that letter from Lord Raglan? I had no hesitation in saying I had received no such letter. He asked if I were likely to receive it soon; I said I was utterly unable to say, as I had no information of the existence of any such letter. Mr. Parkinson said, under the circumstances he would wait until the next mail. I said he would do very wisely, and, as far as that, I would give my opinion. Partly owing to the circumstances which have been explained this evening, and partly because two mails in succession missed, and three mails all arrived together, it was a long while before the letter from Lord Raglan, which was in the first mail, came to hand. At the last moment before it arrived Mr. Parkinson came to me about the publication of the letter, which he said he would not publish, and I certainly now regret that I went a point beyond my duty in saying to Mr. Parkinson I would endeavour to hold him harmless with Lord Lucan. I said to him, "I think you have acted most wisely as the friend of Lord Lucan; and, under the circumstances, I will comply with your request, and write a private letter to Lord Lucan, telling him I entirely concur in the course you have taken." That letter was written in great haste, and, to the best of my belief, I have no copy of it; but I have no objection whatever to the noble Earl producing it. It was in that letter I used the expression which the gallant Earl has quoted, that his letter was in itself calm and temperate; but I went on to state generally, that any military man acting under a Commander in Chief placed himself in an improper position by volunteering a controversy with him of that description. I do not pretend to give the words, but I am sure I give the general substance and purport of that letter. It contained a simple opinion that Mr. Parkinson had acted properly; secondly, that I considered the noble Earl's letter calm and temperate; and thirdly, though it will not bear the construction put upon it by the noble Earl, that to publish the letter before he was attacked would be acting imprudently and improperly.

Motion agreed to; and Ordered accordingly.

House adjourned till To-morrow.

MINUTES.] NEW WRIT.—For Cavan, v. The Right Hon. Sir John Young, bt., Chief Commissioner of the Ionian Islands.

PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Metropolis Local Management.
2° Burial Grounds (Scotland).

THE NEW ORDER OF MERIT— QUESTION.

CAPTAIN SCOBELL said, he wished to ask the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government whether Her Majesty's Government had decided to recommend the institution of an Order of Merit; if so, whether such Order was intended to be a new and distinct one, restricted to the military and naval services, and applicable to every grade therein; and whether it was determined to bring such Order of Merit into prompt operation?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, in reply to the question of the hon. and gallant Member, I beg to state, that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government, as was stated on a former occasion in the other House of Parliament, to establish an Order of that description. Of course, it will apply to both services, because we hope that merit will be equally prominent in both. The particular arrangements of that institution have not yet been settled. Information has been sought in other countries in which a similar institution exists, and, until that information is obtained, the Government cannot frame the regulations under which the Order will be distributed.

NEWSPAPER STAMPS, ETC.

Order for Committee read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I am come down to the House prepared to introduce the Resolutions with regard to newspaper stamps; but although the statement of the views of Her Majesty's Government may be made on the Resolutions, yet as the Bill which I shall ask permission of the House to introduce is not yet in the hands of hon. Members, it will be perhaps inconvenient to enter into a debate upon the question at present; if, however, it be the wish of the House there should be a debate, I would reserve my statement till the second reading. If, on the other hand, the House is willing to listen to my statement and to postpone the debate until the second reading I shall be happy to make that statement now.

MR. DISRAELI : I think, Sir, that it would be very convenient that the House should be favoured with the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, because there is considerable obscurity as to the exact meaning of the Resolutions.

House in Committee.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER : Mr. Bouverie, in the year 1851 a Select Committee was appointed, upon the Motion of my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester (Mr. Milner Gibson), to inquire into the question of newspaper stamps. That Committee examined many witnesses, they investigated the entire subject in considerable detail ; and they embodied the result of their inquiry in a Report, which concludes with the following passage—

" In conclusion, your Committee consider it their duty to direct attention to the objections and abuses incident to the present system of newspaper stamps, arising from the difficulty of defining and determining the meaning of the term 'news' ; to the inequalities which exist in the application of the Newspaper Stamp Act, and the anomalies and evasions that it occasions in postal arrangements ; to the unfair competition to which stamped newspapers are exposed with un-stamped publications ; to the limitation imposed by the stamp upon the circulation of the best newspapers ; and to the impediments which it throws in the way of the diffusion of useful knowledge regarding current and recent events among the poorer classes, which species of knowledge, relating to subjects which most obviously interest them, calls out the intelligence by awaking the curiosity of those classes."

They then proceed to say—

" How far it may be expedient that this tax should be maintained as a source of revenue, either in its present or in any modified form, your Committee do not feel themselves called upon to state ; other considerations, not within their province, would enter into that question. But, apart from fiscal considerations, they do not consider that news is of itself a desirable subject of taxation."

My right hon. Friend followed up the subject in subsequent Sessions ; and in the last Session he brought forward a Resolution, which, after a debate, was carried by the unanimous vote of this House. That Resolution was in the following terms—

" That it is the opinion of this House that the laws in reference to the periodical press and newspaper stamp are ill defined and unequally enforced ; and it appears to this House that the subject demands the early consideration of Parliament."

This Resolution having been unanimously agreed to by the House last Session, the

question naturally came under the consideration of Lord Aberdeen's Government during the recess, and the subject fell necessarily within the province of my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford. The plan which he submitted to the consideration of the Government is now before the House. It involves, substantially, the abolition of the newspaper stamp as a compulsory stamp. The reasons which pressed upon Lord Aberdeen's Government at that time were partly the unanimous resolution of the House of Commons during the last Session, and partly the anomalous state of the law which had grown up of late years under the administration of the Board of Inland Revenue. That anomalous state of the law, which was fully investigated by the Committee of 1851, grew out of relaxations which had been introduced for the purpose of meeting the views of a species of periodical publications which are now known by the denomination of class newspapers. The first case, as I understand, in which a relaxation was admitted, was that of the Literary Gazette, a paper which merely contained critical notices—mere reviews—and was not a newspaper within the strict meaning of the act. It was found, however, by the managers of that periodical that it would be convenient that a portion of its circulation should enjoy the privilege of the stamp, in order that it might be transmitted through the post-office. Accordingly, a few lines of political news were introduced in order to qualify it for the newspaper stamp. In that manner the principle was introduced of partly stamped and partly unstamped publications. That principle was afterwards extended to a large number of periodical publications relating to subjects which interested particular classes—such, for instance, as the members of different professions. There were publications relating to law, to medicine, to architecture, to horticulture, and to various other subjects ; and in all those cases the rule was established that they should not be considered as newspapers subject to the compulsory tax, but that a portion of the impression might be stamped for the convenience of transmission through the post-office. After a time, a portion of those periodical publications introduced news in the proper sense of the word. It was not political news, but it was literary news, or it related to legal, medical, or other professions ; and there can be no doubt that, according to the strict construction of the law, a large number of the class publications which enjoyed a partial immunity from the stamp were newspapers within the meaning of the law, and were liable to a penalty if any portion of their impression were unstamped. The relaxation had, however, been established; and this was the state of practice which my right hon. Friend found in existence during the last recess, when the subject came under his consideration.

If the Government had decided to disregard the unanimous resolution of the House, and to attempt to enforce the law strictly against these class publications, in order to make its administration uniform instead of anomalous, they must have directed numerous prosecutions to have been instituted against this class of newspapers, or they must have come to Parliament for a Bill to render the existing law more stringent and severe. My right hon. Friend decided—and, in my opinion, he exercised a very wise discretion—not to attempt to render the law more stringent, but to relax it, and, at the same time, to make it uniform. The plan which I am about to submit to the Committee is identical in substance and principle with that of my right hon. Friend. The details are not identical, but the plan is founded upon the self-same principles; and whatever credit may belong to it will be due to him, and not to me. The Bill which I shall ask permission of the House to lay upon the table, if these Resolutions shall be agreed to, is based upon the following principle—to abolish the legal definition of a newspaper, and to extend the existing rules respecting newspapers to all printed periodical publications which appear at intervals not greater than thirty-one days. In the case of all periodicals falling within that definition, the present penalty for the publication of any newspaper without a stamp will be repealed, and it will be optional with the proprietors of any such periodical either to stamp any portion of their publication, or to leave it altogether unstamped. If they come to the Stamp-office and apply for stamped sheets upon which to print any portion of their impression, they will be subjected, in respect to the sheets so stamped, to precisely the same rules with respect to superficial contents as existing newspapers are subject to. That is to say, that the first sheet may contain 2,295 superficial square inches covered by a 1*d.* stamp, and the second sheet may contain 1,148 square inches, covered by a stamp of one halfpenny. In this respect I propose to make no alteration, but simply to extend the present limit of superficial contents to all periodical publications which shall appear within intervals of thirty-one days. With regard to all periodical publications which shall stamp any portion of their impression, I propose that they shall be subjected to the present rules respecting registration and sureties. Those rules are to the following effect:—Any person now desirous of publishing a newspaper makes a declaration at the Stamp-office, and he furnishes a copy of every number of his publication, which is registered at the Stamp-office; and the production of it is at all times evidence of publication against the printer and publisher of that newspaper. I propose that the proprietor of any periodical who shall be desirous of stamping any portion of his impression shall be subject to that rule. With respect to the securities, every newspaper proprietor is at present bound in his own recognisance, and is obliged also to produce two sureties in London to the extent of 400*l.*, and in the country to the extent of 300*l.*, to answer any civil action or criminal prosecution which may be brought against him for libel. These are provisions in the existing law which I propose to retain with regard to all newspaper proprietors who shall stamp any portion of their publication. I will now state to the Committee the reasons why I propose to retain these provisions. It has for some time been the policy of this country to make newspapers, as distinguished from pamphlets and other publications which are not periodical, the subject of exceptional and separate legislation with regard to securities against the publisher in civil actions or criminal prosecutions for libel. The law with regard to those securities has been amended more than once, and with respect to that subject the policy of the country may be considered settled. It appears to me that this policy can be justified by sound argument, and that there is an essential difference between newspapers and pamphlets with regard to the subject of libel. A newspaper—that is, one of the periodical publications to which that name is generally applied—has an established circulation, which is immediate and to a great extent universal. It extends over the whole country, and is also nearly simultaneous, for, by means of the post, it is carried on the day of publication to almost all parts of the kingdom ; the consequence of this is, that libellous matter published in a newspaper affecting any individual exercises a much more instantaneous and a much more detrimental influence upon his character than would be the case if such matter were published in a simple pamphlet. There are, no doubt, Gentlemen in this House who have had some experience in the publication of pamphlets, and who know the difficulty with which a pamphlet struggles into notoriety. A few copies are generally first distributed voluntarily, and attempts are made to gain publicity for the work, but those attempts are generally not very successful, and the publicity, if obtained at all, is slow of arrival, and very limited and partial in extent. Now, with regard to a newspaper, these conditions are reversed, for the publicity is immediate, simultaneous, and practically universal. For those reasons it appears to me to be wise and expedient that, with regard to newspapers, securities should be imposed which are not applicable to other parts of the press ; and, therefore, I propose to retain the regulations with regard to sureties. But there is another reason. By the original act which established these sureties they were limited to actions for blasphemous or seditious libels, and the measure was introduced as a protection to the Government. It was found, however, that these were valuable securities which might be extended to the public ; and accordingly, by a subsequent Act, actions for libels on private individuals were brought within the same provisions ; and the consequence is, that any private person is at the present day protected against libel by the proprietor of a newspaper being compelled to enter into his own recognisances, and also to find sureties to answer actions for libel brought against him. If, therefore, the provisions to which I have adverted were repealed, not only would the security which at present exists for the preservation of good order—whatever its value may be—be removed, but also a most valuable and effective security for the respect of private character would be taken away. For these reasons, then, I propose to retain the existing provisions on that subject in the Bill which I shall have the honour of submitting to the House, so far as regards all periodicals which, by publishing a portion of their impression stamped, may bring themselves within the provisions of the Bill. I may state, however, that the provisions with regard to sureties do not form any essential or necessary part of the plan which I propose, and as far as I am officially concerned, they will not in any way affect the interests of the public exchequer ; but they rather form part of the criminal and civil law now existing : and, as they appear to me to be founded upon sound policy, I have included them in the measure which I hope to introduce into this House.

Now, Sir, I have stated in general terms the nature and effect of the plan which I propose. The effect will be to legalise generally what at present is only tacitly sanctioned with respect to the publication of class publications, such as the Athenaeum, the Builder, the Medical Times, the Medical Gazette, and others of that description. Such papers will be admitted by law to the same indulgence which they now possess, and will be authorised to follow the method of publication which they now frequently practise in defiance of, or at least unsanctioned by, the law ; that is, their proprietors will be permitted to publish their impression on a stamp or not, as they may think fit. The same legislation will be further extended to the rest of the periodical press. The political newspapers, such as The Times, The Morning Chronicle, The Herald, The Morning Advertiser, and others, will be subject to the same rule, and be permitted to stamp that portion of their impression which they may wish to transmit by post, and to publish that portion which is independent of transmission by the post without a stamp—just as they may find it for their interest to do. Beyond these changes I do not propose to go. The Bill which I propose to introduce will be confined to the change to which I have referred.

And now, with the permission of the House, I will proceed to examine certain objections which have been made to this plan, and which have been represented as fatal to its operation. One of these objections is, that it will produce great confusion in the printing establishments if a portion of the impression of a paper has to be printed on stamped and the other portion on unstamped paper, and that the consequence of that confusion would be a loss to the proprietors of newspapers. Now, Sir, I have used my best endeavours to ascertain, as far as I could, if there is any foundation for that statement, and I will inform the House of the results of my inquiry. It appears from a return which has been laid before this House on the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Sir J. Shelley) that the number of what may be called class papers amounts to 137, and the business of all of them is conducted by a mixed circulation of stamped and unstamped copies, and as no complaint has ever been made in the case of those publications, which may be called quasi-newspapers, the presumption appears to me to be that there is no real practical difficulty in printing and publishing the mixed circulation of stamped and unstamped copies we propose. One of the principal periodicals which publishes a portion of their impression stamped, and the remainder unstamped, is that publication so familiarly known to all the Members of this House—I mean Punch. In the year 1854, 425,000 stamped copies of that periodical were published; and I understand that, out of a weekly circulation of about 40,000 copies, 8,000 are published on stamped paper, and 32,000 are unstamped. I have had an interview with the manager of that publication—not to make inquiry as to how his interesting publication is compiled, but to obtain some information as to the economical branch of the establishment. That gentleman told me that there was not the least difficulty with regard to the printing of the paper, and that the mixed nature of the circulation did not give rise to the slightest confusion, nor was there any loss to the proprietors in consequence of it; and he describes the difficulty which had been represented to me to exist as perfectly imaginary. I made further inquiry of the manager of the Athenaeum, a paper which is also printed, partly on stamped, and partly on unstamped paper, and I found that 3,000 copies of that paper are printed on stamps, and 4,200 are published unstamped; and the gentlemen connected with that paper told me that there was no practical difficulty or loss in conducting that paper with the mixed circulation, although the demand for stamped copies was affected by various circumstances—such as the absence from London in the summer of persons usually resident there when there exists a much greater demand for stamped copies to be sent by post than at other periods of the year; yet those temporary variations are easily adjusted, and neither confusion nor loss occurs. I further consulted the proprietor of the Illustrated London News, a gentleman of great experience in the management of newspapers, and who has brought the circulation of that paper up to 140,000 a week; and that gentleman gave me his confident opinion that no difficulty would arise in the case of his paper, or in that of any daily paper, from the adoption of a mixed system of stamped and unstamped impressions.

But, Sir, another objection, and that of a more serious character, has been brought under my notice by various persons, who have described the proposition to repeal the compulsory newspaper stamp as one which would be most dangerous to society. It has been described as a measure which will open the floodgates of sedition and blasphemy, and which will inundate the country with licentious and immoral productions, which will undermine the very foundations of society, and scatter the seeds of revolution broadcast over the land. These expressions are not exaggerated representations of the opinions which have been communicated to me from many quarters since this measure has been under my consideration. I regret to say that my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford is looked upon as an accomplice of the Government in this wicked and dangerous design. I need not state that, if Her Majesty's Government believed that there was any foundation for these views, or for any appreciable fractional part of these views, they would not propose the measure which I am now submitting to the consideration of the Committee. They have the greatest confidence in the stability of our political institutions, in the soundness of our social system, in the loyalty and good disposition of the great body of the people; and they do not believe that increased facilities for public discussion through the press will lead to any such consequences as some have apprehended. But, Sir, we are not left merely to conjecture, or indirect evidence, with respect to the conduct and character of a cheap unstamped press. There is already in existence a large class of publications which, not containing news, are exempt from the stamp, are printed at a very cheap rate, and circulate most extensively through the country. Now, though these publications do not contain news, yet, if it were true that the people of this country have so insatiable an appetite for immoral and licentious reading as some seem to ascribe to them, they would possess a very different character from what they actually exhibit. I beg to call the attention of the Committee to the names of some of these publications. There is the Illustrated

News, which is sold for 6d., and circulates no less than 140,000 copies per week, and although it is published only hebdomadally, I think it is second, or nearly second, in point of circulation to The Times. The Illustrated News is so very well known a publication that I need scarcely say its contents are perfectly unexceptionable, and that it obtains a willing admission to every family in the kingdom. But there are other periodicals that are unstamped which are sold at a lower price, and which circulate widely among the poorer classes. One of these is a periodical of which I confess that I never heard the name until recently, and perhaps the same may be the case of some other Members of this House; I mean a penny weekly publication called the London Journal, and which, I am assured by very sufficient evidence, circulates 510,000, or more than half a million copies, per week, or equal to 26,520,000 per annum—a circulation, exceeding by 10,000,000 that of The Times, though it appears only once a week, whereas The Times is published six times in the week. I have examined certain numbers of this periodical, and find that it somewhat resembles the Penny Magazine, which was well known several years ago. The London Journal appears to be unexceptionable in point of morality; its matter may not, indeed, be of the most instructive character—it is in fact, rather amusing than instructive—but certainly, it does not at all correspond with the very frightful picture of cheap periodicals which has been drawn to us by the objectors to the repeal of the compulsory stamp. There is another publication, similar in its character—the Family Herald—which circulates about 240,000 weekly, or at the rate of 12,500,000 per annum. It is also somewhat analogous to the Penny Magazine, which is now extinct, and which at one time had a circulation of about 200,000 copies per week. These facts must be considered as showing that the spontaneous taste of the poorer classes of readers in this country, as regards cheap unstamped periodicals at the present moment, leads them to prefer a species of literature wholly innocuous in its character, and quite free from all the dangerous elements which have been held up to our fears. Now, let us look to the reverse of the picture. Some years ago, I am informed, there were five or six publications in London of a different description from the foregoing. Among them were the Town, and others of a similarly licentious character. The illustrations they contained corresponded with their letterpress, and these publications obtained a certain circulation. But a gentleman who made an inquiry into this subject a few years since, and who recently completed his inquiry, assures me that the entire class of publications of this nature is now extinct; that out of five or six which he noticed a few years ago not one now remains in existence. It will be in the recollection of the House that there was likewise a higher class of publications of the same character as those to which I am now referring, comprising the Age, the Satirist, and the Argus, which enjoyed a considerable circulation some few years since, but they have now also ceased to exist. It may, I believe, be said with perfect truth, that no immoral or licentious publication has a long life, or obtains an extensive circulation. Another objection made to the proposed change is, that there would be one press for the rich and another for the poor; that there would be one description of newspapers intended for wealthy readers and for the upper classes of society, and another description of cheap newspapers designed for circulation among the working classes. Now, to a certain extent, that state of things already exists. There are newspapers now enjoying a very wide circulation which are printed at a cheaper rate than the ordinary daily and weekly papers, and whose principal circulation lies among the less wealthy classes of the people. Two of these journals are called The News of the World and Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper, and they have the largest circulation after The Times. This extensive circulation they owe to the fact that their price is 3d., instead of 5d. or 6d.—the preference they enjoy in the newspaper market being solely attributable to the lower rate at which they are sold. But even if two kinds of newspapers should be established to a certain extent, it may be doubted whether there will be any reason for regretting it. If the taste of the poorer classes of readers prevents them from enjoying and perusing those newspapers which are prepared for a different class of readers—if a class of newspapers grows up which is intended to meet the wants of the working classes—and if those newspapers are moral and useful in their tendency, it may be regarded as an advantage that they should circulate among that portion of society. We are not to assume that the class of newspapers which may be addressed to the working people will be tainted with any immoral or anti-social doctrines ; and at all events those persons who devote themselves to the moral, religious, and intellectual improvement of the people, and to the diffusion of sound opinions among them, will here find a field for their philanthropic exertions, and will be able to counteract any mischievous or anarchical principles which may be disseminated through channels of this description. The present necessity of imposing a stamp on every copy of a local newspaper is frequently attended with detrimental effects ; and, in illustration of the mischief and injustice occasionally produced by the existing law, I will take the liberty of quoting an extract from a letter published by the noble Lord the Member for Lynn (Lord Stanley) relating to this subject. He says—

" I have by me a small advertising sheet which appears in a neighbouring town (to save the law) monthly ; and which, but for the operation of the law, would probably appear fortnightly, if not weekly. Its weight, to judge by the quantity of paper which it contains, does not exceed 1-20th that of The Times when the latter appears with its full 16 pages of print. . . . The little local journal to which I have referred does not want the Post Office at all. If living in a town, I wish to send out 1,000 copies of a circular, I should certainly find it cheaper and more convenient to hire a messenger to distribute them than to pay 4*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* for their circulation by the local post. In this case Government allows me the option. But if I issue a weekly or fortnightly circular, in the shape of a newspaper, I have no similar freedom of choice. Whether I use the postal arrangements which Government has provided, or dispense with them, is immaterial to the State ; but in either case I must pay equally."

Now, under the regulations which I propose, it will be optional for the publisher of any local journal, such as the noble Lord has described, to stamp one portion of his impression, and to leave unstamped such copies as he may wish to circulate by messenger. Thus, if it is any convenience to him to stamp any portion in order that it may pass through the post, it will be perfectly competent for him to do so. At the same time, having shown that the publication of local newspapers will be greatly facilitated by the removal of the stamp, I must express a doubt whether any considerable number of such new newspapers will spring into existence. No newspaper can obtain any considerable circulation unless it be a good medium for advertisements. It is by the advertisements that the large and well-conducted newspapers are maintained, and it is out of the profits of advertisements that the deficiency in the expenditure of these newspapers is supported. Now, Sir, small local newspapers are never a profitable vehicle for advertisements, and, therefore, such a newspaper can never become, in the proper sense of the term, a good newspaper. The established provincial newspapers, having large capital and extensive circulation, are already in possession of the market, and, having a wide field now open before them, and enjoying the preference of the advertising public, they will enter into competition with small local newspapers on the most advantageous terms. And I confess I think that the advent of the newspaper Utopia which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Manchester (Mr. Milner Gibson) anticipates, as soon as the stamp is taken off, is yet far distant. I do not expect that a great number of new newspapers will be established if the stamp duty is removed, but, at the same time, if any such demand for a new class of newspapers should exist, the reality of that demand will be tested by the facilities for their establishment which the change in the law will bring.

Another objection to the measure—an objection which has been mentioned in the other House, and which must have occurred to my right hon. Friend my predecessor in office, as it occurred to myself—is the loss of revenue which will be entailed by the proposed changes. Now, Sir, if we had at this time a surplus revenue, and if the expenditure of the country did not greatly exceed its ordinary revenue, the newspaper stamp would have a fair claim to be considered in any plan for repeal or readjustment of taxes, and those who object to it might claim that its repeal should have precedence in any financial scheme. This, however, is not the present financial state of the country, and, if the House should decide in favour of this measure, it would be my duty to call upon them to provide for the deficiency of the revenue which might thereby be occasioned by some other mode of taxation. The present stamp duty on newspapers produces to the revenue rather more than 400,000*l.* a year, and it is estimated that a measure for repealing the compulsory stamp will entail a loss of 200,000*l.* per annum. At the same time, there are some facts which may lead to the inference that, after the compulsory stamp shall be repealed, the newspapers will continue to print a considerable portion of their impression upon stamped paper. I will, with the permission of the House, state some facts relative to The Times newspaper, which will throw some light on this part of the question. The circulation of The Times is 59,000 per diem; of these, 33,000 are distributed by news-agents in London, and 26,000 go into the country, of which about 22,000 are conveyed by railway trains, and 5,800 by post. About three-fourths of the copies of The Times—and of this I am assured by excellent authority—ultimately pass through the post, most copies three or four times. Although the number of copies which leave London and are distributed by the newsagents is so large, yet I am assured that, altogether, at least three-fourths of the entire impression of The Times ultimately pass through the post. Such is the convenience of the postage stamp. I have been further assured by a deputation of provincial newspaper proprietors that about two-thirds of the country papers are sent directly through the post, and that about half the remaining third are afterwards sent, making altogether about five-sixths which pass through the post. These facts lead to the inference that the present stamp is found to be a convenience in the transmission of newspapers, and that, even if it ceased to be a compulsory stamp, a large circulation of stamped newspapers would, nevertheless, take place. Moreover, if the alteration of the law should lead to a large increase in the number of newspapers, the addition in the circulation would produce such an increase in the paper duty as would in some degree compensate for the loss of revenue in the stamped circulation of newspapers. It is my duty to inform the House that the estimate of persons of authority as to the loss of revenue must not be taken to be less than 200,000*l*. Such a loss of revenue is, no doubt, inconvenient at the present moment. On the other hand, the House will bear in mind that to refuse to repeal the stamp would be to recede from the unanimous resolution which it agreed to last Session, and will render necessary the passing of some measure declaratory of the law. Indulgences must be withdrawn, and the House must consent to the adoption of stringent measures for collecting the newspaper stamp.

I have heard it argued, and it has been suggested to me since the Resolutions have been laid upon the table, that the plan would be more perfect if it included all sorts of printed matter, and not merely periodical publications. That proposition, Sir, involves the question of a cheap book post. At the present time there is a cheap book post, and the payment of 6*d*. will enable a book of not more than 1 lb. to be carried by the post. That system has been established by a succession of Treasury warrants, and it is competent for the Lords of the Treasury to vary and modify the existing system, and to bring the present charges to lower rates than exist at present. Her Majesty's Government think that the question of periodical publications and their transmission through the post stands upon different grounds from the question of books and pamphlets, and that it ought to be kept separate. I admit, however, the importance of legislating with respect to the transmission of books and pamphlets by post, and, if it should meet with the approval of the House, I shall be ready to take that question into consideration hereafter, as a separate measure. I may, however, state one fact for the information of hon. Members, that, according to information given before a Committee which sat last Session upon postal communication, the following appears to be the comparative weight of the different class of articles carried by the post:—Out of 100 parts, letters formed 13 per cent; books, 2 per cent; newspapers, 76 per cent; and the mailbags as much as 9 per cent. So that, judging by weight, newspapers now form by far the largest portion of the articles conveyed by post. The books only form 2 per cent; and therefore, if anything like equality and correspondence is to be established between books and newspapers, some new regulations must be hereafter established with regard to books and pamphlets.

Having thus explained the intentions of the Government relative to the newspaper stamp, I beg leave now to move the following Resolutions:—

"That it is expedient to amend the Laws relating to the Stamp Duties on Newspapers, and to provide for the transmission by Post of printed periodical publications.

"That any periodical publication, to be entitled to the privilege of transmission and retransmission by the Post, shall be printed on paper stamped for denoting the Stamp Duty imposed by Law on a Newspaper, printed on the like number of sheets or pieces of paper, and of the like dimensions, with respect to the superficies, of the letterpress thereof.

"That printed Newspapers (British, Colonial, or Foreign) shall be transmitted by Post between places in the United Kingdom and Her Majesty's Colonies, or Foreign Countries, or between any ports or places beyond the Sea (whether through the United Kingdom or not), either free of Postage, or subject to such rates of Postage, not exceeding 2d. for each Newspaper, irrespective of any charge for Foreign Postage, as the Commissioners of the Treasury, or Her Majesty's Postmaster General, with their consent, shall from time to time think fit."

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I have listened with great interest to the very elaborate statement of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I entirely agree with him in the opinion he seems to entertain, that it would be better that the Bill should be printed and laid before the House, and that there should be some brief opportunity at least of giving it consideration before we enter into any full discussion of its merits, or into any comparison between the particular provisions of my right hon. Friend's measure and of that which I had the honour of introducing. Parental partiality, probably, renders me an unfair judge on this subject, but I cannot deny that I regard with regret the changes which my right hon. Friend has introduced into the plan as originally framed. At the same time, in considering a measure of this kind, I think it is our duty, as Members of this House, to ask ourselves, not so much whether the measure that is proposed is in all respects conformable to our own wishes and predilections, or even whether it is the best that in our opinion could be submitted to Parliament, but whether, upon the whole, it goes so far in avoiding all existing difficulties of a serious and pressing character, and in introducing material and substantial improvements in the law, as to make it worth our while to recommend and promote its adoption by the Legislature. That is the principle upon which I desire to consider this Bill of my right hon. Friend's when it shall have been laid upon the table. There are, however, one or two points in the measure proposed by my right hon. Friend upon which I wish to say a word. I confess I was very glad to hear my right hon. Friend signify, towards the close of his speech, that he was not indisposed to give a favourable consideration to the proposal, provided it appeared to be in accordance with the wishes of the House, to introduce into his Bill, not a qualification or alteration of the measure, but simply an extension of it, which would establish a moderate and low tariff for printed matter in general. I certainly think that such a regulation would be a most valuable addition to the Bill, and would in no respect interfere with the principle which my right hon. Friend proposes to establish. I can conceive no reason whatever why newspapers or periodicals published within thirty-one days should enjoy privileges that are denied to the feebler means and resources of those who may occasionally, or under particular circumstances, wish to give the public the benefit of their thoughts in print. With respect to one serious portion of this question to which my right hon. Friend adverted—namely, the effect of his measure upon the revenue—I would remind him that the introduction of a low and moderate postage tariff for printed matter of all descriptions would materially tend towards indemnifying him for the loss he is likely to sustain by the abolition of the compulsory stamp. I have no scruple in adverting to this point, and I may remind the House that, although the present tariff for the transport of books by post is not immoderate when it is applied to the case of what may fairly be called books—I mean works of considerable bulk, such, for instance, as the Quarterly or Edinburgh Review, which approach the weight of a pound—yet, so far as pamphlets are concerned, it is little less than a prohibitory duty. Indeed, it would very commonly better answer the purpose of those who wish to circulate pamphlets through the post to send them as letters, subject to the letter postage, than to avail themselves of the existing tariff for the transmission of books by post. I think, therefore, there is every necessity for an alteration in this respect. With regard to my right hon. Friend's definition of periodicals, I do not intend to enter into that part of the question at present, but, if I understand his resolutions rightly, it appears to me that the only periodicals which would be able to avail themselves of his proposition would be periodicals that conform, in a certain degree, to the arrangements of newspapers, and particularly periodicals that are limited to a couple of sheets. I must confess I apprehend that this regulation will be found materially to limit the beneficial effect of my right hon. Friend's measure, and, if so, it will be an additional argument for his adopting the proposal that greatly increased facilities should be given for the circulation of printed matter of all descriptions whatsoever, whether periodicals or otherwise, by post. The next point I wish to mention is one to which I advert with greater unwillingness, but upon which I differ from the views of my right hon. Friend. He has announced his intention to propose that the use of the impressed stamp, which is to convey the postal privilege, shall be conditional upon a registration that is to entail the necessity of giving of securities. Now, it is quite true that at the present moment we have a law of this kind in operation. It is quite true that if a tradesman at the present time carries his circular to the Board of Inland Revenue he obtains the postal privilege on the condition of his declaring his circular to be a newspaper, although, if the Board of Inland Revenue were afterwards to prosecute him for not stamping his entire impression, he would be entitled to go into a Court of Justice and there to contend that that was not a newspaper which he himself had declared to be a newspaper in order to obtain the postal privilege for part of his impression. Now, the declaration thus made undoubtedly entails upon him the condition of giving securities; and at present, if a tradesman thinks he can supply his customers and the public with any given article upon such terms that it is worth while to advertise his prices from time to time, and if his ambition has so wide a range that he wishes to make them known, not only in the place where he may live, but throughout the country, it is necessary for him to register his circular or advertisement sheet, or whatever it may be, as a newspaper, and to give security that he will not print therein any blasphemous or seditious libels. Undoubtedly this is the practice under the law as it stands; but I must confess my belief always has been that this was one of the anomalies and absurdities of the practice which induced the House during the last year to do what it is not very apt to do, and what I think it most wisely eschews doing—namely, to pass an abstract Resolution to the effect that the law ought to be altered. My right hon. Friend proposes that this condition of giving securities shall be retained, but that it shall be retained not as a condition of publishing a newspaper, but as a condition of the postal privilege. But, is it possible for this House to embody permanently in one law a regulation founded upon such a basis? It is perfectly intelligible if a man tells me that securities ought to be given by those who publish newspapers. There certainly may be differences of opinion upon that subject, some parties may think that these securities are highly important for the protection of public order or of private character. I confess that I am not of that opinion. My belief is, that securities have this effect—they provide that if the man who has given them commits an offence against the law, and the party whom he has wronged proceeds against him in a Court of Justice, the man who has committed the wrong shall have the means of paying counsel and attorneys to defend him. This I believe to be the first effect of these securities. That is a question of policy, but what question of policy, or what intelligible object or motive can be connected with the retention of securities as a condition of postal transmission? Why, if these securities are important at all, they are important as a protection, not to public men, not to Ministers of the Crown, or to members of this House, but to the private characters of individuals. Now, where is it important to defend private character? Why, within the particular sphere where each man is known; but if you are to say to a clergyman in Devonshire, "we will take care you shall not be libelled in Northumberland, where the people know nothing about you, but you may be libelled ad libitum by the newspapers published in your own town—we will allow you to be libelled in that part of the country where it is material that you should have your character defended, but we will prevent you from being libelled in a part of the country with which you have no connection or concern"—it is plain that you place your law upon an irrational basis, and my right hon. Friend will run great risk of not attaining the object he has in view, namely, that of effecting a complete and final settlement of this long-vaux question. There is another point which is not a matter of indifference to me, namely, the question of copyright, for the protection of literary property in newspapers. I do not wonder, so far as we know any thing of the plan of my right hon. Friend from his explanation to-night, that he has not included in his Bill any clauses upon this subject. I think, indeed, it is a matter with reference to which it would be very difficult to devise a plan. At the same time I am under the impression that the proprietors of newspapers, in many cases, entertain great anxiety that the provisions of the law with respect to the protection of literary pro-

erty should undergo special consideration, and should, if practicable, receive some extension with a view to the protection of literary property in newspapers. Undoubtedly, so far as the article that is most strictly called "news" is concerned, for instance, the communication of facts, which may generally be comprised within a very brief space, and the language, the outward shape and form of which can be varied almost at will, I do not know how you are to introduce any further provisions than the law at present contains; but I have understood from some persons who ought to be well informed on the subject, that the great anxiety of those who think this question worth consideration in the press as it stands, is not so much directed to the protection of their "news," strictly so called, which, in point of fact, it would be very difficult to protect, as to the protection of what may more fairly be called their literary composition—for example, the leading articles in their newspapers, and, especially as regards the London press, the communications of their foreign correspondents. Now I, for one, am very anxious that, either in the plan of my right hon. Friend, or in some other effective form, this question should be brought to a settlement. I think what my right hon. Friend has stated to-night must suffice to convince the House that the question now before them is not whether or not you will have a cheap press. You have got your cheap press at this moment. London is already inundated with these cheap weekly prints. My right hon. Friend has told us of one single publication in London which now issues some 510,000 copies a-week, and of another which prints at the rate of 240,000 a-week. Here, then, are upwards of 34,000,000 copies of two publications alone printed annually in this metropolis. How many more similar publications there may be we have no means of knowing; but I apprehend that this statement is far from representing the actual number. You have then your cheap press established in the country. If it does not exist throughout the country, it is certainly established in the great centres of the population, and, above all, in London; and, as I have just observed, London is already inundated by these weekly prints. By the present frame and structure of your laws, you prevent the insertion, in these publications, of what may be considered discussions upon public events, or the statement of public news; and the question for the House to decide is, not whether it is expedient to have a cheap press or to prohibit a cheap press, but rather when you have got a cheap press, whether you will give to the promoters of that cheap press the means of providing the people with intelligence of the events in which we are all so deeply interested, with intelligence relative to the working of our institutions and the passing of our laws, or whether you will drive them to what is petty and paltry, to cramming their columns with novels and romances,—whether you will preclude them from affording that information which really forms the worthiest material for consideration and reflection, or whether you will allow a fair competition between public news, as we understand it, and those inferior materials to which it is the tendency and effect of the present law to confine the conductors of these publications. Determined as I am to do all in my power completely to set free the press—whether it be a cheap or a dear one—for the handling of public events and news of all kinds, and to apply to this subject those principles of free commerce which have been extended with such efficacy to the general mercantile transactions of the country, yet, I fully admit that, so far as literary compositions are concerned, we now find them in our existing press of a high standard and of very great value, and that the principle of protection to those compositions is a perfectly fair and just one. I am not prepared to say, and indeed it would require one more skilled in the law, and better acquainted with the whole facts of the case, and the feelings and interest of the parties concerned than I am, to point out in what form this could best be done. I do not venture to prejudge this question, but I would venture to express a hope that, in endeavouring to carry out the principle of the freedom of the press, my right hon. Friend will not be indisposed to take into his favourable consideration any reasonable proposition which may be made to him for the improvement of the law of copyright, in order that we may not run any risk of breaking down that system under which the highest talent in the country is applied largely and advantageously devoted to supplying the public with intelligence and to the discussion of that intelligence. I must confess that I should regard the destruction of that system as a public misfortune—a misfortune which I am the less disposed to incur, because I do not look upon it as a natural or necessary consequence of the important measure of emancipation which is now contemplated by Her Majesty's Government. Of course I do not offer any opposition to these Resolutions. When the Bill of my right hon. Friend comes before us, we shall have an opportunity of discussing it, and I entertain a most confident hope that it will receive a candid and favourable reception at the hands of the House.

SIR FRANCIS BARING : Sir, I am not about to enter into the discussion of the Motion itself now before the House, but there is one part of the subject which I think the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer dealt with rather unsatisfactorily, and which the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gladstone) touched on still more lightly—I mean that part having reference to our financial operations. The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated with perfect candour that he apprehends that at least 200,000*l.* will be the loss on the measure proposed. Now, I do not pretend myself to draw an estimate different from my right hon. Friend, but I would remind him that Mr. Rowland Hill, in that Committee from whose labours he has derived the great part of his observations, stated—if my recollection serves me correctly—that the utmost he thought would be obtained by the adoption of a measure similar to that of the right hon. Gentleman would be 130,000*l.* Mr. Rowland Hill thought that that would be the maximum, but there has been some increase of income since, and I apprehend that you may count on the loss of about 250,000*l.* of revenue in adopting the proposed arrangement. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer said that he thought that by a cheap mode of carrying books by post you might obtain an additional sum of money ; but I am afraid that our finances are in such a state that you must not neglect any mode of raising money ; and you will have before long to consider, not only whether you cannot raise money by a cheap mode of carrying books, but by many other modes also which may be much less agreeable to the House and the country. The present Chancellor of the Exchequer, though not responsible for bringing forward the project at the present moment, yet, following the example of the late Cancellor of the Exchequer, has made this proposal at what I certainly think a very unfit time. I have repeatedly known—and perhaps I myself may have done what I am about to describe—that when hon. Gentlemen on different sides of the House have proposed arrangements entailing a loss of revenue, the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the time being has risen and advised them, in reference to Motions affecting the revenue, to wait until the financial statement should be made, and then they would know what sum of money there might be to dispose of, then a full and comprehensive view could be taken of the taxation of the country, and then they would know how to apply any sum of public money they might have to spare in the manner the most advantageous for the public good. These proposals were made and this advice given when you were sure that you had some surplus ; but are you at all certain at the present moment that you have a surplus ? The Chancellor of the Exchequer has fairly told you, that if you pass this measure he must of necessity propose some other taxation to compensate for the sum it is now proposed should be lost. Well, then, let us know what is the taxation which the right hon. Gentleman will propose in lieu ? We all know, and no one better than the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that every tax is an evil in itself, and nothing in the world is so easy as to make a case against any tax you please if you consider it by itself. But you ought to consider it in reference and in comparison with other modes of raising money ; and, though there can be no objection to allow the right hon. Gentleman to bring in his Bill, and lay his plan fairly before the House, yet we ought not to proceed to vote away 250,000*l.* of public money, until we have before us the whole state of the finances of the country, and are thereby able to take a full and comprehensive view of the subject. Therefore, I will not now enter further into the details of the plan which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has explained so clearly and candidly to the House, but if he proposes, after bringing in his Bill, to pass it before his financial statement is made, I am afraid that he will find me prepared, even if I should find myself in a minority of one, to vote for the postponement of the measure.

MR. MILNER GIBSON : I think, Sir, that the right hon. Gentleman who has last spoken has scarcely placed this matter on its proper footing. This is not properly a fiscal question, though it does involve revenue considerations ; but are we to be told that this country is so pressed in her finances as to be unable to meddle with a subject which incidentally involves 200,000*l.* of public revenue, when it is necessary to do so on grounds of public policy in order to avoid a vexatious system of prosecutions and difficulties of the most serious character to the press of this country? I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman, that we must be careful in times like these in not abandoning sources of revenue; but I cannot see that we should take such an alarming view of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposition as to reject it on revenue grounds alone. I am sorry that the present Chancellor of the Exchequer has left out of his plan that portion of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer's scheme which would have compensated for the loss of revenue occasioned by the removal of the newspaper stamp, because, while on the one hand the late Chancellor of the Exchequer gave up the newspaper stamp, he on the other, by admitting for the first time all printed matter to be carried by the Post-office at the rate of a penny for four ounces, opened a new source of revenue, which, giving great convenience to the public, would also have compensated to some extent, the loss incurred by the abolition of the newspaper stamp. It is difficult to speculate to what amount this compensation would have reached; but as the whole loss of revenue was calculated at 200,000*l.* it is quite certain that a large portion of that sum would have been replaced by the postage rate for cheap printed matter, and, perhaps, even a larger sum might have been obtained than the 200,000*l.* about to be lost. Whether that would be so or not is, of course, a matter of opinion; but I hope the present Chancellor of the Exchequer will consider the proposition of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, and add to his plan the proposal of a cheap rate of postage for all printed matter. It is a monstrous thing that The Times, for instance, weighing six ounces, or whatever else, is to be permitted for 1*d.* to be transmitted and retransmitted through the post for the term of our natural lives, and yet I may not send once through the Post Office a pamphlet for a 1*d.*, though perfectly willing to pay that sum for a single transmission. So far from any undue advantage being taken of the proposed change of the law by the transmission of improper publications through the post, I will venture to say that for one bad publication sent by post there will be 100 good publications circulated by it. There will

for instance be religious tracts without number from philanthropic societies which at present have no means of distributing their productions throughout the country. With regard to the securities afforded by the present system, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not correctly stated the law upon that subject. The liability to give securities does not apply to newspapers alone. Every person who publishes a pamphlet which comments on matters of Church and State and is sold at a less price than 6*d.*, and contains letter-press matter of less than 1,714 square inches, is bound to find securities, and also to declare that he is worth 400*l.* after all his debts are paid. At the present moment, no man in London, according to law, is at liberty to express an opinion upon paper, and publish the same at a low price and in a small size, unless he is worth 400*l.* after all his debts are paid. These are the provisions of the present law, but they are not enforced, except against newspapers only. But if the law is not enforced, can there be a better reason advanced for repealing it? Do I understand the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he intends to repeal only a portion of the law respecting securities; that he is going to retain them as against newspapers, and to abandon them as against other publications? If so I consider it would be very difficult for the right hon. Gentleman to show why that distinction should be drawn. With regard to registration which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) proposed to abolish, I wish to observe that an effectual registration would still exist, because the Act of George III., which requires that every printer should put his name and place of abode to every printed paper, would still remain in force. Every printer is also required to keep a register of his employers, and is bound to produce it on an order being issued by a justice of the peace for that purpose. So that in point of fact, there would still be a full registration of any printed paper, and the means of tracing the persons who were responsible for its publication, even if the registration referred to by the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) were abolished as that right hon. Gentleman proposed. I for one shall be extremely glad to give my support to the Resolutions proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; at the same time I shall endeavour to add to those parts of the Bill which I think to be deficient, for I cannot say that I consider the measure as a whole to be so good as the one proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford.

MR. JOHN MACGREGOR said, he would not then express an opinion on the comparative merits of the measure introduced by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) and the Resolutions now proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He believed, however, that, by imposing a fixed charge on all printed matter transmitted through the post, the revenue would not gain back altogether so much as it would lose by the repeal of the present postal duty for such publications. However, the whole question was one on which the opinion of the country was greatly divided, as to whether the inconveniences of any legislation whatever might not exceed the advantages that could accrue from it. The great majority of the press were opposed to both the proposed measures, while he believed the people of the country generally would prefer the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford to that now submitted to the House by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There was great truth in what had been stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Portsmouth (Sir F. Baring), that the House should take into consideration what were the wants of the country, before they consented to throw away any considerable amount of revenue. He looked with very great concern at the present state of the revenue; and it should have been one of the first duties of the Government to have submitted their budget to the House, in order that it might be known what were the means which the Government possessed to meet the largely increased expenditure which the exigencies of the war had imposed on the country. It was true that in consequence of the changes in the Government it had not been possible hitherto to bring forward any financial statement, but he did trust that in a very short period the budget of the Government would be laid before the House and the country for due consideration. He trusted especially—indeed he did not believe the Government could be so insane as to do so—that they would not resort to disturb the glorious policy of no duties, or very low ones, on articles the essential food of man; and certainly not to increase the duties on articles which, as necessities, formed the consolation of every cottager's, labourer's, and tradesman's family: he meant the duties on tea, coffee, and sugar. They had done so already on a nutritious and wholesome beverage, good ale—and that very injudiciously, very unpopularly and unjustly.

MR. WARNER said, he thought no time should be lost in repealing those absurd and mischievous laws which obstructed the circulation of news; but he entertained very great doubts as to whether this was the proper time for extending the postal privileges of printed matter. He would admit that in principle books were as much entitled to be circulated through the post as newspapers were; neither had any claim to postal privileges. If we could legislate de novo on this subject, it would be desirable to carry all printed matter at as low a price as possible, without loss to the revenue. But in practice there was this difference in favour of newspaper. Through the clumsy legislation of past times they had acquired a claim to be carried at a price which he believed resulted in a positive loss, and though it might be exceedingly inconvenient to curtail these privileges, there could be no reason for extending them. It was, after all, a question of cost. He should be glad to hear from some hon. Member competent to give an opinion on this matter, whether any profits accrued to the revenue by the transmission of newspapers through the Post Office. If so, and it could be shown that books could be transmitted without loss, it would be a strong argument for extending to them the privileges of newspapers. But he feared this was not the case. The Post Office ought to be at least self-supporting. Whether the carriage of newspapers was remunerative or not, he should give his support to the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the hope that the House would repeal those obnoxious laws which now interfered with the circulation of news.

MR. BENTINCK said, as this was not the first time a measure of the kind now proposed had been submitted to the House, it was impossible not to be in a certain degree influenced by a consideration of the quarter whence these Resolutions proceeded. He must confess that, between the Resolutions now proposed and those which were originally proposed by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, although he could trace a strong family resemblance, still there appeared to him to be a considerable difference. He was not prepared at once, as a matter of course, to adopt the Resolutions which originally emanated from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone). In saying so, it was not because he did not admire the brilliant talent and eloquence of the right hon. Gentleman, but he should certainly have had more confidence in any measure proceeding from that right hon. Gentleman if he could have placed more reliance on a remark which was made by him on a former memorable occasion. No doubt, the right hon. Gentleman was most sincere in the declaration he then made, startling as it was to him (Mr. Bentinck), when he heard the right hon. Gentleman declare to the House that his opinions were strictly of a Conservative character. He would not enter into any discussion as to how far the right hon. Gentleman was or was not able to make good that very singular statement. All he could say was, that when he heard the right hon. Gentleman make the statement, he could not help ejaculating a hope that men of his party might never be tinged or tainted by such conservatism as that which had been exhibited for some years past by the right hon. Gentleman. He could not agree with the opinion which had been expressed by several hon. Members, that the loss which was likely to accrue to the revenue in carrying out these Resolutions would be more than supplied by the transmission through the post of a new description of printed publications. He thought that the new description of publications which would be engendered by the adoption of the Resolutions would be so purely of a local character and possess so entirely a merely local interest that they would not obtain any distant circulation; therefore it was very doubtful whether they would at all increase the revenue, as far as their circulation was concerned. With regard to the other portion of the measure, it was premature to give any opinion. He could not, however, conceive the possibility of a Bill of the description indicated by the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman being adopted by the House without leading to the commencement of a revolution of the present established order of things connected with the press of this country. It must be the means of producing publications of a cheap description, in large districts of the country, of a totally different and of very inferior character to those which were now in circulation. The measure was most certainly divested of those guarantees against the improper use and the abuse of the press which at present existed. Therefore, he thought it incumbent upon the House, in passing the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman, to take care that some efficient protection be provided against the abuses that must be engendered throughout the country by the circulation of publications that had no sort of check upon them, and that were liable to be made use of in all quarters without being subject to any of those restrictions which were now imposed upon newspapers at present circulating throughout the kingdom.

MR. KIRK said, he had repeated communications with newspaper editors and proprietors, and they unanimously condemned the Bill of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, and were desirous that the present law should not be altered. He conceived that the existing law afforded as many advantages to the public as any measure could possibly give. He was not, however, disposed to offer any opposition to the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman on the present occasion, but he had felt it his duty to state what had been the communications made to him on the subject by those who were the most deeply interested in it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I beg to assure the right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth that I have maturely considered the financial consequences involved in this measure, and I have no doubt that my predecessor had done the same; but it must be remembered that this is not merely a fiscal matter, because, as I have already stated to the Committee, the existing law respecting the stamp duty upon newspapers has been brought into a most inconsistent and anomalous state by a succession of indulgences which were made for the benefit of a certain class of newspaper publications. The consequence of those indulgences is, that the greatest difficulty exists in the administration of the present law. The Board of Inland Revenue are perplexed by different publications which are set up, as it were, in defiance of the existing law. Frequent correspondence takes place between Mr. Timm, the solicitor to the Board, and the proprietors of various newspapers. Some of that correspondence has been from time to time brought under the consideration of the House; it is made the subject of complaint, and my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General is constantly embarrassed in the administration of the law. Now, I will give to the Committee an example of the cases which arise. There was a newspaper published in Ireland called the Commercial Journal and Family Herald: it was a publication for the most part of a literary character, but it did not wholly exclude matters of intelligence; and a prosecution for printing it upon unstamped paper was instituted in the Court of Exchequer in Ireland. The jury, however, returned a verdict against the Crown, thereby intimating their opinion that, notwithstanding that the paper did contain some news, it was not a newspaper, the general contents being of a different character. The Irish Attorney General, being consulted, stated that, in his opinion, the verdict was not justified by the law, since the case was clearly within the provision of the Act of Parliament. Nevertheless, he did not recommend a renewal of the prosecution, on account of the difficulty in procuring a verdict in such cases. My hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for England will be prepared, at a future stage of the Bill, to state to the House the practical difficulty which he finds in performing his duty in respect to the prosecution of newspapers, and the maintenance and administration of the existing law. If the House should decide that this revenue is not to be abandoned—and certainly it is not the office of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, at a moment when the expenditure exceeds the revenue, to press upon the House the abandonment of any source of revenue—then the Attorney General will be prepared to point out the difficulties which surround the execution of the present law; and it will be necessary to take proceedings against about 100 class publications, which, as they now publish literary, legal, medical, and other news which is interesting to various classes, but not political news, do strictly come within the terms of the Act of Parliament, although, by the indulgent interpretation which has been admitted, they have hitherto been exempted. I trust, also, if the House is pleased to reject this Bill, that it will be prepared to support the Attorney General in a rigid execution of the existing law, and, if necessary, to pass a declaratory Act or a subsidiary Act to remedy any defects in the law as it at present stands. I will now call your attention to another example of the difficulties which encumber the administration of the existing law. The solicitor of the Board of Inland Revenue, being examined before a Committee upon the subject of class publications, was asked why class publications were not subjected to the compulsory stamp? Inadvertently, instead of saying that they were exempted because they were addressed to a particular class of the community, he said that it was because they related only to one subject. In giving that reason, he made a slight error of statement. That error has now been taken up in different parts of the country, and a number of periodicals have appeared, such as the War Telegraph and the War Times, containing intelligence relating exclusively to the war, which they say is "one subject," and, so saying, set the Board of Inland Revenue at defiance. I hold in my hand a publication of that nature, called the War Fly Sheet, which is printed upon half a sheet of paper, and is sold at the price of one halfpenny. There is a note under the heading to this effect, "The War Fly Sheet, published in accordance with Mr. Keogh's rule of 1851, that a paper confined to one subject is not a newspaper; and, in spite of Mr. Keogh's change of opinion in the year 1854; for the purpose of ascertaining whether a proclamation from Somerset House has the same validity as an Act of Parliament." That is one of the difficulties which the present state of the law engenders. No doubt that publication is a newspaper practically subject to the compulsory stamp. At present, however, the circulation of War Sheets is not considerable; and, in the unsettled state of the law respecting newspaper stamps, the Board of Inland Revenue, I think in the exercise of a wise discretion, have abstained from directing prosecutions against that class of periodicals. If the House of Commons decide that the law is to be upheld, it will be for the Attorney General immediately to prosecute that class of periodicals. I mention these facts to show that we are now placed in a situation of great difficulty in upholding and administering the present law. It is not simply a question of whether we shall retain or shall not retain a revenue of 200,000*l.*, but it is whether we shall enter upon a crusade against a large portion of the existing newspaper press for the sake of enforcing a law which can only be enforced by means of the verdicts of juries, which are somewhat doubtful in their result. These are the reasons which have influenced the Government in the course which they have taken in bringing forward this measure, and it is for the Committee to determine whether they have exercised a sound discretion or the reverse.

MR. GLADSTONE: I feel, Sir, that the chief part of the financial responsibility of this measure can rest upon no other person than myself; and, therefore, after what has fallen from the right hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir F. Baring), I wish to add a word to what has been stated by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He has pointed out, not only that the present state of the law is a theoretical absurdity, but that it contains practical difficulties which have reached such a pitch as to be entirely intolerable; that not only has it become utterly impossible for the gentlemen connected with the Board of Inland Revenue to discharge their duty to the public by enforcing the law, but that the cases which have occurred have been so glaring and so numerous as to bring all law into discredit. The very fact, also, of bringing the Government of the country into contact with persons under circumstances so disparaging, and of exposing them to questions in this House to which they are unable to make satisfactory replies, is a strong reason why Parliament should deal with this question. But, in defence of my right hon. Friend and myself, I must remind the Committee that it is the House of Commons which is principally responsible for the introduction of this measure. Last year, when I was absent, owing to indisposition, the discussion was raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester (Mr. M. Gibson) and others, not upon the suggestion of the Government, because the Government adopted a dissuasive tone in the matter; and it was rather in deference to the strong and unanimous opinion of the House that the Government gave way, and not because they thought that the proposition was either a wise or a prudent one. Now, what did the House do under the pressure of circumstances—what did both sides of the House think fit to do? At a time when the country was engaged in a war, when every Member of this House must have known that the demand for the year would exceed the provision which was made—liberal as that was—a Resolution was agreed to to the effect that the law with regard to newspapers was imperfectly defined and partially enforced. I am not one of those who think that a Member of this House, or a Member of the Government, should be compelled to do anything which the House might choose to require, and I may myself have on one occasion appeared to be contumacious in not at once acting in accordance with the expressed wishes of the House; but I may say that, greatly as I disapprove of the practice of passing abstract Resolutions, instead of dealing with practical plans, yet if the House chooses to adopt that course, and to lay down the opinion that a law should be altered, it is the duty of a Minister of the Crown to endeavour to give full effect to the expressed wish of the House, unless some obstacle of a serious nature should intervene; and therefore, to my mind, the question now is whether, under existing circumstances, the alteration proposed by the Government is for the good of the country. Now, I would ask the right hon. Member for Portsmouth whether he is able to suggest or to recommend any alteration of the law which is in principle different from the proposal made to-night by the Government, or from that which, a few weeks ago, I brought forward myself? Will any one stand up and say that he agreed to the Resolution which was passed by the House, but that in his opinion the law ought to be altered by enforcing the stringent definitions which at present exist or even by making them more stringent still? I have no doubt that any hon. Gentleman expressing an opinion on this subject will stand to the opinion he expresses; but if objection is to be taken to the present Resolutions on the ground that they refer to a financial and fiscal subject, whereas it is a measure in which the fiscal element is merely a secondary consideration, I must request those hon. Gentlemen who thus object on financial grounds not to shrink from declaring their opinions on the general policy of the proposal. I must ask them to point out to the Government what course they ought to have pursued in order best to give effect to the Resolutions agreed to by the House last year. It will not do for those persons who forced upon the Government the view that the law must be altered, to take financial objections to the measure now proposed, and to refrain from stating in what way they intended that an alteration should be made in the law when they voted in favour of the Resolution which was agreed to by the House.

MR. LAING said, he felt considerable

apprehension at any proposition at the present time which had the effect of remitting taxation, to any extent, however slight. He could understand, under ordinary circumstances, a reduction like the present being proposed, and he should, under such circumstances, look upon it with favour. At the present day, however, there was one consideration which was paramount to all others, and it was the duty of a Government to avoid seeking popularity in that House or in the country by giving up any taxation when the country was, from the circumstances of the war, inevitably compelled to expend so many millions. He was willing to accept any blame which might attach to him for having voted in favour of the Resolution referred to by the right hon. Gentleman who had last addressed them, but he would remind that right hon. Gentleman that at the time that Resolution was agreed to it had been stated that the amount of taxation existing would be sufficient to meet the exigencies of the public service, and that the Exchequer bonds which were issued were only in anticipation of the revenue. In such a state of affairs he considered that it was not improper to pass the Resolution referred to; but at the present time the case was widely different, for it was impossible for that House to conceal from itself that the expenditure of the country exceeded by many millions any sum which could reasonably be expected to be raised by taxation during the year; and, under these circumstances, it was, in his opinion, wrong to remit a tax which produced 200,000*l.* At such a time it was not expedient to remit taxation in order to court popularity, however unpopular any tax might be. If it could be shown that by the introduction of a measure like that described by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer taxation was being adjusted, and not remitted, the case would be different; but if such were not the case, he thought that to remit any tax at the present time might be attended with dangerous consequences.

MR. BRIGHT: I am afraid, Sir, that the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has created a difficulty which does not appear to me really to exist. This House is aware that when the Government was foolish enough or wicked enough to involve the country in war no limit to taxation could be expected. With regard to the sum of 200,000*l.*, I should have more faith in that objection if it were made by those Gentlemen who have complained against wasting the public money; but it appears to me that so many millions are voted night after night with so little trouble, that I do not look upon that particular sum as an insuperable objection or difficulty in the way of adopting the course which the House is now advised to pursue. But the question is not one of 200,000*l.* It is impossible to say what will be the loss to the Exchequer if the Chancellor of the Exchequer intends to allow all printed matter to go through the post. That, no doubt, would make up for some portion of the loss, but that, however, is not the question. The real question is, whether a Resolution which has been unanimously agreed to by the House shall be adhered to or not; or there is the other question, whether the law which exists, whatever it may be, shall be fairly administered by your authorities out of this House. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the late Chancellor of the Exchequer has examined this subject in his official capacity most minutely, more so, perhaps, than any other Member of this House, and the right hon. Gentleman the present Chancellor of the Exchequer has also examined it during the short time he has been in office, and both those right hon. Gentlemen have come to the same conclusion as that which he himself and the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. Cobden), and other hon. Friends of his had arrived at long ago—that the law was in such a condition that it was impossible to be worked by the authorities at Somerset House. If the Government had now determined not to alter the law, but to give the Attorney General orders to prosecute every one who should break it, there would not be to-morrow an Attorney General at all. There was no man he believed in that town or in England, of the legal profession, who would under such circumstances be willing to hold the office of the highest legal adviser of the Crown, or who would take upon himself to prosecute not 100, but more than 200 persons who are engaged in publishing papers which, strictly speaking, come within the limits of the existing law. I think the question of the sum of 200,000*l.* may be left out of view, or rather I am prepared to take it into view, because I think it is at once disposed of, for, when such large sums are nightly voted almost without any consideration whatever, I think that very little notice need be taken of such a sum as 200,000*l.* With regard
